INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

SIXTH SERIES

OFFICIAL REPORT

VOLUME 502

SESSION 2009–2010

7th December 2009—16th December 2009

Printed indexes to Hansard

This index is produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary Information Management Services (PIMS). It contains references to all material in the bound volume of Hansard.

- At the end of the session a sessional index is produced containing references to material in the bound volumes for the whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Volume indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Petitions', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various PIMS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, Identity and Passport Service, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Union and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Union' and the named individual institutions. Material about what the Union and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Cross references

- See references indicate that all the material has been entered under another heading.
- See also references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates and petitions, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings, written statements, written questions and ministerial corrections:
    - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
    - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
    - References ending in 'ws' indicate written statements.
    - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
    - References ending in 'p' indicate written petitions.
    - References ending in 'mc' indicate ministerial corrections. (Where a volume number is given, the correction appears in a later volume).
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting, is a written statement or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
    - Chamber Debates (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
    - Westminster Hall Debates (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings);
    - Written Statements (consisting of ministerial statements issued in writing); and
    - Questions (which includes all written, oral and urgent questions).

ABBREVIATIONS

The following abbreviations are used in connection with the progress of bills:

- 1R = First reading
- 2R = Second reading
- Com = Committee stage
- Rep = Report stage
- 3R = Third reading
- res = resolution
- amendt(s) = amendment(s)
- * = matter taken formally without debate or division
- (HL) = Bill starting in House of Lords
- (SP) = Bill in Scottish Parliament.

Parliamentary background

- The Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk contains a range of information about Parliament and the full text of some Parliamentary papers and proceedings including Hansard.
- Information on current Parliamentary business is provided in the House of Commons Information Office Weekly Information Bulletin, available on the website and from The Stationery Office (020 7873 8499).
- Further information on Parliamentary proceedings and procedures is available from the House of Commons Information Office (020 7219 4272).

A160
44–5w

A180
44–5w

Abbott, Ms Diane
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 104–13wh, 117–8wh, 124wh, 126wh

Abortion
1044w

Absence without leave
Armed forces 202–3w, 956w

Absenteeism
Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w

Academies
Finance 311–2w
Freedom of information 433–4w
National curriculum tests 1060w
Sponsorship 1060–1w

Access to Justice Act 1999
Questions
256–7w

Accident and emergency departments
Crimes of violence 748–9w
Greater London 280w, 738w, 1308w

Accidents
Large goods vehicles 1164w
Roads 199–200w, 386–8w, 544w, 638–9w, 1165–7w

Accountancy
Birmingham City Council (16.12.2009) 1072–80
Charities 843w

Administration of justice
964
Northern Ireland 658w

Admissibility of evidence
Electronic surveillance 31–2ws

Adult education
Finance 1345w

Advertising
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w
Energy Saving Trust 323–4w
Internet 1115w

Advisory Council on National Records and Archives
117–8w

Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs
559w, 637–8, 712w

Advisory Panel on Judicial Diversity see Judicial Diversity Advisory Panel

Advisory services
Debts 258w
Families 314–5w

Affordable housing
149–50, 1258–9w
Finance 94–8ws
Kent 893w
Leeds 1260w
Rural areas 893–4w
West Yorkshire 1260–1w

Afghanistan
Armed forces 201w, 810–2w, 1201–2w
Dept for International Development 804w
Detainees 812–3w

Afghanistan—continued
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1221–2w
Ministerial statements (14.12.2009) 641–63
Ministry of Defence 813–4w
Overseas aid 134–5w
Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 1–24wh, 14–5ws, 87–9w, 201–2w, 209–11w, 348–9, 361–2w, 810w, 814–6w, 826w, 954–5w, 1202–4w, 1218w, 1231–2w
Politics and government 354–5w, 571–3w
Population 354w
Poverty 804w
Reconstruction 135–6w, 355w, 573w, 1024w

Africa
Armed conflict 1232–3w
Water 136–7w, 252w

Afriyie, Adam
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 326
Questions
Business questions 514
Chief information officers, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265–6w
Chief information officers, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170w
Chief information officers, Ministry of Defence 1208w
Chief information officers, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office 351w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 49w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Ministry of Justice 276w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Prime Minister 2w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Treasury 56w
Government departments, Information and communications technology 1255w
Higher education, Finance 1349w
Internet, Registration 943w
National Investment Corporation 1362–3w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1000w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 103w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 654w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Transport 1168w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Scientific advisers, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Scientific advisers, Dept of Health 164w
Scientific advisers, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 242w
Scientific advisers, Ministry of Defence 212–3w

Agency nurses
Greater London 758–9w

Agriculture
Energy 1377w
Engineers 184w
Land use 149

Agriculture—continued
Subsidies 4–6w, 184–5w, 187w, 491–2, 497–8, 503
Wales 6w, 185–6w

Ainger, Mr Nick
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 48, 98–101
Questions
Bovine tuberculosis, Disease control 8–9w
Driving offences, Fixed penalties 76w
Speed limits, Fines 233w

Ainsworth, Rt Hon Bob, Secretary of State for Defence*
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 801–17
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 967–9, 971–6
Written Statements
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 14–5ws
Military aircraft, Helicopters 99–100ws
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 810–2w, 1201–2w
Afghanistan, Ministry of Defence 813–4w
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 87–9w, 814–6w, 826w, 1202–3w, 1218w
Armed forces, Career development 89w
Buildings, Ministry of Defence 827w
Caparo Group, Ministry of Defence 824w, 1206w
Capita, Ministry of Defence 205–6w
Chief information officers, Ministry of Defence 1208w
Compensation, Ministry of Defence 365w, 1206–7w
Cost effectiveness, Ministry of Defence 94–6w, 1210w
DA notices 93w
Defence, Expenditure 826–7w
Domestic visits, Ministry of Defence 95w
Electronic warfare 1210–1w
Eurocorps 832w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 98w, 211w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Ministry of Defence 834w
Mercenaries 1218w
NATO 836w
NATO response force 99w
Nigeria, Peacekeeping operations 99w
Nuclear weapons 100w, 1214–5w
Official engagements, Ministry of Defence 835w
Pay, Ministry of Defence 830–1w
Public relations, Ministry of Defence 831w
Publicity, Ministry of Defence 831w
Royal Fleet Auxiliary 1208w
Scientific advisers, Ministry of Defence 212–3w
Standards, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Taxis, Ministry of Defence 96–7w
Travel, Ministry of Defence 97w
Trident 1218–9w
Trident missiles 100w

Ainsworth, Mr Peter
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 294–5
Questions
Biodiversity 534–5w

Air force
Deployment 202w, 955–6w
Military bases 89–90w, 1215–6w

Air pollution
EC law 499

Aircraft carriers
202w

Airports
St Helena 114–5ws

Al Muhajiroun
1261w

Alarms
Carbon monoxide 504w

Alcoholic drinks
Crime 559w
Domestic violence 220w
Excise duties 582w
Misuse 732–4w
Prices 214w, 465–6w
Prisons 124w
Young people 1084w

Alexander, Danny
Questions
Armed forces, Housing 91w, 203–4w
Armed forces, Pay 204w
Armed forces, Telephone services 92w
Attendance allowance 407w
Defence, Procurement 1207w
Disability living allowance 1012–4w (505 5–8mc)
Extradition, USA 627
Income support, Carers 407–8w
Income tax 1007–8w
Motability 525w

Alexander, Rt Hon Douglas, Secretary of State for International Development*
Written Statements
"Department for International Development Autumn Performance Report 2009" 114ws
St Helena, Airports 114–5ws
Stabilisation Unit 139ws
UN Central Emergency Response Fund 24ws
Questions
Afghanistan, Dept for International Development 804w
Afghanistan, Overseas aid 134–5w
Afghanistan, Politics and government 571w
Afghanistan, Poverty 804w
Afghanistan, Reconstruction 135–6w
Hotels, Dept for International Development 808w
Lost property, Dept for International Development 807w
Official cars, Dept for International Development 137w
Publicity, Dept for International Development 807w
Security, Dept for International Development 137w
Training, Dept for International Development 1343w

Allen, Mr Graham
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 35
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 210wh, 222–3wh
Questions
Children, Disadvantaged 342, 352–3
Children, Maintenance 167–8w
Crime prevention, Nottingham 628–9
Public expenditure 1006w

Almshouses
1305w

Ambulance services
733–5w
Crimes of violence 153w, 1308–9w
Emergency calls 1309w

Ambulance services—continued*
South East 153w
Uniforms 734–5w

Amess, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 324–5
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1021–4
Questions
Access to Justice Act 1999 256–7w
Antisemitism 712–3w, 769w, 1222–3w
Antisemitism, Australia 769–70w
Antisemitism, Middle East 239w
Antisemitism, Sports 100w
Antisemitism, USA 360–1w
Banks, Finance 792
Food, Origin marking 497
Hezbollah 1226w
Independent Police Complaints Commission 566w
Independent Police Complaints Commission, Labour turnover 724w
Independent Police Complaints Commission, Pay 1393w
Mental Capacity Act 2005 286w, 751–3w
Middle East, Armed conflict 239w, 773–4w, 1034w
Middle East, Trade 239w
National Policing Improvement Agency 79–80w
National Policing Improvement Agency, Public appointments 416–7w
Police, Essex 569–70w, 725–7w
Police, Reorganisation 569w
Sentencing 1241–2w, 1245w
Social security benefits, Disabled 6–7

Ammunition
Exports 338–9w

Anabolic steroids
559–60w

Anderson, David
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 661
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 55
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 936–7
Westminster Hall Debates
Iron and steel, Teesside (16.12.2009) 301wh
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 132wh
Questions
Electric cables, Safety 938–9w
NHS, Finance 493w
NHS, Information and communications technology 25–6
NHS, Private patients 757w
NHS Business Services Authority, Consultants 755–6w
Schools, Electric cables 317w

Anderson, Janet
Questions
Correspondence, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
Correspondence, Members 79w

Animal experiments
413w, 637–8, 712w
Wales 1102–3w, 1385–6w
Wickham Research Laboratories 417w

Animal welfare
6w
Circuses 6–7w
Dogs 499–500
Livestock 188w
Poultry 501
Prosecutions 623w

Animals
Disease control 101ws
Litter 735w

Anniversaries
Bible (09.12.2009) 97–103wh

Antarctic
Climate change 375–6w

Antidepressants
Per capita costs 761w

Antisemitism
712–3w, 769w, 1222–3w
Australia 769–70w
Middle East 239w
Sports 100w
USA 360–1w

Anti-Slavery Day Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 979

Antisocial behaviour
1061w
Fixed penalties 611w

Antisocial behaviour orders
West Yorkshire 1103–4w
Young people 227w

Anti-terrorism control orders
108–10ws

Apprentices
330w, 353–4, 501–3w, 1345–6w
Bexley 502w, 1085–6w
Finance 601w, 1085w
Staffordshire 1085–6w

Arbuthnot, Rt Hon James
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 652
Defence (15.12.2009) 807
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 304
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 973
Questions
Licensing laws 671w
Ordnance Survey 591w, 997w, 1301w
Planning permission, Pyestock 963–4

Archives
Prime Minister 181–2w

Areas of outstanding natural beauty
Housing 590w

Armed conflict
Africa 1232–3w
Middle East 239w, 357–8w, 576w, 773–8w, 834w, 1034–6w, 1227–9w

Armed forces
816–20w
Absence without leave 202–3w, 956w
Afghanistan 201w, 810–2w, 1201–2w
Cadets 955–7w, 1205–6w
Career development 89w
Compensation 363–4w
Deployment 819w
Education 1211w
Elections 619w
Energy 203w
Health 820–2w
Homelessness 962
Housing 90–1w, 203–4w
Inverness 204w
Manpower 522–4w, 822w, 957w
Mental health services 822–3w, 957w
Northern Ireland 823w
Pay 204w
Pensions 91–2w, 205w
Petitions (14.12.2009) 21–3p
Postal services 1365w
Scotland 203–4w

- Armed forces—continued
  - Sports 958w
  - Teachers 707w
  - Telephone services 92w
  - Training 958–9w, 1204–5w
  - Treaties 819w
- Armoured fighting vehicles
  - 364w, 824w
- Art works
  - Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
  - Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
  - Dept for International Development 978w
  - Dept of Health 1312–3w
  - Home Office 1388w
  - Ministry of Defence 827w
- Arthritis
  - Health services 466–7w
- Arts
  - Teachers 1078–84w
- Arts Council England East
  - Public relations 529–30w
- Arts Council of England
  - 664–6w
- Asbestos
  - Schools 138w, 317w
  - Social rented housing 918w
- Ashford Kent
  - Remand in custody 464w
  - Unemployment 600–1w
- Ashwell Prison
  - 106w, 1039–40w
- Assaults on police
  - 1386w
- Assets
  - Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603w
  - Dept for Transport 197–8w
  - Foreign and Commonwealth Office 236w
  - Government 151, 671w
  - Home Office 715w
  - NHS 1053–4w
  - Solicitor-General 180w
- Association of Chief Police Officers
  - 638
- Asylum
  - 68w, (07.12.2009) 125–32, 215w
  - Children 68–70w
  - Democratic Republic of Congo 713w
  - Finance 635
  - Legal aid 272–3w
  - Petitions (16.12.2009) 1070–1
  - Repatriation 1043w
  - Scotland 713–4w
  - Sudan 1386–7w
  - Yorkshire and the Humber 1387w
  - Young people 413w
- Atkins, Charlotte
  - Chamber Debates
  - Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 317
  - Questions
  - Inland waterways 499
  - Public expenditure 795
- Atkinson, Mr Peter
  - Chamber Debates
  - Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 289
- Attendance allowance
  - 16, 407w, 779w
- Audit
  - Regulation 1098w
- Audit Commission
  - Procurement 1261w
  - Public relations 57–60w
- Austin, Ian, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and Minister for the West Midlands, Dept for Communities and Local Government
  - Written Statements
  - Mobile homes, Tribunals 135–6ws
  - Questions
  - Affordable housing 1259w
  - Affordable housing, Kent 893w
  - Affordable housing, Rural areas 894w
  - Almshouses 1305w
  - Carbon monoxide, Poisoning 305w
  - Community infrastructure levy 895w
  - Community relations, Older people 895–6w
  - Council housing, Finance 299–300w, 389w
  - Council housing, Leeds 1263w
  - Council housing, Property transfer 918–9w
  - Council housing, Rents 896w, 984w
  - Council housing, Sales 389–90w
  - Council housing, Waiting lists 919w, 1262–3w
  - Derelict land 300w
  - Disabled facilities grants 300–1w
  - Disabled facilities grants, Somerset 300–1w
  - Domestic waste, Waste disposal 988w
  - Empty dwelling management orders 898w
  - Empty property 898w
  - First time buyers 992w
  - Green belt 902w, 990w
  - Home information packs 144–5, 152, 297w
  - Homelessness 1272–4w, 1305–6w
  - Homelessness, Leeds 990–1w
  - Homelessness, Young people 903w, 991w, 1274–82w
  - Housing 904w
  - Housing, Areas of outstanding natural beauty 590w
  - Housing, Autism 904–5w
  - Housing, Carbon emissions 993w
  - Housing, Construction 901–2w
  - Housing, Energy 906w, 1283w
  - Housing, Finance 993w
  - Housing, Fire extinguishers 911w
  - Housing, Floods 1272w
  - Housing, Greater London 303–4w
  - Housing, Leeds 1284–5w
  - Housing, Older people 905–6w, 1282w
  - Housing, Prices 305w, 907–10w, 994w, 1286w
  - Housing, Regeneration 305w
  - Housing, Research 909–11w
  - Housing, Rural areas 395–6w, 591w
  - Housing, Standards 911w
  - Housing, Water 1286w
  - Housing revenue accounts 992w
  - Leasehold Valuation Tribunal 920–1w
  - Local development frameworks 1288w
  - Local government, National parks authorities 1289w
  - Mortgages 914w
  - Mortgages, Repossession orders 917w, 995w, 1304–5w
  - Multiple occupation 398w, 915w
  - National policy statements 995–6w
  - Oikos Storage, Canvey Island 997w
  - Ordnance Survey 591w, 916w, 997w, 1301w
  - Ordnance Survey, Public relations 592w
  - Planning permission 997–9w
  - Planning permission, Appeals 66w, 1302w
- Austin, Ian,—continued
  - Planning permission, Historic buildings 902w
  - Planning permission, Natural gas 140–1
  - Planning permission, Ports 307w, 995w
  - Planning permission, Renewable energy 307w
  - Private rented housing 403–4w
  - Private rented housing, Greater London 1000w
  - Property development, Floods 145–7, 402–3w, 1302w
  - Regional planning and development 916w
  - Rented housing 916–7w
  - Sheltered housing 307–8w, 917–8w
  - Sheltered housing, East Sussex 308w
  - Sheltered housing, Fees and charges 63w
  - Sheltered housing, Tamworth 308w
  - Sleeping rough 1000–1w, 1305–6w
  - Social rented housing 308–10w, 1001w
  - Social rented housing, Asbestos 918w
  - Social rented housing, Insurance 918w
  - Social rented housing, Rents 309w
  - Social rented housing, Standards 1306w
  - Supporting people programme 919w
  - Temporary accommodation 310–1w
  - Tenancy deposit schemes 919–20w
  - Tenant Services Authority, Manpower 920w
- Austin, Mr John
  - Chamber Debates
  - Local government finance (08.12.2009) 218–9, 230
  - Questions
  - United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre 235w
- Australia
  - Antisemitism 769–70w
- Autism
  - 549w, 736w, 1309w
  - Employment services 19, 169–70w, 782w
  - Housing 904–5w
  - Mental health services 1310w
  - Public transport 1168–9w
- Automatic number plate recognition
  - M5 383–4w
- Aviation
  - Exhaust emissions 1154–6w
  - Greater London 28–9w
  - Regulation 39–40ws
- AWE Aldermaston
  - 364–5w
- AWE Management
  - Radioactive waste 365w
- Ayrshire
  - 1139w
- Baby care units
  - 751w
- Back pain
  - Waiting lists 736–7w
- Bacon, Mr Richard
  - Chamber Debates
  - Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 322
  - Questions
  - NHS, Information and communications technology 25, 494w
- Badgers
  - see also Bovine tuberculosis
  - 7w
- Badman, Graham
  - 692w

Badman Review
see Home Education Independent Review

BAE Systems
179w

Bailey, Mr Adrian
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1003–6
Questions
Business, Regulation 965–6

Bain, William
Questions
Child Trust Fund 961
Unemployment, Young people 794

Baird, Vera, Solicitor General
Questions
Assets, Solicitor-General 180w
BAE Systems 179w
Christmas, Solicitor-General 859–60w
Conferences, Solicitor-General 1002–3w
Convictions 860–2w
Crown Prosecution Service 861–90w, 1176–200w
Crown Prosecution Service, Conferences 1002w
Crown Prosecution Service, Employment Tribunals Service 1199w
Crown Prosecution Service, Hotels 1004–6w
Crown Prosecution Service, Internet 890–1w
Data protection, Solicitor-General 180w
Domestic violence, Greater Manchester 612w
Electronic equipment, Solicitor-General 889–90w
Energy, Solicitor-General 1003w
Fraud, Plea bargaining 1246w
Hotels, Solicitor-General 1004–6w
Internet, Solicitor-General 890–1w
Plants, Solicitor-General 1003–4w
Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office, Hotels 1004–6w
Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office, Internet 890–1w
Sentencing, Northern Ireland 182w
Serious Fraud Office, Conferences 1199–200w
Serious Fraud Office, Hotels 1004–6w
Serious Fraud Office, Internet 890–1w
Terrorism 892w
Terrorism, USA 181w
Training, Solicitor-General 891–2w
Working hours, Solicitor-General 181w
Written questions, Solicitor-General 1004w

Baker, Norman
Questions
Ambulance services, Crimes of violence 153w
Animal experiments 712w
Aviation, Exhaust emissions 1154–6w
Aviation, Greater London 28–9w
Bankruptcy 329–31w
Bicycles, Theft 233–4w
Biofuels, Imports 1155w
Breast cancer 838w
Broadband, South East 933–4w
Bus services, Fares 1155–6w
Bus services, Finance 540w
Child minding, South East 423–4w
Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority 611–2w
Crossrail line 540–2w
Defence Estates, Manpower 825w
Defence Nuclear Safety Regulator, Manpower 825w

Baker, Norman—continued
Departmental responsibilities, Home Office 1107w
Disclosure of information, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Disclosure of information, Dept for Work and Pensions 244–5w
Driving offences, Insurance 613–4w
Drugs, Sussex 617–20w
East coast railway line 384w
East coast railway line, Rolling stock 543–4w
Ferries, Safety 1162w
Firing ranges, Shoeburyness 836w
Freight 940w
Fuels, Excise duties 1382w
Hakluyt, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1033–4w
Health visitors, East Sussex 746w
Heathrow Airport 1162–3w
Higher education, Lewes 942w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1361w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Ministry of Justice 116w
Injuries, Knives 749–50w
Jobcentre Plus, South East 173–5w
Jobseeker's allowance, South East 248w
Large goods vehicles 1164w
Large goods vehicles, Accidents 1164w
Large goods vehicles, Licensing 633–5w
Large goods vehicles, Registration 1164–5w
Members, Surveillance 547–8w
Monarchy, Succession 438–9w
Motor vehicles, Excise duties 1380w
Motor vehicles, Exhaust emissions 1159w, 1167w
Network Rail, Freedom of information 620w
Official cars, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 11w
Official cars, Dept for International Development 137w
Official cars, Dept of Health 155w
Official cars, Home Office 1107w
Official cars, Ministry of Defence 1208w
Olympic Games 2012, East Sussex 102w
Panchen Lama 1037–8w
Prisons, Sussex 122w
Probation officers, South East 461–4w
Railway network 38w
Railway stations 39–40w
Railways, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Railways, Electrification 42–3w
Railways, Fuels 45w
Railways, Home Office 1389w
Railways, Liverpool 43w
Railways, Standards 384–5w
Rapid transit systems 637–8w
Raves, East Sussex 230w
Renewable energy, Waste 20w
Roads, Accidents 1165–7w
Roads, Construction 639–40w
Roads, Freight 1167w
Roads, Repairs and maintenance 44w
Rolling stock 388w
Sheltered housing 307–8w
Sheltered housing, East Sussex 308w
Speed limits, East Sussex 388–9w
Taxis, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Taxis, Dept for Transport 382w
Taxis, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Taxis, Ministry of Defence 96–7w
Taxis, Ministry of Justice 261–2w
Taxis, Northern Ireland Office 1237–8w

Baker, Norman—continued
Taxis, Scotland Office 1w
Teachers, South East 150w
Transport, Business 951–2w
Transport, Exhaust emissions 1169–70w
Transport, Planning 639–40w
Travel, Cabinet Office 251w
Travel, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
Travel, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Travel, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Travel, Dept for Transport 634w
Travel, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Travel, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Travel, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225–6w
Travel, Ministry of Defence 97w
Travel, Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Travel, Northern Ireland Office 183w

Baldry, Tony
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 658
Defence (15.12.2009) 816
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 314–5
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 828
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 209–11wh
Questions
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 761w
Unemployment, Young people 167w

Balls, Rt Hon Edward, Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families
Written Statements
Children 46–50ws
Children, Protection 50–3ws
Special Educational Needs and Parental Confidence Inquiry 129–32ws

Bangladesh
Climate change 548w, 574w
Overseas aid 548–9w

Bank services
Fees and charges 50w, 787–8
Post offices 255w
Standards 799

Bankruptcy
329–31w
Kent 331w

Banks
Competition 799
Finance 1ws, 50–3w, 253–4w, 792, 1005w
Insolvency 127ws
Loans 791–2
Pay 786–7
Taxation 855–6w, 1008w

Banks, Gordon
Questions
Business, Billing 798–9
Business, Government assistance 782

Barker, Gregory
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 201w
Afghanistan, Reconstruction 135–6w
Climate change, International cooperation 130w
Climate change, Ministry of Defence 92w
Climate Change Projects Office 937w

Barker, Gregory—continued
EC law, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 939–40w
EC law, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 685w
EC law, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60–1w
EC law, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101–2w
EC law, Dept for Transport 970w
EC law, Dept of Health 476–7w
EC law, Home Office 565w
EC law, Ministry of Defence 831–2w
EC law, Ministry of Justice 433w
EC law, Treasury 52w
Energy, Armed forces 203w
Energy, Housing 327w
Energy, Military bases 99w
Energy and Climate Change Unit 939w
Energy supply 926–7w
Nuclear power 326w
Nuclear weapons, Proliferation 359w
Official engagements, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Trade agreements, Peru 1099w
UK Innovation Investment Fund 509–10w

Barlow, Celia
Questions
Fire prevention 298w

Barnsley
Children's centres 1064w
Higher education 1359w

Baron, Mr John
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 153–4wh
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 497–8
Buildings, Cabinet Office 1252w
Buildings, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351w
Buildings, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1264–5w
Buildings, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Buildings, Dept for International Development 805w
Buildings, Dept for Transport 630w
Buildings, Dept of Health 1046w
Buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1223w
Buildings, Home Office 1105w
Buildings, Ministry of Defence 827w
Buildings, Northern Ireland Office 968w
Buildings, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Buildings, Scotland Office 627w
Buildings, Treasury 848w
Conferences, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Conferences, Dept for Communities and Local Government 896–7w
Conferences, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Conferences, Dept for International Development 806w
Conferences, Dept for Transport 1160w
Conferences, Dept for Work and Pensions 1012w
Conferences, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Conferences, Dept of Health 1046–7w
Conferences, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Conferences, Leader of the House of Commons 979w
Conferences, Minister for the Olympics 961w

Baron, Mr John—continued
Conferences, Ministry of Defence 1207w
Conferences, Northern Ireland Office 1235–6w
Conferences, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Conferences, Prime Minister 966w
Conferences, Scotland Office 627w
Conferences, Treasury 848w
Members, Correspondence 411w
NHS, Information and communications technology 26
Training, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1356–7w
Training, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1267w
Training, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Training, Dept for International Development 807–8w
Training, Dept for Transport 1161w
Training, Dept of Health 1047w
Training, Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Training, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Training, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w
Training, Scotland Office 628w
Training, Solicitor-General 891–2w
Training, Treasury 848w

Barrett, John
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 465
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 194
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 40wh

Barron, Rt Hon Kevin
Questions
Members, Allowances 351

Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust
161w, 737w, 1310w, 1319w

Basingstoke
MMR vaccine 754–6w

Battle, Rt Hon John
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 524
Questions
Affordable housing 1259w
Affordable housing, Leeds 1260w
Affordable housing, West Yorkshire 1260–1w
Antisocial behaviour orders, West Yorkshire 1103–4w
Armed forces, Mental health services 822–3w, 957w
Armed forces, Training 1204–5w
Business, Yorkshire and the Humber 1087–92w
Cancer, Leeds 1311w
Children, Day care 1174w
Children's centres 1063–4w
Community development 982w
Community development, Finance 982–3w
Council housing, Leeds 1263w
Death, Leeds 1129–32w
Dialysis machines, Yorkshire and the Humber 1318w
Digital technology 1357–8w
Diseases, Leeds 1133–4w
Employment, Leeds 1134–5w
Empty property, Leeds 898w
Equal pay 967–8w
Extracurricular activities 1066–7w

Battle, Rt Hon John—continued
Free school meals 1067w
Free school meals, Leeds 1068w
Graduates 941–3w
Health services, Leeds 1050w, 1318w
Higher education, Leeds 939–41w, 1094w, 1360–1w
Homelessness, Leeds 990–1w
Hospital wards, Leeds 1317–8w
Housing, Energy 1380w
Housing, Leeds 1284–6w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 1204w
Mental health services 1052–3w
Motor vehicles, Sales 1165–6w
National income, Leeds 1135–6w
NHS, Ministers of religion 1320w
Population, Leeds 1136w
Schools, Energy 1071–2w
Schools, Leeds 1072–4w
Schools, Yorkshire and the Humber 1073w
Shared ownership schemes, Yorkshire and the Humber 1305w
Special educational needs 1077–8w
Sports, Leeds 1172w
Sports, Obesity 964w, 1172–3w
Swine flu, Telephone services 1059–60w
Taxation, Pensioners 1381w
Tranquillisers, Per capita costs 761w
Voluntary work, Religion 1258w
Welfare tax credits, Leeds 1383–4w
West Yorkshire Police, Firearms 1118–9w
Winter fuel payments, Leeds 1021w
Winter fuel payments, West Yorkshire 1022w
Young people, Alcoholic drinks 1084w

Bayley, Hugh
Questions
Animal welfare, Prosecutions 623w
Asylum, Yorkshire and the Humber 1387w
Business, Government assistance 1348–9w
Countryside, Access 379–80w
Disadvantaged 339–40
Energy, Housing 324–6w
Flood control, Expenditure 377–8w
Floods, York 498
Hunting 416w
Mortgages, Government assistance 1297w
Mortgages, Repossession orders 1304–5w
Museums and galleries, Yorkshire and the Humber 194–6w
Non-domestic rates, Empty property 1301w
Organic farming 379w, 652w
Scientists, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Scientists, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Scientists, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Scientists, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Scientists, Dept for Transport 633w
Scientists, Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Scientists, Dept of Health 155w
Sports, York 964–5w
Sports, Yorkshire and the Humber 103w
Tourism, Yorkshire and the Humber 104w
Transport, Per capita costs 544–6w
Welfare tax credits, York 1384w
Wind power 329w
York, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 502

Bedfordshire
Inland waterways 502–3

Beer
Excise duties 254w

Bees
Imports 7w
Research 501

Begg, Miss Anne
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 828
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 156–8wh

Beith, Sir Alan
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 893–4
Freedom of information, Points of order (10.12.2009) 527
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 309
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 25wh
Questions
Fuel poverty 356
Local government, Northumberland 297–8w

Bell, Sir Stuart, Second Church Estates Commissioner*
Questions
Church Commissioners, Public relations 521w
Crown courts 791–2w

Bellingham, Mr Henry
Questions
Census 344–5
Debts, Advisory services 258w
Employment services, Autism 782w
Financial services, Regulation 785
Legal aid 622w
National debt 800
Occupational pensions 15
Prisons, Northern Ireland 951

Bellwin scheme
393–5w

Benn, Rt Hon Hilary, Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs*
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 835–43, 902–6
Written Statements
EU Agriculture and Fisheries Council 23ws
Flooding Lessons Learned Review 101–2ws
Origin marking, Israel 28ws
South Downs National Park Authority 29–30ws
Questions
Climate change, Conferences 485–6
Climate change, Forests 484–5
Common agricultural policy 500
Common land, Rochdale 502
Compost, Health hazards 500
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 498–9
Food, Research 493–4
Horticulture 538w
Landfill 504
Swine flu, Disease control 504

Benn, Rt Hon Hilary,—continued*
York, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 502

Benton, Mr Joe
Chamber Debates
Malta, Petitions (15.12.2009) 934–5

Benyon, Richard
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 816
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 315–6
Questions
Apprentices, Finance 601w, 1085w
Climate change, Conferences 486
Fishing catches 1142w
Seas and oceans, Pollution 1143–5w

Beresford, Sir Paul
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 581–3, 595, 602, 604

Berkshire
Crime 113–4w
Roads 199–200w, 386w

Bermuda
Firearms 1024w

Bernard Lodge Inquiry
115ws

Berry, Mr Roger
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 161–2, 184–8, 202

Betting
Horse racing 369w
Licensing 666w
Taxation 404–5w

Betts, Mr Clive
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 578–9, 583–8, 598–9
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 36–7wh
Questions
Bus services 964
Derelict land 300w
Employment and support allowance 1149w
Private rented housing 134

Beverley Freemen Bill (HL) 2008–09
Chamber Debates
2R* (08.12.2009) 133

Bexley
Apprentices 502w, 1085–6w
Council tax 580–1w
Fly tipping 650w
Regeneration 404w
Registration of births deaths marriages and civil partnerships1136–7w

Bible
Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 97–103wh

Bicycles
Theft 233–4w

Big Lottery Fund
Public relations 104w

Bill of Rights
789–90w

Billing
Business 798–9
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170–1w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w

Billing—continued
Energy 928w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w

Bingo
Closures 45w

Biodiversity
7w, 534–5w
Eco-towns 301–2w

Biofuels
8w, 320w, 1325–6w
Boilers 154w
Imports 1155w
Power stations 921w

Birds of prey
East of England 645w

Birmingham City Council
Accountancy (16.12.2009) 1072–80

Blackman-Woods, Roberta
Chamber Debates
Climate change, Petitions (15.12.2009) 934
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 382
Questions
Youth Opportunity Fund 431w

Blair, Rt Hon Tony
967w

Blears, Rt Hon Hazel
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 379
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 824
Questions
Police community support officers 619

Blindness
see Sight impaired

Blood
Donors 467–8w

Blood and Transplant Authority see NHS Blood and Transplant

Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry
658–9w

Blunt, Mr Crispin
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 660
Defence (15.12.2009) 815
Safety and Conservation Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 979
Questions
Extradition, USA 628
Manpower, Cabinet Office 1253–4w
Manpower, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1356w
Manpower, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
Manpower, Dept for Communities and Local Government 897w
Manpower, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667–8w
Manpower, Dept for International Development 1342w
Manpower, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1119–20w
Manpower, Dept of Health 1313w
Manpower, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224w
Manpower, Home Office 716w
Manpower, Ministry of Justice 1241w
South East Coast Strategic Health Authority 498–9w, 767–8w

Boilers
Biofuels 154w
Standards 921–2w

Bolton Primary Care Trust
Manpower 467–8w

Bone, Peter
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 662
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 461, 463
Defence (15.12.2009) 817
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 297
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 749
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 383
Pre-Budget Report 2009, Points of order (09.12.2009) 387
Private Members' bills, Points of order (15.12.2009) 834, (16.12.2009) 982
Public sector (07.12.2009) 38–9
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1051, 1058–9
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 526
Westminster Hall Debates
Neuroblastoma (16.12.2009) 308–11wh, 313wh
Questions
Administration of justice, Northern Ireland 658w
Banks, Finance 50–1w, 253–4w
Banks, Taxation 855–6w, 1008w
Business questions 516
Climate change, Conferences 485–6
Local government services 143
Ministers 251w, 1256w
Neuroblastoma 551–2w
NHS, Information and communications technology 28
Planning permission, Appeals 66w
Police, Learning disability 80–3w
Police, Manpower 632–3
Unemployment 8
Unemployment, Young people 794

Bone marrow disorders
Donors (15.12.2009) 231–8wh, 468–9w

Border Agency see UK Border Agency

Borders
Personal records 1104w

Borrow, Mr David S
Questions
Hearing impaired, Civil servants 350w
Hearing impaired, Selly Oak Hospital 164w

Bosnia and Herzegovina
Judiciary 1025w

Boswell, Mr Tim
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 539–46, 555, 560, 570

Bottomley, Peter
Questions
London Metropolitan University 341w
Public expenditure, Dept for Work and Pensions 345w

Bovine tuberculosis
Disease control 8–9w, 495–6
East Midlands 8w
Vaccination 9–10w

Bradshaw, Rt Hon Ben, Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport
Written Statements
"Department for Culture, Media and Sport Autumn Performance Report 2009" 97–9ws
Questions
Arts Council of England 665–6w
Creativity and Business International Network 528w
Government, Assets 671w
Public expenditure, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1172w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 103w
Tourism, Cumbria 195w
Travel, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w

Bradwell-on-Sea
Nuclear power stations 483–4

Brady, Mr Graham
Questions
Audit, Regulation 1098w
Charities, Fraud 1249w
Entry clearances, Pakistan 720w
Gift aid 1135w
Railway stations, Security 42w

Brake, Tom
Chamber Debates
Equitable Life Assurance Society, Petitions (08.12.2009) 295
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 296
Questions
Olympic Games 2012, Security 1220w
Police, Demonstrations 634

Brazier, Mr Julian
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 657
Questions
Banks, Finance 1005w
CEFAS Endeavour 10–1w
RRS James Cook 49w
RV Prince Madog 47–8w
Wind power 1126–7w

Breast cancer
838w

Brennan, Kevin, Minister of State, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills and Dept for Children, Schools and Families
Questions
Adult education, Finance 1345w
Apprentices 330w, 501–3w, 1345–6w
Apprentices, Bexley 502w, 1085–6w
Apprentices, Finance 601w, 1085w
Apprentices, Staffordshire 1085–6w
Building colleges for the future programme 503w, 511w
Business, Government assistance 1346–8w
Carbon monoxide, Alarms 504w
Competition Commission 1350–1w
Competition Commission, Public relations 1091w
Correspondence, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
English language, Education 509w, 1363w
Estate agents, Money laundering 510–1w, 606–7w, 1362w
Further education 330w, 339w
Further education, Admissions 607w
Further education, Crimes of violence 511w
Further education, Disabled 501w
Further education, Foundation degrees 511w
Further education, Standards 340w
Further education, Teachers 1093–4w
Further education, Transport 1364–5w

Brennan, Kevin, —continued
Learning and Skills Council for England 512–3w
Learning and Skills Council for England, Correspondence 1095w
Learning and Skills Council for England, Pay 607–8w
National Star College, Capital investment 514w
Office of Fair Trading, Conferences 1096w
Office of Fair Trading, Hotels 1095–6w
Supermarkets, Competition 607w
Train to gain programme 345–6w
Training, Government departments 515w
Training, Older workers 1096–7w
Training, Service industries 1095w
Unemployment 515w
Unemployment, Young people 346w, 516–20w, 609–10w
Unsolicited goods and services 945w
Vocational training 348w, 520w
Vocational training, East of England 1100–1w
Vocational training, Non-departmental public bodies 1097–8w
Vocational training, West Midlands 1376w

Bridges
Cumbria 34–5w
Defence equipment 959w
Workington 539–40w

Brinsford Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre
465w

British Airways
Industrial disputes 956

British Board of Film Classification
Public relations 102–3w

British constitution
257–8w

British Council
Public relations 574–5w

British Educational Communications and Technology Agency
Finance 1066w

British Forces Post Office
(09.12.2009) 136–42wh, 211w

British Indian Ocean Territory
Environment protection 356w

British Museum
Public relations 192w

British nationality
Assessments 215w

British nationals abroad
Childbirth 236w
Death 27w

British overseas territories
Companies 1377–8w
Remembrance Day 575w

British Overseas Territories Consultative Council
see Overseas Territories Consultative Council

British Transport Police
Public relations 542w

British Waterways Board
Public relations 648w

Broadband
331w, 503w, 932–3w, 1361w
East Midlands 369w
Eastbourne 331–2w
Finance 1346w

Broadband—continued*
South East 933–4w

Brokenshire, James
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 238, 251–3
London City Airport, Noise (15.12.2009) 939–44
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 117–23wh
Questions
Accident and emergency departments, Greater London 738w
Agency nurses, Greater London 758–9w
Alcoholic drinks, Misuse 732–4w
Antisocial behaviour orders, Young people 227w
Back pain, Waiting lists 736–7w
Crime and Disorder Act 1988 216w
Health services, Greater London 757w
Health services, Offences against children 156–7w
Hearing aids, Greater London 747w
Hospital beds, Greater London 1317w
Intensive care, Greater London 747w
London City Airport 35–7w, 198w
Mephedrone 566–7w
Parenting orders 561–2w
Victim support schemes, Sexual offences 1117–8w

Brooke, Mrs Annette L
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (09.12.2009) 466
Mobile homes, Petitions (09.12.2009) 467
Questions
Children, Communication 685–6w
Internet, Security 1115w
Renewable energy 559w
Special educational needs 673–4w
Taxation, Holiday accommodation 857w
Teachers, Training 709w
Tourism 672–3w

Brown, Rt Hon Gordon, Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Minister for the Civil Service*
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 641–6, 648–63
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 348–9
Apprentices 353–4
Archives, Prime Minister 181–2w
Blair, Rt Hon Tony 967w
Cabinet 1139w
Chequers, Ministerial policy advisers 710w
Child tax credit 353
Children, Disadvantaged 352–3
Children, Poverty 351–2
Climate change, International cooperation 354
Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting 548w, 710–1w
Conferences, Prime Minister 966w
Dangerous dogs 347–8
Departmental reorganisation, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 547w
Diabetes, Screening 355
Economic situation 356
Electronic equipment, Prime Minister 966w
Foreign investment in UK, Yorkshire and the Humber 355
Fuel poverty 356
G20, Spain 347, 711w
General elections 966–7w

Brown, Rt Hon Gordon,—continued*
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Prime Minister 2w
House of Commons, Reform 350–1
Hunting 356–8
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 967w
Licensing laws 354
Members, Allowances 349–51, 711w
Members, Surveillance 547–8w
NHS walk-in centres, Greater Manchester 355
Official engagements, Prime Minister 2w, 346–7, 353
Parliamentary private secretaries 711w
Police, Nottinghamshire 356
Security, Prime Minister 547w
Written questions, Government responses 1139w

Brown, Rt Hon Nicholas, Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Chief Whip) and Minister for the North East of England*
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 764

Brown, Mr Russell
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 832
Questions
Electricity, Pensions 420w
Energy, Prices 420–1w
Future Jobs Fund 18

Browndown
Military bases 960w

Browning, Mrs Angela
Chamber Debates
Climate change, Petitions (09.12.2009) 468
Gastrointestinal cancer, Surgery (09.12.2009) 472–7
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (16.12.2009) 1068–9
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 991–5
Questions
Data protection, Home Office 717w
Data protection, Solicitor-General 180w

Bruce, Rt Hon Malcolm
Questions
Pensioners, Social security benefits 12

Bryant, Chris, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office*
Written Statements
Convention on Cluster Munitions 2ws
EU General Affairs Council 3–6ws, 102–5ws
Questions
Afghanistan, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1221–2w
Assets, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 236w
Bermuda, Firearms 1024w
British Council, Public relations 574–5w
British Indian Ocean Territory, Environment protection 356w
British nationals abroad, Childbirth 236w
British nationals abroad, Death 27w
British overseas territories, Companies 1377–8w
British overseas territories, Remembrance Day 575w
Buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w, 1223w
Capita, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 235w

Bryant, Chris,—continued*
Carbon emissions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Christmas, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1025–6w
Colombia, Human rights 24–5w
Colombia, Trade unions 770w
Conferences, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Contracts, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1223w
Cost effectiveness, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1027w
EC grants and loans, Wales 25w
EC institutions, Fines 26w, 576w
Electronic equipment, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Embassies, Closures 237w
Energy, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Fiji, Politics and government 26–7w
Freedom of information, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224w
Gibraltar, Territorial waters 1032–3w
Government Hospitality, Wines 1033w
Historic buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Honduras, Elections 772–3w
Hotels, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1034w
Ilois, Resettlement 356–7w
Information officers, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 356w
Interpet, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028–9w
Iraq, Prisoners 27w
Manpower, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224w
Members, Correspondence 1226w
Moldova, Politics and government 577w
Official hospitality, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1029w
Olympic Games 2012, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1036w
Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe 1036w
Overseas Territories Consultative Council 1036–7w
Publicity, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 575w
Recruitment, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w, 575w
Russia, Detainees 1231w
Scientific advisers, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 242w
Security, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Sick leave, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030w
Spain, EC presidency 1038w
Standards, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030w
Taxis, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030–1w
Telephone services, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w
Training, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w
Transcaucasus 778w
Travel, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225–6w
Travel information 1232w
Turks and Caicos Islands, Human rights 1039w
UN Committee on the Rights of the Child 778–9w

Bryant, Chris,—continued
Written questions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031-2w

Buck, Ms Karen
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 308
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 224
Questions
Academies, Finance 311-2w
Council housing, Construction 144
GCSE, Greater London 690-1w
Homelessness 150
Housing, Greater London 303-4w
Legal aid 434-5w
Local government finance 65w
Parking, Fees and charges 66w
Pension credit, Greater London 785-6w
Youth services, Greater London 151-2w

Buckinghamshire
Health services (15.12.2009) 177-97wh

Building colleges for the future programme
503w, 511w

Building schools for the future programme 963
Laboratories 1061-2w
Pendle 674-5w

Building societies
1005w

Buildings
Cabinet Office 1252w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1264-5w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Dept for International Development 805w
Dept for Transport 630w
Dept for Work and Pensions 243w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 131w
Dept of Health 1046w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w, 1026-7w, 1223w
Home Office 1105w
Ministry of Defence 365w, 827w
Northern Ireland Office 968w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Scotland Office 627w
Treasury 52w, 848w

Burden, Richard
Chamber Debates
Birmingham City Council, Accountancy (16.12.2009) 1072-6
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 217-8, 229
Questions
Child rearing 1009-10w
Israel, Prisoners 357w

Bureaucracy
Police 623-5, 633

Burglary
215w, 635
Kent 215-6w

Burgon, Colin
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1010-4

Burma
Politics and government (09.12.2009) 73-96wh

Burnham, Rt Hon Andy, Secretary of State for Health
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 664-76, 678-9, 682, 723
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 161, 163-75
Written Statements
"Department of Health Autumn Performance Report 2009" 30ws
NHS 30-1ws, 138-9ws
Questions
Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust 1319w
NHS, Information and communications technology 21-8

Burns, Mr Simon
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 164, 170, 180, 184
Questions
Northern Ireland government 955
Unemployment, Young people 167w

Burrowes, David
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 663
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 307
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 753, 764
Questions
Domestic violence, Victim support schemes 3-4w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 151, 297w
Prisons, Collective worship 801w

Burstow, Mr Paul
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (16.12.2009) 1070
Princess Royal Barracks, Petitions (09.12.2009) 469
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 985-8
Travel, Petitions (09.12.2009) 469
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Older people (16.12.2009) 277-81wh, 286wh, 288wh, 293-7wh
Questions
Dementia, Research 738-9w
General elections 966-7w

Burt, Alistair
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 310-1
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 160, 173, 184, 188-92, 196
Sustainable Communities Act 2007 (Amendment) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 979
Questions
Licensing laws 354

Burt, Lorely
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 39wh, 41wh
Questions
Post Office, Finance 47w
Post offices, Closures 47w
Royal Bank of Scotland, Loans 583-4w
Royal Mail, Industrial disputes 48w

Bury
Local government finance 306w

Bus services
30-1w, 38-9ws, 964
Fares 1155-6w
Finance 28w, 119-20ws, 540w, 1156-9w
Lincolnshire 31w, 540w

Buses
Injuries 969-70w
Safety 195-7w

Business
Billing 798-9
Closures 593w, 598-602w, 609-10w
Eastbourne 934w
Essex 1086w
Government assistance 782-4, 934-7w, 1005-6w, 1346-9w
Regulation 965-6
Taxation 255-6w, 406w, 856w
Transport 951-2w
York 1348-9w
Yorkshire and the Humber 1087-92w

Business and Community Safety Forum
299w

Business expenses
Dept for Transport 629w

Business motions
(14.12.2009) 747, (15.12.2009) 931

Business Services Authority see NHS Business Services Authority

Business statements
505-17

Butler, Dawn, Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office and An Assistant Whip
Questions
Bingo, Closures 45w
Consultants, Cabinet Office 2-3w
Death 593w
Employment, Lone parents 596-8w
Floods, Cumbria 346
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Cabinet Office 351w
Government departments, Information and communications technology 132w
Information officers, Cabinet Office 251w
KBR, Cabinet Office 3w
Manufacturing industries, Closures 47w
Political Honours Scrutiny Committee 3w
Unemployment, Young people 600-1w
Voluntary work, Disabled 340-2

Butterfill, Sir John
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 58-9wh, 64wh

Bye laws
64-5w

Byers, Rt Hon Stephen
Questions
Film, Israel 529w

Byrne, Rt Hon Liam, Chief Secretary to the Treasury
Chamber Debates
Points of order intervention (07.12.2009) 40
Public sector (07.12.2009) 29-31, 33-9
Written Statements
Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review 126-7ws
Public sector 1-2ws
Questions
Banks, Pay 786-7
Civil servants, Location 1377w
Civil servants, Stoke on Trent 799-800

Byrne, Rt Hon Liam,—continued
Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review 1380w
Government departments, Standards 1381–2w
Public expenditure 789–90, 793–5, 853w, 1006w
Public sector, Pensions 853–4w

Cabinet
1139w

Cabinet Office
Buildings 1252w
Caparo Group 250w
Christmas 350w, 839w
Conferences 1253w
Consultants 2–3w
Drinking water 595w
Electronic equipment 839w
Energy 593–5w
Freedom of information 342–3, 839w, 1253w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser 351w
Hotels 840w
Information officers 251w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 840–1w
KBR 3w
Manpower 251w, 1253–4w
Official hospitality 1132w
Publicity 1133w
Security 351w
Training 1254w
Travel 251w

Cable, Mr Vincent
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 376–7
Public sector (07.12.2009) 34
Westminster Hall Debates
Science, Finance (15.12.2009) 224–8wh
Questions
Assets, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603w
Assets, Dept for Transport 197–8w
Assets, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 236w
Assets, Home Office 715w
Assets, Solicitor-General 180w
Cost effectiveness, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603–5w
Cost effectiveness, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1027w
Cost effectiveness, Ministry of Defence 94–6w
Employee benefit trusts 1007w
Financial services 52w
Pay, Banks 786–7
Pay, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334–5w
Pay, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1266w
Pay, Northern Ireland Office 21–2w
Royal parks, Parking 672w
Tax avoidance 960

Caborn, Rt Hon Richard
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 380
Questions
Betting, Horse racing 369w
Betting, Licensing 666w
Betting, Taxation 404–5w

Cadets
Armed forces 955–7w, 1205–6w

Cairns, David
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 658

Cairns, David—continued
Marine Accident Investigation Branch (Reports) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 981

Cameras
Speed limits 637, 640w

Cameron, Rt Hon David
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 646–8
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 348–9
House of Commons, Reform 350–1
Members, Allowances 349–50

Campbell, Mr Alan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 123–7wh
Written Statements
Security guards, Training 110–1ws
"Security Industry Authority Report and Accounts 2008–09" 23–4ws
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 559w, 712w
Alcoholic drinks, Crime 559w
Alcoholic drinks, Prices 214w
Anabolic steroids 559–60w
Antisemitism 712–3w
Antisocial behaviour orders, West Yorkshire 1103–4w
Antisocial behaviour orders, Young people 227w
Burglary 215w, 635
Burglary, Kent 215–6w
Crime and Disorder Act 1988 216w
Crimes of violence, Females 562–3w, 565w, 715w
Crimes of violence, Homophobia 225w, 565w
Crimes of violence, Lancashire 712w
Crimes of violence, Merseyside 258w
Crimes of violence, Taxis 564w
DNA, Databases 217–9w, 564w, 622–3
Domestic violence 219–20w, 564–5w, 630–1
Domestic violence, Alcoholic drinks 220w
Driving offences 220w
Firearms 223–4w
Fraud, Credit cards 224–5w
Fraud, Internet 1113–4w
Human trafficking 1114w
Internet, Children 1391–2w
Knives, Crime 216–7w, 563w
Mephedrone 566–7w
Offences against children, Internet 560–1w, 568w
Parenting orders 228–9w, 561–2w
Police, Bureaucracy 624
Police, Essex 569w
Police, North Yorkshire 630
Raves, East Sussex 230w
Road traffic offences 231w
Serious Organised Crime Agency, Manpower 1116–7w
Serious Organised Crime Agency, Northern Ireland 183w
Sexual offences, Victim support schemes 1117–8w
Shoplifting 231–2w, 1117–8w
Speed limits, Fines 233w
Theft, Bicycles 233–4w
Tobacco, Young people 233–4w
United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre 235w
Video games, Young people 235w

Campbell, Mr Alan,—continued
Written questions, Home Office 717–8w

Campbell, Mr Gregory
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 409
Defence (15.12.2009) 815
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 831
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 98wh
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 77wh
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 248–9wh
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 113wh
Questions
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry 658–9w
National insurance contributions 1008w
Public expenditure 789
Voluntary work, Disabled 341–2
Weapons, Northern Ireland 948–9

Campbell, Rt Hon Sir Menzies
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 809
Questions
Ammunition, Exports 338–9w
BAE Systems 179w
Contracts, Ministry of Defence 94w
Export credit guarantees 338w
Fraud, Plea bargaining 1246w
KBR, Cabinet Office 3w
KBR, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 315–6w
KBR, Dept for Transport 35w
KBR, Dept for Work and Pensions 240w
KBR, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 133w
KBR, Home Office 227–8w
Secondment, Ministry of Defence 521–2w
Siemens, Dept for Transport 201w
Siemens, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 328w
Siemens, Dept of Health 165w
Siemens, Minister for the Olympics 349w

Campbell, Mr Ronnie
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 829
Questions
Ashwell Prison 106w

Cancer
Health services 737–8w, 1310–1w
Leeds 1311w

Cannabis
Misuse 1311–2w

Canvey Island
Oikos Storage 997w

Cap Gemini
Coal Authority 130–1w

Caparo Group
Cabinet Office 250w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Dept for Transport 31w, 1154w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 130w, 922w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1222w
Ministry of Defence 824w, 1206w

Capita
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 675w

Capita—continued
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376w
Dept for Transport 197w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1145–6w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1326–31w, 1337w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 235w
Home Office 714w
Ministry of Defence 205–6w
Northern Ireland Office 20–1w

Capital gains tax
127–8ws

Capital investment
795–6
National Star College 514w

Capital punishment
Iraq 230w

Caravan sites
Travellers 981–2w

Carbon emissions
320w, 417–8w, 1120w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Gas fired power stations 1336–7w
Housing 132–3ws, 148–9, 339–40w, 993w, 1283w
Local government 134w

Carbon monoxide
Alarms 504w
Poisoning 305w

Carbon reduction commitment energy efficiency scheme
320–1w

Carbon sequestration
130w

Carbon Trust
1123–4w

Cardiff
Crime prevention 635–6

Care homes
154w, 281w, 1312w
Standards 281w

Care Homes and Sheltered Accommodation (Domestic Pets) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 980

Care Quality Commission
281–2w, 478–80w, 744–6w

Career development
Armed forces 99w

Carers
Income support 407–8w

Carer's allowance
17

Carmichael, Mr Alistair
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1050, 1056–7
Questions
Bank services, Fees and charges 787–8
Detention centres, Children 620–1
Lost property, Dept for International Development 807w
Lost property, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Lost property, Ministry of Defence 959w
Lost property, Scotland Office 620w

Carmichael, Mr Alistair—continued
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Recruitment 951

Carswell, Douglas
Chamber Debates
European Union Membership (Referendum) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 980
Questions
Gaddafi, Saif al-Islam 345w
Social security benefits, Disabled 6

Castle Point
Post office card account 1019–20w

Cawsey, Mr Ian
Chamber Debates
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 973
Questions
Nature conservation, Crime 16w

CEFAS Endeavour
10–1w

Cellular phones
see Mobile phones

Cemeteries
Islam 1239w

Census
344–5

Central Office of Information
Hotels 1248–9w

Chadwick Review
see Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review

Challen, Mr Colin
Chamber Debates
Members, Points of order (08.12.2009) 153
Questions
Banks, Finance 52–3w

Channel Islands
Health services 273w

Chapman, Mr Ben
Questions
Crimes of violence, Merseyside 258w
Homophobia, Crimes of violence 225w, 432w, 565w
Homophobia, Schools 1068–9w
Marine conservation zones 491
Parks, Merseyside 398w
River Dee, Salmon 539w

Charitable donations
Tax avoidance 93–4ws

Charities
Accountancy 843w
Fraud 1249w
Regulation 350w

Charities Act 2006
Questions
1249w

Charity Commission
1127–8w
Hotels 1249–50w

Chaytor, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 532
Local Authorities (Overview and Scrutiny) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 978
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 164–5
Questions
Food, Origin marking 497
Local government finance, Bury 306w
Personal injury, Compensation 273–4w
Unemployment benefits 796

Chequers
Ministerial policy advisers 710w

Cheques
254w, 964

Chief information officers
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265–6w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170w
Ministry of Defence 1208w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w

Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice for Northern Ireland
Public relations 659–60w

Chilcot Inquiry
see Iraq Committee of Inquiry

Child benefit
846w

Child care tax credit
57w, 256w

Child care vouchers
846w

Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission
Information and communications technology 1009w

Child minding
South East 423–4w

Child Poverty Bill 2008–09 then 2009–10
Chamber Debates
Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 388–465

Child rearing
1009–10w

Child Support Agency
(16.12.2009) 247–67wh

Child tax credit
353, 1006–7w
Grandparents 579w

Child Trust Fund
579–80w, 847w, 961

Childbirth
British nationals abroad 236w

Children
46–50ws
Abuse 146w, 1234w
Asylum 68–70w
Communication 685–6w
Databases 138w, 675–6w
Day care 422–3w, 676w, 1174w
Detention centres 620–2, 718–9w
Disabled 550w
Disadvantaged 342, 352–3
Immigration 78w, 1114–5w
Internet 1391–2w
Maintenance 19–20, 167–8w, 242–3w, 1010–2w
Mental health 316–7w
Northern Ireland 1234w
Poverty 351–2, 837–9w
Protection 50–3ws, 676–7w
Smoking 1055w
Social services 424w
Swine flu 167w

Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service
Complaints 1062w

Children in care
Guardianship 694–5w
Prisoners 801w
Young offenders 1043–4w

Children's centres
701–8w, 1063–4w
Barnsley 1064w
Hampstead 313w
Lincolnshire 313w

Children's Commissioner for Northern Ireland
see Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People

Cholesterol
1044–5w

Chope, Mr Christopher
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 758
Questions
Dept of Resources , Finance 527–8w

Chorley
Local government 1291w
Local government finance 397–8w
Shops 149

Christianity
India 357w

Christmas
Cabinet Office 350w, 839w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 602w, 1349–50w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 677–8w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1261–2w
Dept for Work and Pensions 168w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 554w
Dept of Health 549w, 1045–6w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1025–6w
Government Equalities Office 578w
Home Office 714–5w, 1104w
Minister for the Olympics 961w
Ministry of Defence 824w
Ministry of Justice 611w, 1040–1w
Northern Ireland Office 530w, 968w, 1234–5w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Scotland Office 627w
Solicitor-General 859–60w

Christmas bonus
779–80w

Christmas cards
Recycling 977w

Christmas trees
Recycling 916w, 977w

Chronic fatigue syndrome
Research 46w

Chronically sick people
1046w

Church Commissioners
Public relations 521w

Churches
Non-domestic rates 996w

Circumcision
HIV infection 158–9w

Circuses
Animal welfare 6–7w

Citizenship
GCSE 139–40w

City of London Guilds
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w

Civil Aviation Authority
Public relations 543w

Civil Law Reform Bill (Draft)
Written Statements
115–6ws

Civil servants
Hearing impaired 350w
Location 1377w
Radicalism 417w
Redundancy pay 349w
Stoke on Trent 799–800

Civil service agencies
Dept for Transport 1159w

Clapham, Mr Michael
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 44
Questions
Compost, Health hazards 500
Local government services 142–3

Clappison, Mr James
Questions
Incapacity benefit 246w
National insurance, Foreign workers 176w
Population 727w
Poverty 248w
Unemployment 9

Clark, Greg
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 49–59
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 321–2
Westminster Hall Debates
Iron and steel, Teesside (16.12.2009) 301wh, 305wh

Clark, Katy
Questions
Morocco, Origin marking 1229–30w

Clark, Paul, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Transport
Chamber Debates
London City Airport, Noise (15.12.2009) 942–6
Written Statements
Aviation, Regulation 39–40ws
Large goods vehicles, Testing 38ws
Passenger ships, Liverpool 142ws
Questions
Aviation, Greater London 28–9w
Bus services 30–1w
Buses, Injuries 969–70w
Buses, Safety 195–7w
Civil Aviation Authority, Public relations 543w
Cycling, Safety 30w
Driving offences 1162w
Ferries, Safety 1162w
Heathrow Airport 1162–3w
Humberside Road Safety Partnership 1163w
Large goods vehicles 1164w
Large goods vehicles, Accidents 1164w
Large goods vehicles, Licensing 633–5w
Large goods vehicles, Registration 1164–5w
London City Airport 35–7w, 198w
Motor sports 971w
Motor vehicles, Excise duties 198–9w
Motor vehicles, Exhaust emissions 1167w
Northern Lighthouse Board, Public relations 381–2w
Official cars, Exhaust emissions 971w
Piracy 636w
Roads, Accidents 199–200w, 386–8w, 544w, 638–9w, 1165–7w

Clark, Paul,—continued
Roads, Freight 1167w
Speed limits, Cameras 640w
Speed limits, East Sussex 388–9w

Clarke, Rt Hon Tom
Questions
Kentigern House 834w
Revenue and Customs, Opening hours 1382w
Unemployment, Young people 9–10
Voluntary work, Disabled 340–1

Class sizes
685w

Classroom assistants
Lincolnshire 319w
South East 150w

Clegg, Rt Hon Nick
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 650–1
Questions
Poverty, Children 351–2

Clifton-Brown, Mr Geoffrey
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 299–300
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1006–10
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 712w
Art works, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Geothermal power 1337w
National Star College, Capital investment 514w

Climate change
534w, 922–3w
Antarctic 375–6w
Bangladesh 548w, 574w
Conferences 485–6, 1331w
Developing countries 804–5w (508 13–4mc)
Forests 484–5
International cooperation 130w, 321–2w, 354, 554–5w, 922w, 956–8, 963, 1340w
Ministry of Defence 92w
Petitions (09.12.2009) 468, (15.12.2009) 934
Publicity 1119w, 1331–2w

Climate Change Levy (Solid Fuel) (Revocation) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(14.12.2009) 747

Climate Change Projects Office
937w

Closed circuit television
113–4ws

Cluster munitions
206w

Clwyd, Rt Hon Ann
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 652

Coaker, Vernon, Minister of State, Dept for Children, Schools and Families
Written Statements
EU Education, Youth and Culture Council 128–9ws
Questions
Academies, Finance 311–2w
Academies, National curriculum tests 1060w
Academies, Sponsorship 1060–1w

Coaker, Vernon,—continued*
Antisocial behaviour 1061w
Building schools for the future programme, Laboratories 1061–2w
Building schools for the future programme, Pendle 674–5w
Education, Assessments 318w, 684–6w
GCSE 143w, 689w
GCSE, Citizenship 139–40w
GCSE, Greater London 690–1w
GCSE, North East 315–6w
GCSE, Young offenders 143–4w
National curriculum tests, Expenditure 144w
Pupil exclusions 137–8w, 145–6w
Pupil referral units, Per capita costs 146–7w
Pupils, Greater London 1071w
Pupils, Per capita costs 147–8w, 700w
Schools, Asbestos 138w, 317w
Schools, Crimes of violence 1104–5w
Schools, Electric cables 317w
Schools, Enfield 698w
Schools, Finance 317–8w
Schools, Floods 698w
Schools, Herefordshire 318w
Schools, Homophobia 1068–9w
Schools, Lancashire 1072w
Schools, Leeds 1072–4w
Schools, Offensive weapons 147–8w
Schools, Rural areas 147–8w
Schools, Standards 148–9w, 318w
Schools, Yorkshire and the Humber 1073w
Secondary education, Standards 699–700w
Specialist schools, Lincolnshire 319w
Teachers, Armed forces 707w
Teachers, Arts 1078–84w
Teachers, Lincolnshire 319w
Teachers, Males 707w
Teachers, Pay 150w
Teachers, Science 707–8w
Teachers, South East 150w
Teachers, Training 150–1w, 708–9w, 1083w
Trust schools, Cooperatives 1174–5w
Young offenders 1084w
Young offenders, Special educational needs 701w

Coal Authority
Cap Gemini 130–1w
Information and communications technology 131w, 1332w

Coalville
Regeneration 150–1

Coeliac disease
469w

Cohen, Harry
Questions
Energy, Housing 1122w
Iraq, Capital punishment 238w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 211w, 238w
Iraq, Prisoners 27w
Mercenaries 771w

Colchester Hospital University NHS Foundation Trust
161w, 1319w

Cold weather payments
Derbyshire 1011w

Collective worship
Prisons 801w

Colombia
Human rights 24–5w
Trade unions 770w

Commission for Equality and Human Rights
see Equality and Human Rights Commission

Commission for Rural Communities
Public relations 645–6w, 648–9w

Commissioner for Children and Young People for Northern Ireland
see Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People

Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses see Northern Lighthouse Board

Committee on Climate Change
322w

Common agricultural policy
500

Common land
Registration 646w
Rochdale 502

Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting
548w, 710–1w

Communication
Children 685–6w

Communities England
see Homes and Communities Agency

Community assets programme
895w

Community development
136–7ws, 982w, 1262w
Finance 53–6ws, 982–3w

Community infrastructure levy
895w

Community Punishment and Rehabilitation Service see National Probation Service for England and Wales

Community relations
727w
Faith schools 678w
Older people 895–6w

Community safety accreditation schemes
107–8ws

Community transport
64ws

Companies
British overseas territories 1377–8w
Crown dependencies 1377–8w

Compensation
Armed forces 363–4w
Industrial diseases 555–8w
Local government 1291w
Ministry of Defence 365w, 1206–7w
Personal injury 273–4w
Pleural plaques 1041w
Terrorism 278w

Competition
Banks 799
Supermarkets 607w

Competition Commission
1350–1w
Public relations 1091w

Complaints
Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service 1062w
National Express East Anglia 42w
Pipex Homecall 344w
Welfare tax credits 584w

Complementary medicine
Regulation 155w

Compost
Health hazards 496, 500

Conditions of employment
1146w

Conferences
Cabinet Office 1253w
Climate change 485–6, 1331w
Crown Estate Commissioners 1378–9w
Crown Prosecution Service 1002w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w, 1357w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 896–7w, 985–6w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w, 669–70w
Dept for International Development 806w
Dept for Transport 1160w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1012w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Dept of Health 1046–7w
Electoral Commission 1141–2w
Food Standards Agency 1317w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 1338w
Leader of the House of Commons 979w
Minister for the Olympics 961w, 1219w
Ministry of Defence 1207w, 1209w
National School of Government 1256–7w
Northern Ireland Office 1235–6w
Office of Fair Trading 1096w
Office of Rail Regulation 1160–1w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w, 1140w
Political parties 83–4w
Postal Services Commission 1345w
Prime Minister 966w
Scotland Office 627w
Serious Fraud Office 1199–200w
Solicitor-General 1002–3w
Treasury 848w
United Kingdom Statistics Authority 1137w

Congo (Kinshasa)
see Democratic Republic of Congo

Conservation
Energy 255w, 927w
Sheep 18–9w
Whales 977–8w, 1145w

Consolidated Fund Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (10.12.2009) 607
2R* and 3R* (14.12.2009) 747
Royal Assent (16.12.2009) 977

Construction
1092–3w
Council housing 143–4
Housing 146–7, 151–2, 901–2w
Railways (08.12.2009) 25–48wh, 63–4ws
Roads 639–40w

Consultants
Cabinet Office 2–3w
Dept for Transport 32w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1119w
NHS Business Services Authority 755–6w
Northern Ireland Office 182w
Prime Minister 2–3w
Treasury 50w

Contracts
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Dept for Work and Pensions 409w
Fire services 900w

Contracts—continued
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1223w
Homes and Communities Agency 1282w
Ministry of Defence 94w, 210w
Scotland Office 374w

Convention on Cluster Munitions
2ws

Convictions
790w, 860–2w
Driving under influence 432w

Cooper, Rosie
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 231

Cooper, Rt Hon Yvette, Secretary of State for Work and Pensions
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 818–20, 822–33
Written Statements
"Department for Work and Pensions Autumn Performance Report 2009" 124ws Disabled, Equality 19–20ws
Employment, Mentally ill 9–10ws
Social security benefits, Uprating 66–92ws
Questions
Carer's allowance 17
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Work and Pensions 16
Equitable Life Assurance Society 20
Mortgages, Government assistance 18–9
New deal for lone parents 167w
Social security benefits, Fraud 16–7
Social security benefits, Widowed people 17
Unemployment, Young people 1–4
Winter fuel payments 4

Cooperatives
Dairy farming 11–2w
Trust schools 1174–5w

Copyright
Internet 943–4w
Music 666–7w (503 2mc)

Corbyn, Jeremy
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 655
Defence (15.12.2009) 810
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 382
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 118wh, 124–5wh, 127wh
Questions
Accident and emergency departments, Greater London 280w
Dalits, Discrimination 578w
Health services, Greater London 478w
Honduras, Elections 772w
Housing benefit 1014w
Housing benefit, Islington 1014–5w
Ilois, Resettlement 356–7w
London Metropolitan University 608–9w
Passports 414–5w
Private rented housing, Greater London 1000w

Cord blood
470w

Cormack, Sir Patrick
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 814
Public sector (07.12.2009) 37
Questions
Business questions 510

Cormack, Sir Patrick—continued
Disadvantaged 340
Equitable Life Assurance Society 20
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 954

Corporation Tax (Exclusion from Short-Term Loan Relationships) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(09.12.2009) 465

Correctional Services Accreditation Panel
788–9w

Correspondence
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
Learning and Skills Council for England 1095w
Members 79w, 160–1w, 194w, 411w, 416w, 724–5w, 773w, 834w, 851w, 930w, 1226w, 1338w

Cost effectiveness
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603–5w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1027w, 1224–5w
Ministry of Defence 94–6w, 1210w

Council housing
Construction 143–4
Finance 133–5ws, 299–300w, 389w
Greater London 918–9w
Leeds 1263w
Property transfer 918–9w, 1263w
Rents 896w, 984w
Sales 389–90w
Waiting lists 919w, 1262–3w

Council tax
60w, 984–5w
Bexley 580–1w
Empty property 896w
Valuation 580–1w, 1378w

Council tax benefits
408w, 1263–4w

Councillors
Fraud 1264w

Counter-terrorism
see also Terrorism
84–5w, 629–30
Expenditure 75–6w

Countryside
Access 379–80w

Courts
Domestic violence 108w

Cousins, Mr Jim
Questions
Consultants, Treasury 50w
Council housing, Finance 389w
Drugs, Crime 271–2w
Drugs, Rehabilitation 1048–9w
Empty property, Tyne and Wear 392–3w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 221–3w
Fire prevention 590–1w
GCSE, North East 315–6w
Immigrants, Finance 722–3w
Mortgages 845w
Multiple occupation 398w
Poverty, Children 837–9w
Private rented housing 403–4w
Social rented housing, Asbestos 918w
Taxation, Banks 856w
Transport, Tyne and Wear 43–4w
UK Border Agency, Manpower 235w
Working tax credit 858–9w

Coventry
Historic buildings 963w

Cox, Geoffrey
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 222, 232, 240
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 758

Crabb, Stephen
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 292
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 759
Westminster Hall Debates
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 73–4wh, 78–82wh, 89–90wh, 95wh
Questions
Census 345
Disability living allowance 20
Local government, National parks authorities 1289w
Mortgages, Government assistance 784w, 914–5w
Rescue services, Pembrokeshire 835w, 960–1w, 1217–8w
Secondary education 149w
Taxation, Holiday accommodation 796

Crausby, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 809
Questions
Bolton Primary Care Trust, Manpower 467–8w
Business questions 510
Child tax credit 1006–7w
Death 593w
Domestic violence, Greater Manchester 612w
Drinks, Consumption 975w
Fraud, Internet 1113–4w
Motor vehicles, Excise duties 198–9w
Smoking 1054–6w
Smoking, Children 1055w

Creativity and Business International Network
528w

Credit cards
798
Fraud 224–5w

Crime
1240w
Alcoholic drinks 559w
Berkshire 113–4w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
Drugs 113–4w, 271–2w
Knives 216–7w, 563w, 962
Nature conservation 16w

Crime and Disorder Act 1988
Questions
216w

Crime prevention
Cardiff 635–6
Northern Ireland 947–8
Nottingham 628–9
Young people 634

Crimes of violence
70–2w
Accident and emergency departments 748–9w
Ambulance services 153w, 1308–9w
Females 562–3w, 565w, 636, 715w
Further education 511w
Homophobia 225w, 432w, 565w
Hospitals 159–60w

Crimes of violence—continued
Lancashire 712w
Merseyside 258w
Northern Ireland 183–4w, 660w
Prisons 789–91w
Public transport 38w, 971w
Retail trade 563–4w
Schools 1104–5w
Taxis 564w

Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority
611–2w

Criminal investigation
Northern Ireland 1233–4w

Criminal Justice Act 2003 (Conditional Cautions: Financial Penalties) Order 2009
Chamber Debates
(14.12.2009) 770

Criminal law
EC law 26w

Criminal records
Judiciary 621–2w

Criminal Records Bureau
Finance 413w

Crisis loans
408w, 1011–2w

Crossrail line
540–2w

Crown courts
791–2w

Crown dependencies
612w
Companies 1377–8w

Crown Estate Commissioners
Conferences 1378–9w
Hotels 1379w
Internet 847w
Public relations 847w

Crown Prosecution Service
861–90w, 1176–200w
Conferences 1002w
Employment Tribunals Service 1199w
Hotels 1004–6w
Internet 890–1w

Croydon
Illegal immigrants 636

Cryer, Mrs Ann
Questions
Business questions 513–4
Dairy farming 493
Trident 1218–9w

Culture
Olympic Games 2012 1219–20w

Cumbria
Bridges 34–5w
Floods (08.12.2009) 327–36, 346, 902w, 990w
Roads 34–5w
Tourism 195w

Cunningham, Mr Jim
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 660
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 526
Questions
Conditions of employment 1146w
Equal pay 967w
Females, Health professions 477–8w
Females, Legal profession 436w
Forests 537w
Forests, Climate change 484
Forests, Disease control 650–1w
Forests, West Midlands 538w
Higher education, Finance 1371–2w

Cunningham, Mr Jim—continued
Historic buildings, Coventry 963w
India, Christianity 357w
International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources 538w
Internet, Advertising 1115w
Internet, Children 1391–2w
Palestinians, Education 352w
Palestinians, Overseas aid 353w
Railways, West Midlands 797
Sri Lanka, Internally displaced people 353–4w
Vocational training 1153–4w
Vocational training, West Midlands 1376w

Curriculum
1069w

Curtis-Thomas, Ms Claire
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 1202–3w
Community relations 727w
Counter-terrorism 84–5w
Eurocorps 832w
Foreign workers 1113w
Immigration 717w
Immigration controls 1390–1w
Military aircraft, Helicopters 834–5w, 1213–4w
NATO 836w
Railway network 199w
Research, EC grants and loans 1346w
Somalia, Piracy 213w
Work permits 78w

Cybercrime
602–3w
Energy 927w, 1340w
International cooperation 1391w

Cycling
29–30w
Safety 30w

Cycling England
Public relations 542–3w

Cyprus
Military bases 92–4w, 832w

DA notices
93w

Dairy farming
492–3
Cooperatives 11–2w

Dalits
Discrimination 578w

Dangerous dogs
186–8w, 347–8
Merseyside 470–2w

Dangerous driving
Invalid vehicles 108w

Darfur
see Sudan

Darling, Rt Hon Alistair, Chancellor of the Exchequer
Chamber Debates
Fiscal Responsibility Bill, 1R (09.12.2009) 387
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 359–71, 374–6, 378–86
Written Statements
Banks, Finance 1ws
EU Economic and Financial Affairs Council 125–6ws
Financial services 25ws
Northern Rock 13ws
Public expenditure 127ws

Darling, Rt Hon Alistair,—continued
Questions
Bank services, Standards 799
Banks, Competition 799
Business, Billing 798–9
Business, Government assistance 782–4
Capital investment 795–6
Departmental responsibilities, Treasury 795
Dunfermline Building Society 798
Economic situation 800
Financial services, Regulation 785–6
National debt 800
Non-domestic rates 799
Public expenditure 797
Public expenditure, Wales 798
Railways, West Midlands 797
Taxation 796–7
Unemployment benefits 796

Dartford-Thurrock Crossing
Tolls 1159–60w

Data protection
Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
EC law 1387–8w
Home Office 717w
NHS 492–3w
Sentencing 1240–1w
Solicitor-General 180w

Databases
Children 138w, 675–6w
DNA 74w, (09.12.2009) 104–27wh, 217–9w, 564w, 622–3
Police 799–800w

Davey, Mr Edward
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 14–7wh
Questions
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 967w

David, Mr Wayne, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Wales Office
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 929–31

Davidson, Mr Ian
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 807
Questions
Asylum, Scotland 713–4w

Davies, Dai
Questions
Advisory Council on National Records and Archives 117–8w
Afghanistan, Politics and government 571w
AWE Aldermaston 364w
Banks, Finance 50–1w, 253–4w
Boilers, Standards 921–2w
Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service, Complaints 1062w
Climate change, International cooperation 554–5w, 922w, 1340w
Eco-towns, Biodiversity 301–2w
Energy, Billing 928w
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure 205w
Housing, Carbon emissions 1283w
Housing, Water 1286w
Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority 620–2w
Industrial diseases, Compensation 557–8w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 547w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 238w

Davies, Dai—continued*
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Ministry of Defence 833–4w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Northern Ireland Office 22w
Members, Allowances 711w
Nuclear power 558w, 1124w
Personal injury, Compensation 1041w
Radioactive waste, Waste management 1341w
Renewable energy 1126w
Social security benefits, Legal aid 1021w
UK Innovation Investment Fund 1123–4w
Vocational training, Non-departmental public bodies 1097–8w

Davies, David TC
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 758
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 911
Questions
Armed forces, Career development 89w
Asylum, Finance 635
Cabinet 1139w
Christmas, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1349–50w
Christmas, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1261–2w
Christmas, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 554w
Christmas, Dept of Health 1045–6w
Christmas, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1025–6w
Christmas, Government Equalities Office 578w
Christmas, Minister for the Olympics 961w
Christmas, Ministry of Defence 824w
Christmas, Ministry of Justice 1040–1w
Christmas, Northern Ireland Office 1234–5w
Christmas, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Christmas, Scotland Office 627w
Christmas, Solicitor-General 859–60w
Government Hospitality, Wines 1033w
Housing benefit 19
Internet, Crown Estate Commissioners 847w
Internet, Crown Prosecution Service 890–1w
Internet, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1355–6w
Internet, Dept for Communities and Local Government 897w
Internet, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Internet, Dept for International Development 806w
Internet, Dept for Transport 631w
Internet, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 924w
Internet, Dept of Health 740w
Internet, Electoral Commission 893w
Internet, Food Standards Agency 1049w
Internet, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028–9w
Internet, Forestry Commission 976w
Internet, Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 1333w
Internet, Government Actuary's Department 851w
Internet, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Internet, Ministry of Defence 828–30w
Internet, National School of Government 1257–8w
Internet, Northern Ireland Office 660w

Davies, David TC—continued*
Internet, Office of Rail Regulation 631–2w
Internet, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Internet, Postal Services Commission 948w
Internet, Public Works Loan Board 848w
Internet, Revenue and Customs 854w
Internet, Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office 890–1w
Internet, Scotland Office 1176w
Internet, Serious Fraud Office 890–1w
Internet, Solicitor-General 890–1w
Internet, Treasury 849w
Internet, UK Debt Management Office 848w
Internet, UK Trade and Investment 1375w
Nigeria, Peacekeeping operations 99w

Davies, Philip
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 763
Questions
Financial services, Regulation 405w
Gambling Commission 371–2w, 1171w
Gambling Commission, Travel 670w
Mortgages, Government assistance 307w
Prisons, Crimes of violence 789–91w
Prisons, Television 1245w
Reoffenders 1246–8w
Social security benefits, Disqualification 176–7w

Davies, Mr Quentin, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Defence*
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 201–2w, 362w
Aircraft carriers 202w
Armoured fighting vehicles 364w, 824w
AWE Aldermaston 364–5w
AWE Management, Radioactive waste 365w
Capita, Ministry of Defence 206w
Christmas, Ministry of Defence 824w
Contracts, Ministry of Defence 94w, 210w
Defence, Procurement 93–4w, 1207–8w
Defence equipment 206–9w, 362–3w
Defence equipment, Lost property 823–4w
Devonport Dockyard 97w
Drinking water, Ministry of Defence 96w
Electronic equipment, Ministry of Defence 1207w
Firing ranges, Shoeburyness 836w
Hebrides missile range 832–3w, 1200–1w
HMS Endurance 98w, 367w
Military aircraft, Helicopters 833–5w, 1213–4w
St Kilda, Ministry of Defence 368–9w, 836w
Telephone services, Ministry of Defence 366w
Trident missiles 213–4w
Trident submarines 1218w
USA, Defence 214w

Davis, Rt Hon David
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 1218w
Data protection, Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
Prisons, Drugs 274–5w

Day care
Children 422–3w, 676w, 1174w

Deafness
see Hearing impaired

Death
593w
British nationals abroad 27w
Dietary supplements 1128–9w
Fires 901w
Leeds 1129–32w
Obesity 1250–1w
Patients 749w
Pressure sores 1131–2w
Smoking 1251–2w

Debt Management Office
see UK Debt Management Office

Debt Relief (Developing Countries) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 978

Debts
Advisory services 258w

Defence
Expenditure 826–7w
Ministerial statements (15.12.2009) 801–17
Procurement 93–4w, 1207–8w
USA 214w

Defence equipment
206–9w, 362–3w
Bridges 959w
Lost property 823–4w

Defence Estates
Manpower 825w

Defence Medical Services
Manpower 209w

Defence Nuclear Safety Regulator
Manpower 825w

Defence Training College
52w

Deferred divisions
(09.12.2009) 465, (14.12.2009) 747, (15.12.2009) 907

Delivery of Financial Support to Students in England by the Student Loans Company Review
11–2ws

Dementia
Research 738–9w

Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda
770–1w, 808–9w

Democratic Republic of Congo
Asylum 713w
Politics and government 805w

Demonstrations
Police 634

Denham, Rt Hon John, Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government*
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 225–34
Written Statements
Community development 136–7ws
Community development, Finance 53–6ws
Questions
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Communities and Local Government 148
Government, Assets 151
Land use, Agriculture 149
Local government services 142–3

Denham, Rt Hon John, —continued
 Planning obligations 148
 Regeneration, Coalville 150–1
 Regeneration, Kirkby 298w
 Regeneration, Liverpool 139–40
 Sustainable Communities Act 2007 137–9

"Department for Culture, Media and Sport Autumn Performance Report 2009"
 97–9ws

"Department for International Development Autumn Performance Report 2009"
 114ws

"Department for Transport Autumn Performance Report 2009"
 38ws

"Department for Work and Pensions Autumn Performance Report 2009"
 124ws

"Department of Health Autumn Performance Report 2009"
 30ws

Departmental coordination
 Personal records 20

Departmental reorganisation
 Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 547w

Departmental responsibilities
 Dept for Communities and Local Government 148
 Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 498–9
 Dept for Work and Pensions 16
 Home Office 634, 1107w
 Treasury 795

Deportation
 73–4w, 1109–10w
 Illegal immigrants 773w
 Morocco 356w
 Offenders 533w
 Palestinians 413–4w

Deposit protection service see Tenancy deposit schemes

Depressive illnesses
 Lancashire 751w

Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills
 Art works 333w
 Assets 603w
 Buildings 1351w
 Caparo Group 332w
 Capita 332w
 Christmas 602w, 1349–50w
 City of London Guilds 332w
 Conferences 938w, 1357w
 Contracts 333w
 Cost effectiveness 603–5w
 Departmental reorganisation 547w
 Disclosure of information 333w
 Domestic visits 1351–2w
 Driving 336–8w
 EC law 939–40w
 Electronic equipment 938w
 Energy 1352–4w
 Freedom of information 1354–5w
 Government Chief Scientific Adviser 49w
 Immobilisation of vehicles 1361w
 Impact assessments 1097w
 Industrial health and safety 334w
 Internet 1355–6w
 Iraq 340–1w
 Legal costs 605–6w
 Manpower 1356w
 Pay 334–5w
 Public expenditure 938w
 Railways 504w
 Recruitment 335w

Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills—continued
 Scientists 504w
 Taxis 335w
 Trade unions 346w
 Training 504–5w, 606w, 1356–7w
 Working hours 505–7w
 Written questions 507w, 1357w

Dept for Children, Schools and Families
 Advertising 139w
 Capita 675w
 Christmas 677–8w
 Correspondence 1175w
 EC law 685w
 Electronic equipment 1064w
 Employment agencies 1065w
 Energy 678w
 Freedom of information 1065w
 KBR 315–6w
 Legal costs 139–40w
 Legislation 140–2w
 Manpower 1065w
 Mobile phones 681–2w
 Press 682w
 Public expenditure 313–4w, 678–82w
 Public relations 1068w
 Recruitment 682w
 Recycling 682–3w
 Scientific advisers 314w
 Scientists 314w
 Security 683w
 Travel 1175w
 Working hours 683–4w
 Written questions 1066w

Dept for Communities and Local Government
 Absenteeism 391w
 Buildings 1264–5w
 Chief information officers 1265–6w
 Christmas 1261–2w
 Conferences 896–7w, 985–6w
 Departmental responsibilities 148
 EC law 60–1w
 Electronic equipment 390w, 1265w
 Freedom of information 390–1w
 Hotels 395w
 ICE 987w, 994w
 Internet 60w, 897w
 Manpower 897w
 Mass media 1295w
 Official hospitality 391w
 Paper 390w
 Pay 986w, 1266w
 Procurement 1265w
 Public expenditure 987w
 Public relations 987w
 Publicity 897–8w
 Scientific advisers 1000w
 Scientists 391w
 Security 60w
 Standards 1266w
 Training 1267w
 Written questions 391–2w, 1267w

Dept for Culture, Media and Sport
 Art works 667w
 Autumn Performance Report 2009 97–9ws
 Billing 1170–1w
 Buildings 370w
 Chief information officers 1170w
 Conferences 667w, 669–70w
 EC law 101–2w
 Electronic equipment 370w
 Freedom of information 370w
 Hotels 372w
 Internet 667w
 Manpower 667–8w
 Official hospitality 191–2w
 Plants 668w

Dept for Culture, Media and Sport—continued
 Public expenditure 1172w
 Public relations 371w
 Publicity 669w
 Scientific advisers 103w
 Scientists 371w
 Security 192w
 Sick leave 528–9w
 Telephone services 192–3w
 Training 669w
 Travel 371w
 Written questions 101w, 670w

Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs
 Capita 376w
 Departmental responsibilities 498–9
 Electronic equipment 973w
 Energy 973w
 Fixed penalties 12w
 Freedom of information 974w
 Information and communications technology 646w
 Internet 376–7w
 Official cars 11w
 Pay 647w
 Publications 974w
 Scientific advisers 654w
 Taxis 377w
 Travel 12w
 York 502

Dept for International Development
 Afghanistan 804w
 Art works 978w
 Autumn Performance Report 2009 114ws
 Buildings 805w
 Conferences 806w
 Educational visits 252–3w
 Electronic equipment 806w
 Freedom of information 806w
 Hotels 808w
 Internet 806w
 Lost property 807w
 Manpower 1342w
 Official cars 137w
 Official hospitality 807w
 Pay 1342–3w
 Publicity 807w
 Security 137w
 Telephone services 549w
 Training 807–8w, 1343w
 Written questions 352w

Dept for Transport
 Assets 197–8w
 Autumn Performance Report 2009 38ws
 Buildings 630w
 Business expenses 629w
 Caparo Group 31w, 1154w
 Capita 197w
 Civil service agencies 1159w
 Conferences 1160w
 Consultants 32w
 Driving 382–3w
 EC law 970w
 Electronic equipment 380w, 630w
 Food 32–3w
 Freedom of information 630w
 Information and communications technology 1160w
 Information officers 380–1w
 Internet 631w
 KBR 35w
 Legislation 33w
 Mobile phones 632w
 Parking 33–4w
 Pay 629–31w
 Plants 542w
 Publicity 1161w
 Railways 543w, 633w

Dept for Transport—continued*
  Scientific advisers 1168w
  Scientists 633w
  Security 634w
  Siemens 201w
  Taxis 382w
  Theft 381w
  Training 1161w
  Travel 634w, 970w
  Working hours 381–2w
  Written questions 1161w

Dept for Work and Pensions
  Autumn Performance Report 2009 124ws
  Buildings 243w
  Capita 1145–6w
  Christmas 168w
  Conferences 1012w
  Contracts 409w
  Crime 1146w
  Data protection 1146w
  Departmental responsibilities 16
  Disclosure of information 244–5w
  Domestic visits 168–9w
  Internet 409w, 1147w
  KBR 248w
  Legal costs 1147w
  Lost property 1148w
  Pay 1148w
  Public expenditure 245w, 410w
  Recruitment 1148w
  Scientific advisers 1150w
  Scientists 1150w
  Security 245w
  Taxis 169w
  Telephone services 169w, 1148–9w
  Travel 169w
  Working hours 243–4w

Dept of Energy and Climate Change
  Advertising 1333w
  Billing 1333w
  Buildings 131w
  Caparo Group 1[illegible]w, 922w
  Capita 1326–31w, 1337w
  Christmas 554w
  Conferences 923w
  Consultants 1119w
  Domestic visits 923w
  Driving 1120–1w
  Electronic equipment 555w
  Energy 923w
  Freedom of information 923–4w
  Hotels 1337w
  Immobilisation of vehicles 1337w
  Information officers 418w
  Internet 322w, 418–9w, 924w
  KBR 133w
  Manpower 1119–20w
  Official engagements 930w
  Official hospitality 555w, 925w
  Opinion Leader Research 1125w
  Pay 322–3w
  Public expenditure 323w
  Publications 555–6w
  Recruitment 419w
  Scientific advisers 930w
  Security 926w
  Siemens 328w
  Taxis 556w, 926w
  Travel 926w, 1334w
  Working hours 1334w
  Written questions 926w

Dept of Health
  Art works 1312–3w
  Autumn Performance Report 2009 30ws
  Buildings 1046w
  Christmas 549w, 1045–6w
  Conferences 1046–7w
  Driving 282–3w
  EC law 476–7w

Dept of Health—continued*
  Electronic equipment 739w
  Freedom of information 282w
  Hotels 1051w
  Impact assessments 285w, 749w
  Information officers 739–40w
  Internet 471–2w, 740w
  Legislation 473–5w, 491w, 751w
  Manpower 1313w
  Official cars 155w
  Official engagements 743w
  Pay 741w
  Public relations 282w
  Publicity 743w
  Regulatory impact assessments 749w
  Scientific advisers 164w
  Scientists 155w
  Security 155w
  Siemens 165w
  Telephone services 743w
  Training 1047w, 1314–6w
  Written questions 475w, 1047w

Dept of Resources
  Finance 527–8w

Derbyshire
  Cold weather payments 1011w
  Warm front scheme 1340–1w
  Winter fuel payments 1021w

Derelict land
  300w

Detainees
  Afghanistan 812–3w
  Immigrants 225–6w, 721–2w
  Russia 1231w
  Terrorism 85w

Detention centres
  1390w
  Children 620–2, 718–9w
  Manpower 719w

Developing countries
  Climate change 804–5w (508 13–4mc)
  Renewable energy 134w
  Slavery 809w

Development on Flood Plains (Environment Agency Powers) Bill 2009–10
    Chamber Debates
  1R (16.12.2009) 980–1

Devine, Jim
    Questions
  Credit cards 798
  Money lenders 959

Devolution
  Northern Ireland 1233w

Devonport Dockyard
  97w

Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust
  Manpower 287–8w

Dhanda, Parmjit
    Questions
  Employment schemes, Gloucestershire 13

DHL
  NHS 493w

Diabetes
  Leicester 1052w
  Screening 355

Dialysis machines
  Yorkshire and the Humber 1318w

Dietary supplements
  Death 1128–9w
  Health hazards 1047w

Dietetics
  282w, 335–6w, 1093w, 1315–7w

Digital switchover help scheme
  Public relations 371w

Digital technology
  1357–8w
  Fees and charges 46w

Digital UK
  Public relations 192w

Digital versatile disks
  Young people 235w

Diplomatic service
  Middle East 778w
  South Asia 778w

Director General of Fair Trading see Office of Fair Trading

Director of Public Prosecutions see Crown Prosecution Service

Disability living allowance
  16, 20, 779w, 1012–4w (505 5–8mc)

Disabled
  Children 550w
  Equality 19–20ws
  Further education 501w
  Northern Ireland Office 22w, 182w
  Opposition days (08.12.2009) 154–213
  Social security benefits 6–8, 18, 410–2w, 767w, 1055–7w
  Students 1098w, 1371w
  Voluntary work 340–2

Disabled facilities grants
  300–1w
  Somerset 300–1w

Disadvantaged
  339–40, 1267–8w
  Children 342, 352–3

Disciplinary proceedings
  Post Office 946w

Disclosure of information
  Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
  Dept for Work and Pensions 244–5w

Disconnections
  Energy 1122w, 1334–5w

Discrimination
  Dalits 578w

Disease control
  Animals 101ws
  Bovine tuberculosis 8–9w, 495–6
  Forests 650–1w
  Swine flu 504

Diseases
  Leeds 1133–4w

Dismore, Mr Andrew
    Chamber Debates
  London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 748–9
    Questions
  Asylum 215w
  Council housing, Waiting lists 919w
  Extradition 415w
  Fire services 899w, 989w
  Fire services, Manpower 589–90w
  Fire services, Vehicles 1271w
  Temporary accommodation 310–1w

Distributions (Excluded Companies) Regulations 2009
    Chamber Debates
  (07.12.2009) 123

Djanogly, Mr Jonathan
    Chamber Debates
  Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 296

Djanogly, Mr Jonathan—continued*
Questions
Employment agencies, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w

DNA
Databases 74w, (09.12.2009) 104–27wh, 217–9w, 564w, 622–3

Dodds, Mr Nigel
Chamber Debates
Lisbon Treaty (Referendum) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 979
Private Members' bills, Points of order (10.12.2009) 528
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 525
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 98–9wh
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 254wh
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 148wh
Questions
Business questions 516
Disabled, Northern Ireland Office 22w, 182w
Litter, Roads 487
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Recruitment 950–1
Serious Organised Crime Agency, Northern Ireland 183w

Dogs
Animal welfare 499–500

Domestic violence
219–20w, 564–5w, 630–1
Alcoholic drinks 220w
Courts 108w
Greater Manchester 612w
Police cautions 463w
Reoffenders 463–4w
Victim support schemes 3–4w

Domestic visits
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351–2w
Dept for Work and Pensions 168–9w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Ministry of Defence 95w
Ministry of Justice 108w

Domestic waste
Waste disposal 974–5w, 988w

Domicil
Taxation 1382–3w

Donohoe, Mr Brian H
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 842
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 6wh
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 247–55wh, 258wh, 261wh, 265–6wh
Questions
Ayrshire 1139w
Northern Ireland government 955–6

Donors
Blood 467–8w
Bone marrow disorders (15.12.2009) 231–8wh, 468–9w

Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 181–4, 190, 206

Dorries, Nadine
Questions
Driving offences 111–4w, 262–70w

DP World
1379w

Dr Foster
156w

Drew, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 837, 841, 851, 859, 873, 897–9
Freedom of information (14.12.2009) 776
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 310
Local government (10.12.2009) 594–7
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 5wh, 12wh
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 208wh
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 145wh, 158–61wh
Purton hulks (08.12.2009) 65–8wh, 70wh, 72wh
Questions
Africa, Armed conflict 1232–3w
Air force, Military bases 89–90w, 1215–6w
Business questions 513
Cluster munitions 206w
Fire services 1268–70w
Fire services, Finance 590w
Iraq, Oil 237–8w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 211w
Litter, Roads 487
Local government, Procurement 65w
Local government, Sustainable development 309–10w
Morocco, Deportation 356w
Morocco, Mining 358–9w
Nurses, Graduates 161w
Nurses, Training 46–7w
Pension credit 784–5w
Philippines, Politics and government 242w
RAF Welford 1217w
River Severn, Tidal power 1339w
Secondary education, Gloucestershire 149w
Sudan, War crimes 1232w
Supermarkets, Competition 607w
Trust schools, Cooperatives 1174–5w

Drinking water
Cabinet Office 595w
Ministry of Defence 96w
Standards 12–3w

Drinks
Consumption 975w

Driving
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 336–8w
Dept for Transport 382–3w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1120–1w
Dept of Health 282–3w

Driving offences
111–4w, 220w, 262–70w, 802–3w, 1162w
Fixed penalties 76w
Insurance 613–4w
Northern Ireland 663–4w
Norwich 113–4w
Sentencing 615–8w

Driving under influence
613–6w
Convictions 432w

Drugs
Crime 113–4w, 271–2w
Misuse 476w, 743–4w
Newcastle upon Tyne 271–2w

Drugs—continued*
NHS 756w
Prisons 122–4w, 274–5w, 1047–8w
Rehabilitation 476w, 1048–9w
Schools 147–8w
Sussex 617–20w

Dubai Ports World
see DP World

Duddridge, James
Questions
Fire services 141–2
Unemployment 168w

Duncan, Alan
Questions
National offender management information system 106–7w, 257w
Prisoners, Females 115w

Dunfermline Building Society
798

Dungavel House Immigration Removal Centre
629w

Dunne, Philip
Questions
Devolution, Northern Ireland 1233w

Durkan, Mark
Questions
Irish language 531–2w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 953–4
VAT, Northern Ireland 57w

Eagle, Angela, Minister of State, Dept for Work and Pensions*
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 518–9, 521–6
Written Statements
EU Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council 7–9ws
State retirement pensions, Uprating 142–4ws
Questions
Christmas bonus 779–80w
Conferences, Dept for Work and Pensions 1012w
Home responsibilities protection 247w
Members, Correspondence 411w
Occupational pensions 4–6, 15
Pension credit 784–5w
Pension credit, Greater London 785–6w
Pensioners, Income 248w
Pensioners, Social security benefits 12, 787–8w
Personal accounts 1019w
Sickness benefits, EC law 248–9w, 786w
Winter fuel payments 250w
Winter fuel payments, Derbyshire 1021w
Winter fuel payments, Leeds 1021w
Winter fuel payments, West Yorkshire 1022w

Eagle, Maria, Minister of State, Ministry of Justice and Government Equalities Office*
Written Statements
Offenders, Females 61–2ws
Questions
Assaults on police 1386w
Brinsford Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 465w
Convictions 790w
Crime 1240w
Domestic violence, Courts 108w
Domestic violence, Victim support schemes 3–4w
Driving offences 262–70w, 802–3w
Driving offences, Norwich 113–4w

Eagle, Maria,—continued*
Equal pay 967–8w
Equality and Human Rights Commission, Public relations 351–2w
Foster care 795w
Hollesley Bay Prison 116w
Legal Services Commission, Fees and charges 117w
Legislation, Government Equalities Office 1233w
National offender management information system 106–7w, 257w
Offences against the administration of justice 1242–6w
Offenders, Females 257w
Prison Service, Industrial disputes 622w
Prison Service, Manpower 275w
Prisoner escapes 123w
Prisoners, Children in care 801w
Prisoners, Females 115w
Prisoners, Mentally ill 118–9w
Prisoners' release 800w
Prisoners' release, Foreign nationals 800w
Prisoners' release, Homicide 116w
Prisons 452–60w
Prisons, Alcoholic drinks 124w
Prisons, Collective worship 801w
Prisons, Crimes of violence 789–91w
Prisons, Drugs 122–4w, 274–5w
Prisons, Education 128–9w
Prisons, North West 462w
Prisons, Overcrowding 274w
Prisons, Security 124–6w
Prisons, Smuggling 123–4w
Prisons, Television 1245w
Prisons, Training 459–61w
Prisons, Wales 275–6w
Probation 801–2w
Probation, Information and communications technology 118w
Probation, Wales 801–2w
Probation officers, South East 461–4w
Reoffenders 1246–8w
Sentencing 1241–2w, 1245w
Young offenders 1083–4w, 1239–40w
Young offenders, Children in care 1043–4w
Young offenders, Foster care 279–80w
Young offenders, Sentencing 129w
Young offenders, Social services 1248w
Young offenders, Training 803–4w
Youth offending teams, Finance 1248w

East coast railway line
384w
Rolling stock 543–4w

East Midlands
Bovine tuberculosis 8w
Broadband 369w

East of England
Birds of prey 645w
Health services 161w
Leisure 103w, 193–4w
Playing fields 193–4w
Population 841–2w
Swimming pools 193–4w
Vocational training 1100–1w

East Sussex
Health visitors 746w
Olympic Games 2012 102w
Raves 230w
Sheltered housing 308w
Speed limits 388–9w

East Sutton Park Prison
Prisoner escapes 115w

Eastbourne
Broadband 331–2w
Business 934w

EC action
Financial services 788–9
Fishing catches (08.12.2009) 267
Succession 140–1ws

EC grants and loans
Research 1346w
Wales 25w

EC institutions
Fines 26w, 576w

EC law
Air pollution 499
Criminal law 26w
Data protection 1387–8w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 939–40w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 685w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 60–1w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101–2w
Dept for Transport 970w
Dept of Health 476–7w
Electronic commerce 944–5w
Home Office 565w
Jersey 1241w
Medical equipment 341–2w
Ministry of Defence 831–2w
Ministry of Justice 433w
Renewable energy 1126w
River Tame 188–9w
Sickness benefits 248–9w, 786w
Treasury 52w
Waste disposal 655–6w
Water 20w, 656–7w

EC presidency
Spain 1038w

Economic growth
792–3

Economic situation
356, 800
Rural areas 495

Eco-towns
Biodiversity 301–2w

Education
Armed forces 1211w
Assessments 318w, 684–6w
English language (08.12.2009) 56–64wh, 509w, 1363w
International relations 317w
Palestinians 352w
Prisons 128–9w, 1363–4w

Educational visits
Dept for International Development 252–3w

Efford, Clive
Questions
Climate change, International cooperation 922w
Council housing, Construction 143–4
Hydrofluorocarbons 651–2w
Third sector, Finance 344
Unemployment, Young people 17–8

Elections
Armed forces 619w
Honduras 772–3w
Local government 1264w

Elective Home Education Review
see Home Education Independent Review

Electoral Commission
(07.12.2009) 123–4, (15.12.2009) 931
Conferences 1141–2w
Finance 152
Hotels 954w

Electoral Commission—continued*
Internet 893w
Leave 1w
Pay 1w

Electoral register
271w, 840w, 954w

Electric cables
Safety 938–9w
Schools 317w

Electric vehicles
508w

Electricity
1121–2w
Northern Ireland 1121w
Pensions 420w
Scotland 1121–2w

Electrification
Railways 42–3w, 962

Electronic commerce
EC law 944–5w

Electronic equipment
Cabinet Office 839w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1064w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 390w, 1265w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Dept for International Development 806w
Dept for Transport 380w, 630w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w
Dept of Health 739w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Leader of the House of Commons 979–80w
Ministry of Defence 1207w
Northern Ireland Office 1236–7w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Prime Minister 966w
Scotland Office 627w
Solicitor-General 889–90w

Electronic surveillance
Admissibility of evidence 31–2ws

Electronic warfare
1210–1w

Ellwood, Tobias
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 662
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 43, 49–50, 56, 59–60, 64, 74–80, 121
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 664, 696, 719–25
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 3–4wh, 10–4wh, 17wh, 19wh, 22wh
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 201w, 811w
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 201–2w, 361–2w
Armed forces, Compensation 363–4w
Gaming machines, Taxation 56–7w
Horserace Totalisator Board 193w
Service industries, Training 1095w
Terrorism, Compensation 278w
Tourism 965–6w
Tourism, Cumbria 195w

Embassies
Closures 237w

Emergency calls
1268w
Ambulance services 1309w
Fire services 585w

Employee benefit trusts
1007w

Employment
Leeds 1134–5w
Lone parents 596–8w
Mentally ill 9–10ws
Ministerial statements (15.12.2009) 818–33
North West 596–8w
Northern Ireland 531–2w

Employment agencies
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w

Employment and support allowance
246w, 1149w
Mentally ill 781w
Sight impaired 247w
Telephone services 781w

Employment schemes
595w
Gloucestershire 13

Employment services
Autism 19, 169–70w, 782w

Employment Tribunals Service
Crown Prosecution Service 1199w

Empty dwelling management orders
898w

Empty property
898w
Council tax 896w
Greater London 392w
Leeds 898w
Ministry of Defence 828w
Non-domestic rates 400–2w, 915w, 1301w
Rural areas 1307w
Shops 1307w
Tyne and Wear 392–3w

Energy
Agriculture 1377w
Armed forces 203w
Billing 928w
Cabinet Office 593–5w
Conservation 255w, 927w
Cybercrime 927w, 1340w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1352–4w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 678w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Disconnections 1122w, 1334–5w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Housing 131–2w, 324–7w, 420w, 906w, 1122w, 1283w, 1331w, 1380w
Meters 325w, 928–9w, 1335w
Military bases 99w
Ministry of Defence 827–8w
National policy statements 1335–6w
Prices 326w, 420–1w
Prime Minister 1253w
Schools 1071–2w
Solicitor-General 1003w
Treasury 848w, 1379w
York 324–6w

Energy and Climate Change Unit
939w

Energy Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
2R, Programme motion*, Money res* and Ways and means res* (07.12.2009) 41–123

Energy Saving Trust
Advertising 323–4w
Public relations 925w

Energy supply
926–7w

Enfield
Schools 698w

Engel, Natascha
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 199–200wh, 202–3wh, 207–9wh, 216wh
Questions
Business questions 509
Unemployment, Young people 1008w

Engineers
Agriculture 184w

English language
Education (08.12.2009) 56–64wh, 509w, 1363w

English Regions Network
Finance 1268w

English Sports Council
see Sport England

Ennis, Jeff
Questions
Children, Day care 1174w
Children's centres, Barnsley 1064w
Foreign investment in UK, Yorkshire and the Humber 355
Higher education, Barnsley 1359w
Invalid vehicles, Dangerous driving 108w
Roads, Accidents 638–9w

Entry clearances
719w, 723w, 1118w
Iran 1110–1w
Married people 226–7w
Overseas students (08.12.2009) 56–64wh, 74–6w, 221–3w, 625–6, 633–4, 711–2w, 719–20w, 723–4w
Pakistan 638, 720w, 1111w
Republic of Ireland 1111–2w
Skilled workers 1112–3w

Environment protection
British Indian Ocean Territory 356w

Environmental Permitting (England and Wales) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(09.12.2009) 415, 479–82

Equal pay
967–8w

Equalities Office
see Government Equalities Office

Equality
Disabled 19–20ws
Local government 898–9w, 1291w

Equality 2025
40–2ws

Equality and Human Rights Commission
Public relations 351–2w

Equality Commission for Northern Ireland see Northern Ireland Equality Commission

Equatorial Guinea
Human rights 237w

Equitable Life Assurance Society
20
Petitions (08.12.2009) 288, 295, 323, (10.12.2009) 17p, (14.12.2009) 23–34p, 772, (15.12.2009) 37p, 40–1p, (16.12.2009) 59–60p, 1069

Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review
126–7ws, 582w, 1380w

Essex
Business 1086w
Police 569–70w, 725–7w
Schools 317w
Unemployment 1150–3w

Estate agents
Money laundering 510–1w, 606–7w, 1362w

Estimates days
Higher education (10.12.2009) 529–72, 606
Local government (10.12.2009) 573–606

Ethiopia
Overseas aid 139–40ws

EU Agriculture and Fisheries Council
23ws

EU battlegroups
210w

EU Competitiveness Council
43–4ws

EU Economic and Financial Affairs Council
125–6ws

EU Education, Youth and Culture Council
22–3ws, 128–9ws

EU Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council
6–9ws

EU Foreign Affairs Council
3–6ws, 102–5ws

EU General Affairs Council
3–6ws, 102–5ws

EU Justice and Home Affairs Council
15–9ws

EU Transport, Telecommunications and Energy Council 44–6ws, 100–1ws, 120–2ws

Eurocorps
832w

European Charter of Local Self-government
1289w

European Council
Ministerial statements (14.12.2009) 641–63

European Union Membership (Referendum) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 980

Evans, Mr Nigel
Westminster Hall Debates
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 73–8wh, 86wh
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 814w, 826w
Bank services, Fees and charges 50w
Business questions 515
Carbon emissions 1120w
Children, Abuse 146w
Dairy farming 492–3
EC institutions, Fines 26w, 576w
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure 210w
General elections 965

Evans, Mr Nigel—continued*
HIV infection, Circumcision 158–9w
HIV infection, Health education 159w
Home care services 554w
Prisoner escapes 123w
Renewable energy, Developing countries 134w
Royal Mail, Pay 48w
Shoplifting 232w
Social services 295–6w

Evennett, David
Chamber Debates
Oral question time intervention (07.12.2009) 18
Questions
Adult education, Finance 1345w
Apprentices 330w, 1345–6w
Apprentices, Bexley 502w, 1085–6w
Banks, Competition 799
Building colleges for the future programme 503w, 511w
Charities, Regulation 350w
Council housing, Property transfer 918–9w
Council tax, Valuation 580–1w
Dartford-Thurrock Crossing, Tolls 1159–60w
Domestic waste, Waste disposal 974–5w
Empty property, Greater London 392w
Fly tipping, Bexley 650w
Fly tipping, Rivers 501–2
Further education 339w
Further education, Crimes of violence 511w
Further education, Foundation degrees 511w
Further education, Standards 340w
Higher education, Admissions 1370–2w
Higher education, Finance 1094–5w
Learning and Skills Council for England 512–3w
NHS, Information and communications technology 28
Overseas students, Entry clearances 625
Power failures 1125w
Pupils, Greater London 1071w
Regeneration, Bexley 404w
Registration of births deaths marriages and civil partnerships, Bexley 1136–7w

Excise duties
Alcoholic drinks 582w
Beer 254w
Fuels 629w, 1382w
Motor vehicles 198–9w, 1380w
Oil 405w
Scotland 629w

Exercise
283w, 477w

Exhaust emissions
Aviation 1154–6w
Motor vehicles 1159w, 1167w
Official cars 971w
Transport 1169–70w

Export credit guarantees
338w

Exports
Ammunition 338–9w

Exservicemen
Radiation exposure 97–8w, 205w, 210w, (10.12.2009) 610–8

Extracurricular activities
686–8w, 1066–7w

Extradition
415w
USA 627–8, 636–7

Eyesight
Testing 156w

Fabricant, Michael
Questions
Air pollution, EC law 499
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 498–9
Public expenditure 793–4

Faith schools
Community relations 678w

Fallon, Mr Michael
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 35
Questions
Business, Government assistance 782–3
Business questions 511

Families
Advisory services 314–5w

Family and Parenting Institute
141–2w

Family intervention projects
424–5w

Family nurse partnership programme
744w

Fares
Bus services 1155–6w
Railways 1165w

Farron, Timothy
Chamber Debates
Floods, Cumbria (08.12.2009) 329
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 4–6w, 184–5w
Animal welfare 6w
Bees, Imports 7w
Biodiversity 7w
Biofuels 8w
Bovine tuberculosis, Vaccination 9–10w
Dairy farming, Cooperatives 11–2w
Drinking water, Standards 12–3w
Fish, Procurement 975–6w
Flood control 14w
Flood control, Expenditure 13–4w
Floods, Property development 402–3w
Food, Origin marking 489
Food, Procurement 14w
Forests, Climate change 485
Hill farming, Manpower 14–5w
Livestock, Animal welfare 188w
Nitrate vulnerable zones 15–6w
Poultry 17w
Recycling, Christmas cards 977w
Recycling, Christmas trees 977w
Sewers, Private sector 190–1w
Sheep, Conservation 18–9w
Tourism 104w
White fish, Quotas 535–6w

Featherstone, Lynne
Questions
Accident and emergency departments, Greater London 1308w
Food Strategy Task Force 595–6w

Females
Crimes of violence 562–3w, 565w, 636, 715w
Health professions 477–8w
Legal profession 436w
Offenders 61–2ws, 257w
Prisoners 115w, 118–9w
UN agencies 808w, 810w

Ferries
Safety 1162w

Fetes
988w

Fibromyalgia
477w

Field, Rt Hon Frank
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 394–7, 399, 401, 425
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 381
Questions
Immigration controls 220–2w
National insurance contributions, Foreign workers 53–4w
Navy, Discharges 99w
Unemployment, Young people 2
Work permits 75w

Field, Mr Mark
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 313
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 201wh, 205–7wh
Questions
Local government finance 1290w
Ordnance Survey 916w, 997w
Public expenditure, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1172w
Public sector, Information 948–50w

Fifteen minutes rule
Rulings and statements (15.12.2009) 852, (16.12.2009) 983

Fiji
Politics and government 26–7w

Film
Israel 529w

Financial services
25ws, 52w
EC action 788–9
Regulation 405w, 785–6, 1007w
Rural areas 496–7

Financial Services Authority
Public relations 850w

Fines
619–20w
EC institutions 26w, 576w
Speed limits 233w

Fire extinguishers
Housing 911w

Fire prevention
298w, 302–3w, 584–5w, 590–1w, 1271w
Rented housing (15.12.2009) 239–46wh

Fire Service College
ICE 987w, 994w

Fire services
141–2, 585w, 899w, 988–9w, 1268–9w
Contracts 900w
Emergency calls 585w
Finance 585–90w, 900–1w, 1269w
Floods 187w
Manpower 589–90w
Risk assessment 1269–70w
Standards 302w
Vehicles 1271w
Working hours 1358w

Firearms
223–4w
Bermuda 1024w
West Yorkshire Police 1118–9w

Fires
Death 901w

Firing ranges
Shoeburyness 836w

First time buyers
992w

Fiscal policy
845–6w, 1379–80w

Fiscal Responsibility Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (09.12.2009) 387
Written Statements
21ws
Questions
961

Fish
Procurement 975–6w

Fisher, Mr Mark
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 198–205wh

Fishing catches
1142w
EC action (08.12.2009) 267

Fitzpatrick, Jim, Minister of State, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs
Written Statements
Animals, Disease control 101ws
Questions
Agriculture, Engineers 184w
Agriculture, Subsidies 4–6w, 184–5w, 187w, 491–2, 497–8, 503
Agriculture, Wales 6w
Air pollution, EC law 499
Animal welfare 6w
Animal welfare, Circuses 6–7w
Biodiversity 7w
Biofuels, Boilers 154w
Bovine tuberculosis, Disease control 8–9w, 495–6
Bovine tuberculosis, Vaccination 9–10w
Dairy farming 492–3
Dairy farming, Cooperatives 11–2w
Dangerous dogs 186–8w
Dogs, Animal welfare 499–500
Drinking water, Standards 12–3w
Fixed penalties, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Flood control 14w
Flood control, Expenditure 13–4w
Food, Origin marking 487–90, 494, 497, 534w
Food, Procurement 14w
Food supply 650w
Hill farming, Manpower 14–5w
Horticulture, Research 15–6w
Hydrofluorocarbons 651w
Inland waterways, Ports 16–7w
Livestock, Animal welfare 188w
Nature conservation, Crime 16w
Nitrate vulnerable zones 15–6w
Organic farming 379w, 652w
Origin marking, Israel 653w
Poultry 17w
Poultry, Animal welfare 501
Primates, Sales 17–8w
Ritual slaughter 502
Rural Payments Agency, Manpower 189–90w
Sewers, Private sector 18w
Sheep, Conservation 18–9w
Water, EC law 20w

Fixed penalties
Antisocial behaviour 611w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Driving offences 76w
Royal parks 115–6w

Flexible working
Wales 410–1w

Flint, Rt Hon Caroline
Questions
Child care vouchers 846w

Flood and Water Management Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
2R, Programme motion* and Money res* (15.12.2009) 835–907

Flood control
14w, 500, 536–7w, [illegible], 1254w
Expenditure 13–4w, 377–8w

Flood Risk Regulations 2009
Questions
1142w

Flooding Lessons Learned Review
101–2ws

Floods
536w, 902w
Cumbria (08.12.2009) 327–36, 346, 902w, 990w
Fire services 187w
Housing 905–7w, 1272w
Property development 145–7, 402–3w, 1142–3w, 1302w
Schools 698w
York 898

Fly tipping
Bexley 650w
Rivers 501–2

Flynn, Paul
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 653
Defence (15.12.2009) 809
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 926–8
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 1–10wh, 13wh, 18–9wh, 21wh
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 637
Nuclear power stations, Public consultation 421–2w
Publications, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555–6w
Western Sahara, Human rights 361w
Western Sahara, Politics and government 359w

Follett, Barbara, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State and Minister for the East of England, Dept for Communities and Local Government
Chamber Debates
Birmingham City Council, Accountancy (16.12.2009) 1076–80
Local government (10.12.2009) 603–6
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 257–9
Questions
Absenteeism, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Bellwin scheme 393–5w
Buildings, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1264–5w
Chief information officers, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265–6w
Christmas, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1261–2w
Community assets programme 895w
Community development 982w

Follett, Barbara, —continued
Conferences, Dept for Communities and Local Government 896–7w, 985–6w
Council tax 60w, 984–5w
Council tax, Empty property 896w
EC law, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60–1w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390w, 1265w
Empty property, Greater London 392w
Empty property, Leeds 898w
Empty property, Tyne and Wear 392–3w
Fetes 988w
Floods, Cumbria 990w
Freedom of information, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390–1w
Home care services 396–7w, 913w
Hotels, Dept for Communities and Local Government 395w
ICE, Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w, 994w
Internet, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w, 897w
Litter, Private roads 994w
Local government 911–2w
Local government, Equality 898–9w
Local government, Fees and charges 1290–1w
Local government, Pensions 994w, 1291–2w
Local government, Per capita costs 1292–4w
Local government, Reorganisation 994–5w
Local government, Standards 995w
Local government finance 65w, 397w, 912–3w, 984–5w, 1289–90w, 1302–3w
Local government finance, Bury 396w
Local government finance, Chorley 397–8w
Local government finance, Lichfield 63–4w
Manpower, Dept for Communities and Local Government 897w
Non-domestic rates 65–6w, 396w, 398–400w, 1297–8w
Non-domestic rates, Churches 996w
Non-domestic rates, Empty property 400–2w, 1301w
Non-domestic rates, Greater London 996w, 1298–300w
Non-domestic rates, Ports 1300w
Non-domestic rates, Public libraries 996w
Non-domestic rates, Sports 591w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 147–8, 150–1, 297w, 402w, 996–7w
Official hospitality, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Paper, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390w
Parking, Fees and charges 66w
Pay, Dept for Communities and Local Government 986w, 1266w
Procurement, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265w
Public expenditure, Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w
Publicity, Dept for Communities and Local Government 897–8w
Regeneration, Bexley 404w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1000w
Scientists, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Security, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w
Sheltered housing 66w

Follett, Barbara,—continued
Standards, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1266w
Training, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1267w
Vacant land 1001–2w
Written questions, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391–2w, 1267w

Food
Dept for Transport 32–3w
Hospitals 1050w
Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Origin marking 487–90, 494, 497, 534w
Procurement 14w
Research 493–4

Food Standards Agency
Conferences 1317w
Hotels 1049w
Internet 1049w
Public relations 742–3w

Food Strategy Task Force
595–6w

Food supply
650w

Foreign and Commonwealth Office
Afghanistan 1221–2w
Assets 236w
Buildings 25w, 1026–7w, 1223w
Caparo Group 1222w
Capita 235w
Carbon emissions 1026w
Christmas 1025–6w
Conferences 1026w
Contracts 1223w
Cost effectiveness 1027w, 1224–5w
Electronic equipment 1028w
Energy 1028w
Freedom of information 1224w
Hakluyt 1033–4w
Historic buildings 772w
Hotels 1034w
Information officers 356w
Internet 1028–9w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 238w
Manpower 1029w, 1224w
Middle East 771–2w
Official gifts 1225w
Official hospitality 1029w
Olympic Games 2012 1036w
Public expenditure 240–1w
Publicity 575w
Recruitment 25w, 575w
Scientific advisers 242w
Security 772w
Sick leave 1030w
South Asia 771–2w
Standards 1030w
Taxis 1030–1w
Telephone services 1031w
Trade unions 1038–9w
Training 1031w, 1225w
Travel 1225–6w
Written questions 1031–2w

Foreign investment in UK
Yorkshire and the Humber 355

Foreign nationals
Offenders 76–7w
Prisoners' release 23w, 800w

Foreign workers
963, 1113w
National insurance 176w
National insurance contributions 53–4w

Forestry Commission
Internet 976w

Forests
537w

Forests—continued
Climate change 484–5
Disease control 650–1w
West Midlands 538w

Foster, Mr Don
Questions
Anabolic steroids 559–60w
Fraud, Credit cards 224–5w
Government, Assets 671w
Government Art Collection 670–1w
Horserace Totalisator Board 1171w
Licensed premises 373w
Music, Finance 102w
Olympic Games 2012, Culture 1219–20w
Teachers, Arts 1078–84w

Foster, Mr Michael (Worcester), Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for International Development*
Questions
Africa, Water 252w
Art works, Dept for International Development 978w
Buildings, Dept for International Development 805w
Conferences, Dept for International Development 806w
Developing countries, Slavery 809w
Educational visits, Dept for International Development 252–3w
Electronic equipment, Dept for International Development 806w
Freedom of information, Dept for International Development 806w
Internet, Dept for International Development 806w
Manpower, Dept for International Development 1342w
Official hospitality, Dept for International Development 807w
Overseas aid 253w, 979w
Palestinians, Education 352w
Palestinians, Overseas aid 353w, 1343–5w
Pay, Dept for International Development 1342–3w
South East Asia, Tuberculosis 353w
Sri Lanka, Internally displaced people 353–4w
Telephone services, Dept for International Development 549w
Training, Dept for International Development 807–8w
UN agencies, Females 808w, 810w
Written questions, Dept for International Development 352w

Foster, Mr Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye), Parliamentary Secretary to the Government Equalities Office*
Questions
Christmas, Government Equalities Office 578w
Dalits, Discrimination 578w
Information officers, Government Equalities Office 967w
Operating costs, Government Equalities Office 578w
Public expenditure, Government Equalities Office 251w
Security, Government Equalities Office 578–9w
Written questions, Government Equalities Office 967w

Foster care
687w, 795w
Young offenders 279–80w

Foundation degrees
Further education 511w

Fox, Dr Liam
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 804–5
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 969–71
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 811–2w, 1201w
Afghanistan, Dept for International Development 804w
Afghanistan, Overseas aid 134–5w
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 88w, 361w, 814–5w, 1202w
Afghanistan, Population 354w
Air force, Deployment 202w, 955–6w
Aircraft carriers 202w
Armed forces 816–20w
Armed forces, Absence without leave 202–3w
Armed forces, Cadets 955–7w, 1205–6w
Armed forces, Postal services 1365w
Armed forces, Treaties 819w
Defence, Procurement 1207–8w
Defence equipment 206–8w
EU battlegroups 210w
HMS Endurance 98w
Improvised explosive devices 833w
Iraq, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 340–1w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 98w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Ministry of Defence 834w
Joint rapid reaction force 1212w
Middle East, Armed conflict 834w
NATO response force 99w
Piracy 638w
Royal Naval Reserve 212w
Somalia 1038w
Standards, Ministry of Defence 1208w
Territorial Army 99–100w
University Officer Training Corps 836–8w

Francis, Dr Hywel
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 916–7

Francois, Mr Mark
Questions
Armed forces, Homelessness 962

Fraser, Christopher
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 812
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 837–8, 850
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 695, 699, 726
Questions
Financial services, EC action 788
Fire services 141–2
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 150

Fraud
Charities 1249w
Councillors 1264w
Credit cards 224–5w
Housing benefit 992w
Internet 1113–4w
Plea bargaining 1246w
Social security benefits 16–7
Student Loans Company 1365–7w
Telephone services 49w

"Fraud Report 2008–09"
94ws

Free school meals
688–9w, 1067w
Leeds 1066w

Free school meals—continued
Sixth form education 687–8w

Freedom of information
33ws, 351w, (14.12.2009) 774–80
Academies 433–4w
Cabinet Office 342–3, 839w, 1253w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1354–5w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 390–1w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Dept for International Development 806w
Dept for Transport 630w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923–4w
Dept of Health 282w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224w
Home Office 1105w
Local government 913w
Ministry of Defence 826w
Ministry of Justice 792w
Network Rail 620w
Northern Ireland Office 660w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Scotland Office 520w
Treasury 848–9w

"Freedom of Information Act 2000 Statistics on Implementation in Central Government July to September 2009"
116ws

Freight
940w
Roads 1167w

Fuel oil
Renewable energy 422w

Fuel poverty
132–3w, 356, 795w, 929w
Pensioners 1122–3w, 1336w

Fuels
Excise duties 629w, 1382w
Motor vehicles 31–2w
Railways 45w

Further education
330w, 339w
Admissions 607w
Crimes of violence 511w
Disabled 501w
Foundation degrees 511w
Learning disability 501w
Standards 340w
Teachers 1093–4w
Transport 1364–5w

Future Jobs Fund
18, 840w

G20
Spain 347, 711w

Gaddafi, Saif al-Islam
345w

Gale, Mr Roger
Questions
Holiday accommodation, Overseas visitors 193w
Sickness benefits, EC law 248–9w, 786w

Gambling Commission
371–2w, 1171w
Public relations 370–1w
Travel 670w

Gaming machines
Taxation 56–7w, 1383w

Gapes, Mike
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 651

Garages and petrol stations
Non-domestic rates 1381w

Gardiner, Mr Barry
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 229, 235, 238, 246

Garnier, Mr Edward
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (09.12.2009) 467
Questions
Convictions 860–2w
Crown Prosecution Service 861–90w, 1176–200w
Crown Prosecution Service, Employment Tribunals Service 1199w
Driving offences 882–3w
Offences against the administration of justice 1242–6w
Terrorism 892w
Terrorism, USA 181w

Gas and Electricity Markets Authority
Conferences 1336w
Hotels 929–30w
Internet 1333w
Public relations 929w

Gas fired power stations
Carbon emissions 1336–7w

Gas supply
see Natural gas

Gastrointestinal cancer
Surgery (09.12.2009) 472–8, 759–60w

Gauke, David
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 446–8
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 303
Questions
Police, Bureaucracy 623–4
Public expenditure 789–90
Spain, G20 711w

Gaza
see Palestinians

GCSE
143w, 689–90w
Citizenship 139–40w
Greater London 690–1w
History 139–40w
North East 315–6w
Young offenders 143–4w

Gender identity disorder
Prisoners 283–4w

Gender recognition panels
464–5w

General elections
965, 966–7w

General practitioners
(16.12.2009) 268–76wh
Pharmacy 1321w
Training 1066w

General Social Care Council
284w

Genetics
58ws

George, Andrew
Chamber Debates
Gastroint[illegible]ancer, Surgery (09.12.20[illegible]) 473
Questions
British Indian Ocean Territory, Environment protection 356w
Competition Commission 1350–1w

Geothermal power
1337w

Gerrard, Mr Neil
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 302
Questions
Crimes of violence, Females 636
Knives, Crime 563w
Stop and search, Greater London 85–6w
Taxis, Guide dogs 972–3w

Gibraltar
Territorial waters 1032–3w

Gidley, Sandra
Westminster Hall Debates
British Forces Post Office (09.12.2009) 136–42wh
Questions
Arthritis, Health services 466–7w
Land use, Agriculture 149
Musculoskeletal disorders, Health services 153w
NHSU 494w
Non-domestic rates 396w
Pharmacy 494w
Teachers, South East 150w

Gift aid
[illegible]35w

Gifted children
Kent 691–2w
Milton Keynes 316w
Secondary education 425–32w

Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 304–5
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 910–4
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 177–81wh, 185wh, 190wh, 195wh, 197wh
Questions
Agriculture, Wales 6w, 185–6w
Defence Training College 52w
EC grants and loans, Wales 25w
Home education 144w
Manpower, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
NHS, Finance 286w
NHS, Redundancy 489w
Speed limits, Cameras 640w
Transport, Wales 631–3w
Welsh language 2w

Gilroy, Linda
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 808
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 891–3
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1043–6
Questions
Cost effectiveness, Ministry of Defence 1210w
Offences against children 960–1

Gilroy, Linda*—continued*
Private rented housing 133–4

Gloucestershire
Employment schemes 13
Secondary education 149w

Goggins, Rt Hon Paul, Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office
Written Statements
"Independent Reviewer of the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Act 2007 Report 2008–09" 62–3ws
Questions
Buildings, Northern Ireland Office 968w
Capita, Northern Ireland Office 20–1w
Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice for Northern Ireland, Public relations 659–60w
Children, Abuse 1234w
Christmas, Northern Ireland Office 530w, 1234–5w
Conferences, Northern Ireland Office 1235–6w
Consultants, Northern Ireland Office 182w
Crime prevention, Northern Ireland 947–8
Crimes of violence, Northern Ireland 183–4w, 660w
Criminal investigation, Northern Ireland 1233–4w
Driving offences, Northern Ireland 663–4w
Electronic equipment, Northern Ireland Office 1236–7w
Employment, Northern Ireland 531–2w
Freedom of information, Northern Ireland Office 660w
Hotels, Northern Ireland Office 1238w
Human trafficking, Northern Ireland 1234w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Northern Ireland Office 22w
Irish language 531–2w
Legislation, Northern Ireland Office 21w
Magilligan Prison 23–4w, 183w
Offenders, Deportation 533w
Pay, Northern Ireland Office 21–2w
Police, Northern Ireland 374–5w
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Finance 969w
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Recruitment 949–51
Presbyterian Mutual Society 1233w
Prisoners' release, Foreign nationals 23w
Prisons, Northern Ireland 951–2
Public expenditure, Northern Ireland Office 22w
Publicity, Northern Ireland Office 968–9w
Racially aggravated offences, Northern Ireland 183w
Security, Northern Ireland Office 182–3w
Sick leave, Northern Ireland Office 1237w
Taxis, Northern Ireland Office 1237–8w
Telephone services, Northern Ireland Office 661–2w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 533w, 969w, 1239w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 375–6w
Written questions, Government responses 1239w
Written questions, Northern Ireland Office 661–3w

Goldsworthy, Julia
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 216, 221, 227, 234–43, 245
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 381

Goldsworthy, Julia*—continued*
Questions
Fires, Death 901w
Mortgages, Government assistance 136–7

Goodman, Helen, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Work and Pensions
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 418–24, 440–3, 445, 448, 452–4
Westminster Hall Debates
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 250wh, 264–7wh
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 168–76wh
Questions
Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission, Information and communications technology 1009w
Child rearing 1009–10w
Children, Maintenance 19–20, 167–8w, 242–3w, 1010–2w
Cold weather payments, Derbyshire 1011w
Council tax benefits 1263–4w
Crisis loans 408w, 1011–2w
Housing benefit 11, 13–4, 19, 782–4w, 1014w
Housing benefit, Fraud 992w
Housing benefit, Islington 1014–5w
In work credit, Lone parents 784w
Mortgages, Government assistance 784w, 788w
Post office card account, Castle Point 1019–20w
Poverty, Children 837–9w
Social security benefits 786–7w, 1020–1w

Goodman, Mr Paul
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 318
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 183–6wh
Questions
Mortgages, Government assistance 137

Goodwill, Robert
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 41, 65, 70–1, 81, 84–90
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 937–8
Questions
Housing benefit 13–4
Information and communications technology, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 646w
Information and communications technology, Dept for Transport 1160w

Gove, Michael
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 763
Questions
British Educational Communications and Technology Agency, Finance 1066w
Curriculum 1069w
GCSE 143w
Graduates, Science 1358–60w
Pupil exclusions 146w
Teachers, Armed forces 707w
Teachers, Males 707w
Teachers, Science 707–8w
Teachers, Training 708–9w

Government
Assets 151, 671w

Government Actuary's Department
Hotels 850w
Internet 851w

Government Art Collection
670–1w

Government Chief Scientific Adviser
Cabinet Office 351w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 49w
Ministry of Justice 276w
Prime Minister 2w
Treasury 56w

Government Communications
Home Office 415w

Government Communications Review
1254–5w

Government departments
Information and communications technology 132w, 1255w
Standards 1381–2w
Telephone services 1255–6w
Training 515w

Government Equalities Office
Christmas 578w
Information officers 967w
Legislation 1233w
Operating costs 578w
Public expenditure 251w
Security 578–9w
Written questions 967w

Government Hospitality
Wines 1033w

Government Office for London
61–3w

Government Office for the East of England
Training 1272w

Government responses
Written questions 547w, 709w, 788w, 1043w, 1139w, 1239w, 1324–5w, 1394w

Graduates
941–3w
Nurses 161w
Science 1358–60w
Unemployment 599–600w, 1361–2w
Work experience 1359w

Grandparents
Child tax credit 579w
Welfare tax credits 857–8w

Gray, Mr James
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 816
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 305
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 974
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 816w
Air force, Military bases 1215w
Forests, Climate change 4[illegible]4
Natural gas, Planning permission 141
RAF Lyneham 1217w

Grayling, Chris
Questions
Assaults on police 1386w
Convictions 790w
Crime 1240w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 626
Identity cards 77w
Identity cards, Greater Manchester 77w
Immigration controls 723w
Information and communications technology, Home Office 716w
Knives, Sentencing 276–7w

Grayling, Chris—continued*
National Policing Improvement Agency, Public relations 1115–6w
Passports, Fees and charges 416w
Prisoners' release, Foreign nationals 800w
Young offenders 1084w, 1239–40w

Greater London
Accident and emergency departments 280w, 738w, 1308w
Agency nurses 758–9w
Aviation 28–9w
Council housing 918–9w
Empty property 392w
GCSE 690–1w
Health services 478w, 757w
Hearing aids 747w
Homelessness 1274–8w
Hospital beds 1317w
Housing 303–4w
Intensive care 747w
Non-domestic rates 996w, 1298–300w
Pension credit 785–6w
Private rented housing 1000w
Pupils 1071w
Railway stations 40–2w
Stop and search 85–6w
Winter fuel payments 785–6w
Youth services 151–2w

Greater London Select Committee
see London Select Committee

Greater Manchester
Domestic violence 612w
Identity cards 77w
NHS walk-in centres 355

Green, Mr Damian
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 290
Questions
Affordable housing, Kent 893w
Asylum 68w
Asylum, Legal aid 272–3w
Bankruptcy, Kent 331w
Burglary, Kent 215–6w
Business questions 511
Detention centres 1390w
DNA, Databases 622–3
Gifted children, Kent 691–2w
Hunting Act 2004, Prosecutions 434w
Mortgages, Government assistance 914–5w
National identity register 77w
Physical education, Kent 693w
Public transport, Crimes of violence 38w
Remand in custody, Ashford Kent 464w
Serious Organised Crime Agency, Manpower 1116–7w
Special educational needs 673–4w
UK Border Agency 727–32w, 1118w
Unemployment, Young people 600–1w
Warm front scheme, Kent 328–9w

Green belt
902w, 990w

Greening, Justine
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 42
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 242, 255–7
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 748–53
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 386
Public sector (07.12.2009) 36
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 164
Questions
Freedom of information, Cabinet Office 343

Greening, Justine—continued*
Government Office for London 61–3w
Non-domestic rates 65–6w, 398–400w, 799
Non-domestic rates, Empty property 400–2w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 405–6w
Police, Bureaucracy 623–4
Public expenditure 789
Railway stations, Greater London 40–2w
Rolling stock 45w

Grieve, Mr Dominic
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 186–9wh, 191wh
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 26wh, 35wh
Questions
Ashwell Prison 1039–40w
Correctional Services Accreditation Panel 788–9w
Driving offences 220w
Electoral register 271w
Gender recognition panels 464–5w
Henry VIII Clauses 271–2w
Hunting Act 2004, Prosecutions 434w
Judicial Diversity Advisory Panel 431–2w
Monarchy, Succession 273w
Offenders, Rehabilitation 440–52w
Pathogens Access Appeals Commission 451–2w
Prisoners, Suicide 1042w
Prisoners' release 800–1w
Prisoners' release, Foreign nationals 23w
Prisons, Visits 1043w
Repatriation, Asylum 1043w
Sexual offences, Rehabilitation 277–8w
Victims' Advisory Panel 625–6w

Griffith, Nia
Questions
Biofuels 1325–6w
Biofuels, Power stations 921w

Griffiths, Nigel
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 657
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 41–2, 51
Questions
Autism 736w
National Geoscience Data Centre 925w, 945w, 1123w

Grocery Market Ombudsman Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 978

Grogan, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 45
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 894–7
Questions
Renewable energy 1125w

Group of Twenty see G20

Guardianship
Children in care 694–5w

Guide dogs
Taxis 972–3w

Gummer, Rt Hon John
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 216
Questions
Hollesley Bay Prison 116w

Gurkhas
Pensions 205w

Gwynne, Andrew
Chamber Debates
Debt Relief (Developing Countries) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 978
Questions
Insolvency 797
Welfare tax credits 406–7w

Hague, Rt Hon William
Questions
Bosnia and Herzegovina, Judiciary 1025w
Buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026–7w
Climate change, International cooperation 957–8
Cost effectiveness, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224–5w
Iran, Sanctions 959
Manpower, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1029w
Middle East, Armed conflict 1229w
Middle East, Peace negotiations 958
Overseas price mechanism 241w
Peacekeeping operations, Finance 1230–1w
Public expenditure, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 240–1w
Training, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225w

Hain, Rt Hon Peter, Secretary of State for Wales*
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 908–10
Written Statements
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Transport) Order 2010 66ws
Questions
Billing, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w
Buildings, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Chief information officers, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Christmas, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Conferences, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w, 1140w
Electronic equipment, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Freedom of information, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Hotels, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w
Internet, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Legislation, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w
Manpower, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Official hospitality, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Out of area treatment, Wales 644w
Pay, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w, 1140–1w
Publicity, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Security, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Sick leave, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w
Training, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w, 981w
Welsh language 2w

Hain, Rt Hon Peter,—continued
Written questions, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 349w, 1141w

Hakluyt
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1033–4w

Hall, Mr Mike
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 863–7

Hamilton, David
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 813
Questions
National Geoscience Data Centre 945w

Hammond, Mr Philip
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 31–2
Public sector, Points of order (07.12.2009) 40
Questions
Art works, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Art works, Dept for International Development 978w
Art works, Dept of Health 1312–3w
Art works, Home Office 1388w
Art works, Ministry of Defence 827w
Child Trust Fund 847w
Christmas, Cabinet Office 350w
Christmas, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 677–8w
Christmas, Home Office 714–5w
Christmas, Northern Ireland Office 968w
Financial services, Regulation 785–6
Fiscal policy 845–6w, 1379–80w
Official hospitality, Cabinet Office 1132w
Official hospitality, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Official hospitality, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 191–2w
Official hospitality, Dept for International Development 807w
Official hospitality, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1029w
Official hospitality, Ministry of Defence 366w
Official hospitality, Ministry of Justice 793w
Official hospitality, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Official hospitality, Scotland Office 526w
Pay, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 647w
Pay, Home Office 716–7w
Procurement, Home Office 1389w
Publicity, Cabinet Office 1133w
Publicity, Dept for Communities and Local Government 897–8w
Publicity, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Publicity, Dept for International Development 807w
Publicity, Dept for Transport 1161w
Publicity, Dept of Health 743w
Publicity, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 575w
Publicity, Home Office 1108w
Publicity, Ministry of Defence 831w
Publicity, Northern Ireland Office 968–9w
Publicity, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Publicity, Revenue and Customs 854w
Publicity, Scotland Office 526w
Sick leave, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 528–9w

Hammond, Mr Philip*—continued*
Sick leave, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030w
Sick leave, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Sick leave, Northern Ireland Office 1237w
Sick leave, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w
Sick leave, Scotland Office 628w
Sick leave, Treasury 849w
Training, Cabinet Office 1254w
Training, Dept for International Development 1343w
Training, Dept of Health 1314–6w
Training, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w
Training, Home Office 1389w
Training, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Training, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w
Training, Scotland Office 628w
Training, Treasury 850w

Hammond, Stephen
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 294
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 750, 756, 762
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 58wh
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 27wh, 42–5wh
Questions
Road traffic control 638w

Hampstead
Children's centres 313w
Pre-school education 1173–4w
Sure start programme 313w

Hancock, Mr Mike
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 814
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (16.12.2009) 1071
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 996, 998, 1027–32
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 810w
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 814w
Armed forces, Health 820–1w

Hands, Greg
Questions
Blair, Rt Hon Tony 967w
Electronic equipment, Cabinet Office 839w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1064w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Electronic equipment, Dept for International Development 806w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Transport 630w
Electronic equipment, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w
Electronic equipment, Dept of Health 739w
Electronic equipment, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w

Hands, Greg*—continued*
Electronic equipment, Leader of the House of Commons 979–80w
Electronic equipment, Ministry of Defence 1207w
Electronic equipment, Northern Ireland Office 1236–7w
Electronic equipment, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Electronic equipment, Prime Minister 966w
Electronic equipment, Scotland Office 627w
Electronic equipment, Solicitor-General 889–90w

Hanson, Rt Hon David, Minister of State, Home Office
Written Statements
Anti-terrorism control orders 108–10ws
Closed circuit television 113–4ws
Community safety accreditation schemes 107–8ws
Questions
Community relations 727w
Counter-terrorism 84–5w, 629–30
Counter-terrorism, Expenditure 75–6w
Crimes of violence 70–2w
DNA, Databases 74w, 564w
Driving offences, Fixed penalties 76w
EC law, Home Office 565w
Government Communications, Home Office 415w
Hunting 416w
Independent Police Complaints Commission 566w
Independent Police Complaints Commission, Labour turnover 724w
Independent Police Complaints Commission, Pay 1393w
Internet, Security 1115w
Members, Correspondence 79w
National Policing Improvement Agency 79–80w
National Policing Improvement Agency, Public appointments 416–7w
Offenders 725w
Police, Bureaucracy 623–5, 633
Police, Databases 799–800w
Police, Essex 570w, 725–7w
Police, Learning disability 80–3w
Police, Manpower 631–3
Police, Reorganisation 569w
Police, Skin piercing 1392–3w
Police community support officers 619–20
Police community support officers, North Yorkshire 725w
Political parties, Conferences 83–4w
Prostitution 631–2
Radicalism, Civil servants 417w
Stop and search, Greater London 85–6w
Stop and search, Young people 570w
Terrorism, Detainees 85w
West Yorkshire Police, Firearms 1118–9w

Harlow
Homes and Communities Agency 63w

Harman, Rt Hon Harriet, Leader of the House of Commons, Lord Privy Seal, Secretary of State for Equality and Minister for Women
Written Statements
Legislation 117–8ws
Members, Allowances 33–8ws
Members, Pensions 118ws
Questions
Administration of justice 964
Armed forces, Homelessness 962
Ayrshire 1139w

Harman, Rt Hon Harriet,—continued
British Airways, Industrial disputes 956
Building schools for the future programme 963
Bus services 964
Business, Regulation 965–6
Business statements 505–17
Cheques 964
Child Trust Fund 961
Climate change, International cooperation 956–8, 963
Fiscal Responsibility Bill 2009–10 961
Foreign workers 963
General elections 965
Iran, Sanctions 959
Knives, Crime 962
Middle East, Peace negotiations 958
Ministers, Pay 961
Money lenders 959
Offences against children 960–1
Official engagements, Prime Minister 956
Planning permission, Pyestock 962–4
Railways, Electrification 962
Tax avoidance 960

Harper, Mark
Chamber Debates
Disabled, Social security benefits (08.12.2009) 201–4, 206–7
Questions
Badgers 7w
Disability living allowance 779w
Disabled, Further education 501w
Disabled, Social security benefits 7–8, 410–2w, 767w
Disabled, Students 1098w, 1371w
Economic growth 792–3
Employment and support allowance, Sight impaired 247w
Incapacity benefit 247–8w
Invalid vehicles, Insurance 35w
New deal schemes 525w
Pensioners, Social security benefits 787–8w
Social services, Public consultation 1058–9w
Work capability assessment 780–1w
Written questions, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1357w
Written questions, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1267w
Written questions, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 670w
Written questions, Dept for Transport [illegible]w
Written questions, Dept of Health 1047w
Written questions, Government Equalities Office 967w
Written questions, Government responses 788w
Written questions, Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Written questions, Ministry of Defence 959–60w
Written questions, Northern Ireland Office 662–3w
Written questions, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1141w
Written questions, Scotland Office 628–9w
Written questions, Solicitor-General 1004w

Harris, Dr Evan
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 405–8, 426, 437–9, 445–6
Higher education (10.12.2009) 533, 541
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 202–3wh

Harris, Dr Evan*—continued*
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 638, 712w
Entry clearances 723w
Entry clearances, Married people 226–7w
Immigration 1114w

Harvey, Nick
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 806
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 972
Questions
Almshouses 1305w
AWE Aldermaston 365w
AWE Management, Radioactive waste 365w
Defence Medical Services, Manpower 209w
Dept of Resources , Finance 527–8w
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure 97–8w
Hotels, Ministry of Defence 1211–2w
House of Commons, Pest control 893w
House of Commons, Public relations 664w
House of Commons, Security 893w
RAF Fairford 1216–7w
Rescue services, Helicopters 368w
Speaker's Adviser 528w, 664w

Hayes, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 542, 548, 555
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 923–5
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 671, 681, 686, 709–19
Questions
Apprentices 353–4, 501–3w
Business questions 517
City of London Guilds, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Food supply 650w
Further education, Admissions 607w
Further education, Teachers 1093–4w
Horticulture, Research 15–6w
Industrial health and safety, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334w
Investors in People 512w
Public expenditure, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Trade unions, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 346w
Training, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504–5w, 606w
Training, Government departments 515w
Unemployment 515w
Union Learning Fund 519–20w
Vocational training 348w

Hazardous substances
Waste disposal 19w

Hazel Grove
Legal aid 796–9w

Heads of state
Immigration 7[illegible]w

Heald, Mr Oliver
Questions
Consultants, Cabinet Office 2–3w
Consultants, Dept for Transport 22w
Consultants, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1119w
Consultants, Northern Ireland Office 182w
Information officers, Cabinet Office 251w
Information officers, Dept for Transport 380–1w

Heald, Mr Oliver*—continued*
Information officers, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 418w
Information officers, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 356w
Information officers, Government Equalities Office 967w
Information officers, Home Office 716w
Information officers, Ministry of Justice 793w
Information officers, Northern Ireland Office 21w
Information officers, Treasury 52w
Internet, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w
Internet, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376–7w
Internet, Dept for Work and Pensions 409w, 1147w
Internet, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322w, 418–9w
Internet, Dept of Health 471–2w
Internet, Scotland Office 1175w
Manpower, Cabinet Office 251w
Official cars, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 11w
Public expenditure, Dept for Work and Pensions 410w
Public expenditure, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 323w
Public expenditure, Government Equalities Office 251w
Public expenditure, Home Office 1107–8w
Public expenditure, Northern Ireland Office 22w
Public expenditure, Treasury 254w
Security, Cabinet Office 351w
Security, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683w
Security, Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w
Security, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192w
Security, Dept for International Development 137w
Security, Dept for Transport 634w
Security, Dept for Work and Pensions 245w
Security, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Security, Dept of Health 155w
Security, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Security, Government Equalities Office 578–9w
Security, Home Office 1108w
Security, Ministry of Defence 96w
Security, Ministry of Justice 261w
Security, Northern Ireland Office 182–3w
Security, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Security, Prime Minister 547w
Security, Treasury 5[illegible]1w
Unemployment, Young people 178w

Healey, Rt Hon John, Minister of State, Dept for Communities and Local Government
Written Statements
Affordable housing, Finance 94–6ws
Council housing, Finance 133–5ws
Housing, Carbon emissions 132–3ws
Questions
Affordable housing 149–50, 1258–9w
Affordable housing, Leeds 1260w
Affordable housing, Rural areas 893–4w
Affordable housing, West Yorkshire 1260–1w
Council housing, Construction 143–4

Healey, Rt Hon John,—continued
Council housing, Property transfer 1263w
Councillors, Fraud 1264w
Eco-towns, Biodiversity 301–2w
Home information packs 1272w
Homelessness 150
Homes and Communities Agency 903–4w, 1281–2w
Homes and Communities Agency, Contracts 1282w
Homes and Communities Agency, Expenditure 67w
Homes and Communities Agency, Harlow 63w
Housing, Carbon emissions 148–9, 1283w
Housing, Construction 146–7, 151–2
Housing, Finance 1283–4w
Housing, Leeds 1285–6w
Infrastructure Planning Commission, Pay 1286–8w
Mass media, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1295w
Mortgages, Government assistance 135–7, 306–7w, 914–5w, 1295–7w
Multiple occupation, Licensing 140
Out of town shopping centres, Planning permission 299w
Private rented housing 133–5
Right to buy scheme, Rural areas 592–3w
Shared ownership schemes, Yorkshire and the Humber 1305w
Social rented housing, Finance 1306w
Social rented housing, Regulation 67w
Tenant Services Authority, Public relations 1307w
Tenants' rights 298w

Health
Armed forces 820–2w
Young offenders 15ws

Health and Social Care Volunteering Fund
58–9ws

Health centres
Petitions (15.12.2009) 935–6

Health education
HIV infection 159w
Internet 1317w
Sex 1049w
Strokes 166w

Health hazards
Compost 496, 500
Dietary supplements 1047w

Health professions
Females 477–8w

Health Professions (Hearing Aid Dispensers) Order 2009
Chamber Debates
(07.12.2009) 123

Health services
Arthritis 466–7w
Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 177–97wh
Cancer 737–8w, 1310–1w
Channel Islands 273w
East of England 161w
Greater London 478w, 757w
Heart diseases 479w
Isle of Man 273w, 795–6w, 1041w, 1049–50w
Kidney patients 57–8ws
Leeds 1050w, 1318w
Musculoskeletal disorders 153w
Offences against children 156–7w
Older people (16.12.2009) 277–99wh
Reciprocal arrangements 284–5w
Sickle cell diseases 164–5w
Sight impaired 158w
Social enterprises 288–9w

Health services*—continued*
South East 489w
Tuberculosis 296–7w

Health visitors
East Sussex 746w
Training 747w

Hearing aids
Greater London 747w

Hearing impaired
Civil servants 350w
Selly Oak Hospital 164w

Heart diseases
Health services 479w

Heath, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 861–2, 883–5
Freedom of information, Points of order (10.12.2009) 527
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 932
Private Members' bills, Points of order (16.12.2009) 982
School Transport Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 981–2
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 214–7wh
Questions
Business questions 507–9
NHS, Information and communications technology 24–5

Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 660
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 46
Questions
Criminal law, EC law 26w
Fiscal Responsibility Bill 2009–10 961
Property development, Floods 145–6

Heathrow Airport
1162–3w

Hebrides missile range
832–3w, 1200–1w

Helicopters
Military aircraft 99–100ws, 833–5w, 1205w, 1213–4w
Rescue services 368w

Hemming, John
Questions
Children, Social services 424w
Freedom of information 351w
Retirement 411w

Hendry, Mr Charles
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 113–7
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 322–3
Questions
Advertising, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w
Advertising, Energy Saving Trust 323–4w
Buildings, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 131w
Carbon emissions 320w, 417–8w
Carbon emissions, Gas fired power stations 1336–7w
Carbon emissions, Local government 134w
Carbon reduction commitment energy efficiency scheme 320–1w
Carbon sequestration 130w
Climate change, Conferences 1331w
Coal Authority, Cap Gemini 130–1w

Hendry, Mr Charles*—continued*
Coal Authority, Information and communications technology 131w, 1332w
Energy, Housing 131–2w, 420w
Energy, Meters 325w
Exhaust emissions, Official cars 971w
Fuel poverty, Pensioners 1123w
Landfill 504
Members, Correspondence 930w
Official hospitality, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w, 925w
Opinion Leader Research, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1125w
Renewables Advisory Board 327w
Renewables obligation 327–8w
Salix Finance, Loans 328w
Sellafield 1126w
Swine flu, Vaccination 768w
Travel, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1334w
Wind power 1341w

Henry VIII Clauses
271–2w

Hepburn, Mr Stephen
Questions
Energy, Meters 325w, 928w, 1335w
Unemployment, Young people 9–10

Herbert, Nick
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 844–52, 856
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 326–7
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 492
Food, Origin marking 489–90

Herefordshire
Pupils 147w
Schools 318w

Heritage Lottery Fund
Public relations 370w

Hermon, Lady
Questions
Antarctic, Climate change 375–6w
Police, Northern Ireland 374–5w
Sentencing, Northern Ireland 182w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 375–6w, 949

Hezbollah
1226w

Higher education
610–1w
Admissions 1370–2w
Barnsley 1359w
Estimates days (10.12.2009) 529–72, 606
Finance 1094–5w, 1349w, 1371–2w
International cooperation 340w
Leeds 939–41w, 1094w, 1360–1w
Lewes 942w

Highly skilled migrant programme
75w

Hill farming
Manpower 14–5w

Hillier, Meg, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office
Written Statements
Identity cards, North West 112ws
Questions
Animal experiments 413w, 637–8, 712w
Animal experiments, Wales 1102–3w, 1385–6w
Animal experiments, Wickham Research Laboratories 417w
Criminal Records Bureau, Finance 413w

Hillier, Meg,—continued
Detention centres, Children 620–2
Extradition 415w
Identity and Passport Service, Public relations 720w
Identity cards 225w
National identity register 77w
Passports 414–5w, 568–9w, 1116w
Training, Home Office 1110w

Hillsborough Independent Panel
111–2ws

Historic buildings
Coventry 963w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Planning permission 902w

History
GCSE 139–40w

HIV infection
Circumcision 158–9w
Health education 159w

HM Prison Service
see Prison Service

HM Revenue and Customs
see Revenue and Customs

HMS Endurance
98w, 367w

Hoaxes and false alarms
Police 1242–6w

Hoban, Mr Mark
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 302–3
Local Government (Infrastructure Requirement Plans) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 981
Questions
Financial services, EC action 789

Hodge, Rt Hon Margaret, Minister of State, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 100–3wh
Purton hulks (08.12.2009) 68–72wh
Questions
Arts Council England East, Public relations 529–30w
Arts Council of England 664–6w
British Museum, Public relations 192w
Government Art Collection 670–1w
Historic buildings, Coventry 963w
Holiday accommodation, Overseas visitors 193w
Members, Correspondence 194w
Museums and galleries, Yorkshire and the Humber 194–6w
Royal parks, Parking 672w
Tourism 104w, 672–3w, 965–6w
Tourism, VAT 673w
Tourism, Yorkshire and the Humber 104w
VisitBritain, Public relations 668w

Hoey, Miss Kate
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 306
Questions
Origin marking, Israel 977w
Speaker's Adviser 528w, 664w

Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 809

Holiday accommodation
Overseas visitors 193w

Holiday accommodation—continued
Taxation 796, 857w, 1383w

Hollesley Bay Prison
116w

Hollobone, Philip
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 663
Defence (15.12.2009) 816
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 316–7
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 525, (15.12.2009) 830
Questions
Business questions 517
Dogs, Animal welfare 499–500
Immigration 638–40
Offenders 725w
Out of town shopping centres, Planning permission 299w
Railways, Fares 1165w

Holloway, Adam
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 88–9w, 362w, 1203–4w
Economic situation 356
Entry clearances, Overseas students 723–4w
Identity cards 225w
Official gifts, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225w
Police, Bureaucracy 623–4
Radicalism, Civil servants 417w
Radicalism, Students 28w, 1375w
Stop and search, Young people 570w

Holmes, Paul
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1038–42
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 113–7wh, 123wh, 126–7wh
Questions
Academies, Freedom of information 433–4w
Academies, Sponsorship 1060–1w
Cold weather payments, Derbyshire 1011w
Detention centres, Manpower 719w
Domestic violence, Courts 108w
Energy, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Energy, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Energy, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Energy, Ministry of Defence 827–8w
Energy, Treasury 1379w
Females, Crimes of violence 565w
Females, Offenders 257w
Fuel poverty 929w
Immigrants, Detainees 721–2w
Judiciary, Criminal records 621–2w
Mental health services 551w
Prison accommodation 119–22w
Prison Service, Industrial disputes 622w
Prisoners' release 800w
Prisons, Training 459–61w
Probation, Information and communications technology 118w
Warm front scheme, Derbyshire 1340–1w
Winter fuel payments, Derbyshire 1021w

Home Affairs Select Committee
(14.12.2009) 770

Home care services
165–6w, 289–95w, 396–7w, 494–8w, 553–4w, 762–5w, 913w, 1057w, 1321–4w

Home education
144w, 315w

Home Education Independent Review
Petitions (07.12.2009) 1–4p, (08.12.2009) 5–12p, 268–326, (09.12.2009) 13–4p, 466–8, 470–1, (10.12.2009) 15–6p, 608–9, (14.12.2009) 770–3, (15.12.2009) 35–40p, 932–3, 935–8, (16.12.2009) 45–61p, 1068–71

Home information packs
144–5, 152, 297w, 1272w

Home Office
Art works 1388w
Assets 715w
Buildings 1105w
Capita 714w
Christmas 714–5w, 1104w
Data protection 717w
Departmental responsibilities 634, 1107w
EC law 565w
Freedom of information 1105w
Government Communications 415w
Information and communications technology 716w
Information officers 716w, 1105–7w
KBR 227–8w
Legal costs 1388–9w
Legislation 71–3w
Manpower 716w
Official cars 1107w
Pay 716–7w
Procurement 1389w
Public expenditure 1107–8w
Publicity 1108w
Railways 1389w
Security 1108w
Taxis 1108w
Telephone services 1109–10w
Training 1110w, 1389w
Written questions 717–8w

"Home Office Autumn Performance Report 2009"
19ws

Home responsibilities protection
247w

Homelessness
150, 1272–4w, 1305–6w
Armed forces 962
Greater London 1274–8w
Leeds 990–1w
Young people 676w, 903w, 991w, 1274–82w

Homes and Communities Agency
903–4w, 1281–2w
Contracts 1282w
Expenditure 67w
Harlow 63w

Homicide
Mentally ill 1318–9w
Prisoners' release 116w

Homophobia
Crimes of violence 225w, 432w, 565w
Merseyside 258w
North West 225w, 565w
Schools 1068–9w

Honduras
Elections 772–3w

Hope, Phil, Minister of State and Minister for the East Midlands, Dept of Health
Chamber Debates
Disabled, Social security benefits (08.12.2009) 157

Hope, Phil,—continued*
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 676, 681–2, 715–8, 721, 739–42
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 195–7wh
Health services, Older people (16.12.2009) 291–9wh
Written Statements
Health, Young offenders 15ws
Health and Social Care Volunteering Fund 58–9ws
Mental health services 7ws
Questions
Art works, Dept of Health 1312–3w
Autism 736w, 1309w
Autism, Mental health services 1310w
Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust 1310w
Buildings, Dept of Health 1046w
Cannabis, Misuse 1311–2w
Care homes 154w, 281w, 1312w
Care homes, Standards 281w
Christmas, Dept of Health 549w, 1045–6w
Conferences, Dept of Health 1046–7w
Dementia, Research 738–9w
Depressive illnesses, Lancashire 751w
Disabled, Children 550w
Disabled, Social security benefits 767w, 1055–7w
Dr Foster 156w
Driving, Dept of Health 282–3w
Drugs, Prisons 1047–8w
EC law, Dept of Health 476–7w
Electronic equipment, Dept of Health 739w
Freedom of information, Dept of Health 282w
Gender identity disorder, Prisoners 283–4w
Health services, Social enterprises 288–9w
Home care services 165–6w, 289–95w, 494–8w, 553–4w, 762–4w, 1057w, 1321–4w
Hotels, Dept of Health 1051w
Impact assessments, Dept of Health 285w, 749w
Information officers, Dept of Health 739–40w
Internet, Dept of Health 471–2w, 740w
Legislation, Dept of Health 473–5w, 491w, 751w
Manpower, Dept of Health 1313w
Mental Capacity Act 2005 286w, 550w, 751–3w
Mental health services 550–1w, 753–4w, 1052–3w
Mentally disturbed offenders 286w
Mentally ill, Homicide 1318–9w
Nutrition Action Plan Delivery Board 161–2w
Official cars, Dept of Health 155w
Official engagements, Dept of Health 743w
Palliative care 162w
Pay, Dept of Health 741w
Public relations, Dept of Health 282w
Publicity, Dept of Health 743w
Scientific advisers, Dept of Health 164w
Scientists, Dept of Health 155w
Security, Dept of Health 155w
Selly Oak Hospital, Hearing impaired 164w
Siemens, Dept of Health 165w
Social services 295–6w, 552–3w, 762w, 765–7w, 1057–8w, 1323–4w

Hope, Phil,—continued*
Social services, Finance 296w, 549–50w
Social services, Public consultation 1058–9w
Telephone services, Dept of Health 743w
Training, Dept of Health 1047w, 1314–6w
Written questions, Dept of Health 475w, 1047w

Hopkin Review
see Delivery of Financial Support to Students in England by the Student Loans Company Review

Hopkins, Mr Kelvin
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 692–3, 697, 699, 701, 703
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 150–6wh, 159wh, 161–3wh, 168wh, 170–1wh, 173wh
Questions
Banks, Pay 787
Unemployment 15

Horam, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 293
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1000–3

Horse racing
Betting 369w

Horserace Totalisator Board
193w, 1171w

Horticulture
538w
Research 15–6w

Horwood, Martin
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 49, 52, 72–3, 84–7, 112–3
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 838, 855–63, 871–2, 903
Questions
Energy, Housing 1331w
Energy, Prices 326w
Social security benefits 786–7w, 1020–1w
Telephone services, Fraud 49w
Water, EC law 656–7w

Hosie, Stewart
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 383–4
Public sector (07.12.2009) 37
Questions
Business, Government assistance 783

Hospital beds
153w
Greater London 1317w
Surrey 747w

Hospital wards
Leeds 1317–8w

Hospitals
Admissions 470–2w, 479w, 747–8w
Crimes of violence 159–60w
Food 1050w
Hygiene 285w
Infectious diseases 479–80w
Inspections 1050–1w
Manpower 480–90w
Milton Keynes 160w
North West 480–90w
Parking 160w
Standards 160w

Hotels
Cabinet Office 840w

Hotels—continued*
Central Office of Information 1248–9w
Charity Commission 1249–50w
Crown Estate Commissioners 1379w
Crown Prosecution Service 1004–6w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 395w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 372w
Dept for International Development 808w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Dept of Health 1051w
Electoral Commission 954w
Food Standards Agency 1049w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1034w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 929–30w
Government Actuary's Department 850w
Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Minister for the Olympics 962w
Ministry of Defence 1211–2w
National School of Government 1257w
Northern Ireland Office 1238w
Office of Fair Trading 1095–6w
Office of Rail Regulation 634w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w
Postal Services Commission 948w
Prime Minister 1256w
Public Works Loan Board 851w
Revenue and Customs 854w
Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office 1004–6w
Scotland Office 527w
Serious Fraud Office 1004–6w
Solicitor-General 1004–6w
Treasury 851w
UK Debt Management Office 851w
UK Trade and Investment 1099–100w

House of Commons
Pest control 893w
Public relations 664w
Reform (15.12.2009) 198–223wh, 350–1
Security 893w

House of Commons Resources Dept see Dept of Resources

House of Lords
116–7ws

Housing
904w
Areas of outstanding natural beauty 590w
Armed forces 90–1w, 203–4w
Autism 904–5w
Carbon emissions 132–3ws, 148–9, 339–40w, 993w, 1283w
Construction 146–7, 151–2, 901–2w
Energy 131–2w, 324–7w, 420w, 906w, 1122w, 1283w, 1331w, 1380w
Finance 993w, 1283–4w
Fire extinguishers 911w
Floods 905–7w, 1272w
Greater London 303–4w
Leeds 1284–6w
Lighting 907w
Occupied territories 1034w
Older people 905–6w, 1282w
Prices 305w, 907–10w, 994w, 1286w
Regeneration 305w
Research 909–11w
Rural areas 305w, 395–6w, 591w
Standards 911w
Water 1286w

Housing benefit
11, 13–4, 19, 408w, 782–4w, 1014w
Fraud 992w

Housing benefit—continued*
Islington 1014–5w
Lancashire 992w
Ministerial statements (15.12.2009) 818–33

Housing revenue accounts
992w

Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 187w

Howarth, David
Questions
Association of Chief Police Officers 638
Bye laws 64–5w
Taxation, Pensioners 57w
Young offenders, Children in care 1043–4w
Young offenders, Social services 1248w
Young offenders, Special educational needs 701w

Howarth, Mr George
Questions
Regeneration, Kirkby 298w
Regeneration, Liverpool 139–40

Howarth, Mr Gerald
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 815–6w
Armed forces, Deployment 819w
Armed forces, Manpower 822w, 957w
Armoured fighting vehicles 364w
Defence, Expenditure 826–7w
Defence equipment 362–3w
Planning permission, Pyestock 962
Public expenditure, Ministry of Defence 366w

Howell, John
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 415–8, 458–60
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 312–3
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 223
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 146–7wh
Questions
Entry clearances, Overseas students 711–2w
UN Committee on the Rights of the Child 778–9w

Hoyle, Mr Lindsay
Chamber Debates
Business questions intervention (10.12.2009) 515
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 995–1000
Westminster Hall Debates
British Forces Post Office (09.12.2009) 137wh
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 73wh, 75wh, 78wh, 82wh
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 132–4wh
Questions
British overseas territories, Remembrance Day 575w
Bus services, Fares 1156w
Construction 1092–3w
Construction, Housing 146–7
Crimes of violence, Lancashire 712w
Depressive illnesses, Lancashire 751w
Domestic violence 219–20w, 564–5w
Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review 1380w
Exercise 283w, 477w
Floods, Cumbria 346

Hoyle, Mr Lindsay—continued*
Food, Hospitals 1050w
Food, Origin marking 489
Litter, Private roads 994w
Local government, Equality 1291w
Local government finance, Chorley 397–8w
Non-domestic rates, Garages and petrol stations 1381w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 583w
Overseas aid 253w
Pension credit 845w
Shops, Chorley 149
Turks and Caicos Islands, Human rights 1039w
Unemployment 14–5
Water charges 503–4
Welfare tax credits, Lancashire 858w

Hughes, Simon
Chamber Debates
Asylum (07.12.2009) 127, 130–2
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 43, 63–9, 78–9
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 932–3
Town and Country Planning Act 1990 (Amendment) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 980
Questions
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Communities and Local Government 148
Developing countries, Climate change 804–5w (508 13–4mc)
Low carbon buildings programme 931w
Ministers, Pay 961
Planning obligations 148
Renewable energy, Waste 534w
Solar power 931–2w

Huhne, Chris
Questions
Ambulance services 735w
Antisocial behaviour 1061w
Asylum, Children 68–70w
Asylum, Young people 413w
Borders, Personal records 1104w
Cybercrime, International cooperation 1391w
Data protection, EC law 1387–8w
Data protection, Sentencing 1240–1w
Deportation, Palestinians 413–4w
Detention centres, Children 621–2
English language, Education 1363w
Immigration, Children 78w, 1114–5w
Infectious diseases 735w
Legislation, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 140–2w
Legislation, Dept for Transport 33w
Legislation, Dept of Health 473–5w
Legislation, Government Equalities Office 1233w
Legislation, Home Office 71–3w
Legislation, Ministry of Justice 259–61w
Legislation, Northern Ireland Office 21w
Legislation, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w
Offenders, Ministry of Justice 107w
Olympic Games 2012, River Thames 641–2w
Prison sentences 127–8w
Prisons, Overcrowding 274w
Unsolicited goods and services 945w

Human rights
Colombia 24–5w
Equatorial Guinea 237w
Palestinians 1037w
Turks and Caicos Islands 1039w
Western Sahara 361w

Human Rights Commission of Northern Ireland
see Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission

Human Rights Joint Select Committee
(07.12.2009) 124

Human trafficking
1114w
Northern Ireland 1234w

Humber bridge
Tolls 1163w

Humberside Road Safety Partnership
1163w

Humble, Mrs Joan
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 224, 233, 235–6, 243–5
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 732–4
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 832
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 167
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 147–52wh, 154wh

Hunt, Jeremy
Questions
Broadband, Finance 1346w
Christmas, Cabinet Office 839w
Christmas, Dept of Health 549w
Christmas, Ministry of Defence 824w
Christmas, Northern Ireland Office 530w
Christmas, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 642w
Christmas, Scotland Office 627w
Creativity and Business International Network 528w
Sugar, Lord 513w, 1362w

Hunter, Mark
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (09.12.2009) 470–1
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 220, 230, 237
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 974
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 87w
Bridges, Workington 539–40w
Influenza, Stockport 490–1w
Influenza, Vaccination 160w
Railway stations, Repairs and maintenance 637w
Sight impaired, Health services 158w
Swine flu, Vaccination 499w
Television, Licensing 1173w

Hunting
356–8, 416w

Hunting Act 2004
Questions
Prosecutions 434w

Hurd, Nick
Questions
Committee on Climate Change 322w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Transport 380w
Government Communications, Home Office 415w
Government Communications Review 1254–5w
House of Commons, Security 893w
Information officers, Dept of Health 739–40w
Information officers, Home Office 1105–7w

Hurd, Nick—continued*
NHS Direct, Marketing 756w
Office of Public Sector Information 451w
Parliamentary private secretaries 711w
Public relations, Arts Council England East 529–30w
Public relations, Big Lottery Fund 104w
Public relations, British Board of Film Classification 102–3w
Public relations, British Council 574–5w
Public relations, British Museum 192w
Public relations, British Transport Police 542w
Public relations, British Waterways Board 648w
Public relations, Church Commissioners 521w
Public relations, Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice for Northern Ireland 659–60w
Public relations, Civil Aviation Authority 543w
Public relations, Commission for Rural Communities 645–6w, 648–9w
Public relations, Competition Commission 1091w
Public relations, Crown Estate Commissioners 847w
Public relations, Cycling England 542–3w
Public relations, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1068w
Public relations, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Public relations, Dept of Health 282w
Public relations, Digital switchover help scheme 371w
Public relations, Digital UK 192w
Public relations, Energy Saving Trust 925w
Public relations, Equality and Human Rights Commission 351–2w
Public relations, Financial Services Authority 850w
Public relations, Food Standards Agency 742–3w
Public relations, Gambling Commission 370–1w
Public relations, Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 929w
Public relations, Heritage Lottery Fund 370w
Public relations, House of Commons 664w
Public relations, Identity and Passport Service 720w
Public relations, Information Centre for Health and Social Care 1313–4w
Public relations, Legal Services Commission 1242w
Public relations, Met Office 366w
Public relations, Minister for the Olympics 641w
Public relations, Ministry of Defence 831w
Public relations, National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts 343–4w
Public relations, National Forest Company 647w
Public relations, National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence 742w
Public relations, National Lottery Commission 668w
Public relations, NHS Blood and Transplant 1313w
Public relations, NHS Supply Chain 742w
Public relations, Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People 663w

Hurd, Nick—continued*
Public relations, Northern Ireland Court Service 532–3w
Public relations, Northern Ireland Equality Commission 374w
Public relations, Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 1238w
Public relations, Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission 533w, 657–8w
Public relations, Northern Lighthouse Board 381–2w
Public relations, Northern Rock 852w
Public relations, Olympic Delivery Authority 641w, 1170w
Public relations, Ordnance Survey 592w
Public relations, Remploy 525–6w
Public relations, Risk and Regulation Advisory Council 344w
Public relations, Royal Mail 344–5w
Public relations, Royal Mint 855w
Public relations, School Food Trust 1071w
Public relations, Sport England 101w
Public relations, Solicitors Regulation Authority 625w
Public relations, VisitBritain 668w
Public relations, Waste and Resources Action Programme 647–8w, 654–5w
Publications, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Railways, Dept for Transport 543w, 633w
Third sector, Finance 343–4
Union Modernisation Fund 347–8w
Water charges, Concessions 191w

Hydrofluorocarbons
651–2w

Hygiene
Hospitals 285w

ICE
Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w, 994w
Fire Service College 987w, 994w

Iddon, Dr Brian
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 42
Higher education (10.12.2009) 546–53, 564
Mortgage Repossessions (Protection of Tenants Etc.) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 978
Questions
Building schools for the future programme, Laboratories 1061–2w
Jersey, EC law 1241w

Identity and Passport Service
Public relations 720w

Identity cards
77w, 225w, 636
Greater Manchester 77w
North West 112ws

Illegal immigrants
Croydon 636
Deportation 773w

Illsley, Mr Eric
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 319
Questions
Property development, Floods 147

Ilois
Resettlement 356–7w

Immigrants
Detainees 225–6w, 721–2w
Finance 722–3w

Immigration
74–6w, 638–40, 717w, 1114w

Immigration—continued*
Children 78w, 1114–5w
Heads of state 720w

Immigration controls
220–2w, 723w, 1390–1w, 1393–4w

Immobilisation of vehicles
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1361w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Ministry of Justice 116w

Impact assessments
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1097w
Dept of Health 285w, 749w
Taxation 1099w

Imports
Bees 7w
Biofuels 1155w

Improvised explosive devices
833w

In work credit
Lone parents 784w

Incapacity benefit
170–2w, 246–8w

Incinerators
419–20w, 976w

Income support
Carers 407–8w

Income tax
1007–8w

"Independent Chief Inspector of the UK Border Agency Report 2008–09"
112ws

Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority
620–2w, 796w

Independent Police Complaints Commission
566w
Labour turnover 724w
Pay 1393w

"Independent Reviewer of the Justice and Security (Northern Ireland) Act 2007 Report 2008–09"
62–3ws

Independent Safeguarding Authority
Finance 413w

India
Christianity 357w

Industrial diseases
Compensation 555–8w

Industrial disputes
British Airways 956
Prison Service 622w
Royal Mail 48w, 514–5w

Industrial health and safety
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334w

Infectious diseases
735w
Hospitals 479–80w

Influenza
Stockport 490–1w
Vaccination 160w

Information and communications technology
Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission 1009w
Coal Authority 131w, 1332w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 646w

Information and communications technology—continued*
Dept for Transport 1160w
Government departments 132w, 1255w
Home Office 716w
Liverpool City Council 65w
NHS 21–8, 493–4w, 757w, 1319–20w
Post Office 947–8w
Probation 118w

Information Centre for Health and Social Care
Public relations 1313–4w

Information Commissioner
Secondment 621w

Information officers
Cabinet Office 251w
Dept for Transport 380–1w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 418w
Dept of Health 739–40w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 356w
Government Equalities Office 967w
Home Office 716w, 1105–7w
Ministry of Justice 793w
Northern Ireland Office 21w
Prime Minister 251w
Treasury 52w

Infrastructure Planning Commission
Pay 1286–8w

Injuries
Buses 969–70w
Knives 749–50w

Inland Revenue and Customs Service
see Revenue and Customs

Inland waterways
490–1, 499
Bedfordshire 502–3
Ports 16–7w

Insolvency
797
Banks 127ws

Insurance
Driving offences 613–4w
Invalid vehicles 35w
Social rented housing 918w

Intensive care
Greater London 747w

Internally displaced people
Sri Lanka 353–4w

International assistance
Vaccination 1006w

International cooperation
Climate change 130w, 321–2w, 354, 554–5w, 922w, 956–8, 963, 1340w
Cybercrime 1391w
Higher education 340w

International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia
Serbia 2–3ws

International relations
Education 317w

International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources
538w

Internet
Advertising 1115w
Children 1391–2w
Copyright 943–4w
Crown Estate Commissioners 847w
Crown Prosecution Service 890–1w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1355–6w

Internet—continued*
Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w, 897w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376–7w
Dept for International Development 806w
Dept for Transport 631w
Dept for Work and Pensions 409w, 1147w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322w, 418–9w, 924w
Dept of Health 471–2w, 740w
Electoral Commission 893w
Food Standards Agency 1049w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028–9w
Forestry Commission 976w
Fraud 1113–4w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 1333w
Government Actuary's Department 851w
Health education 1317w
Minister for the Olympics 962w
Ministry of Defence 828–30w
National School of Government 1257–8w
Northern Ireland Office 660w
Offences against children 560–1w, 568w
Office of Rail Regulation 631–2w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Plastic surgery 760w
Postal Services Commission 948w
Public Works Loan Board 848w
Registration 943w
Revenue and Customs 854w
Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office 890–1w
Scotland Office 1175–6w
Security 607w, 945w, 1115w
Serious Fraud Office 890–1w
Solicitor-General 890–1w
Treasury 849w
UK Debt Management Office 848w
UK Trade and Investment 1375w

Invalid vehicles
Dangerous driving 108w
Insurance 35w

Inverness
Armed forces 204w

Investors in People
512w

Iran
Entry clearances 1110–1w
Nuclear power 576w
Sanctions 959

Iraq
Capital punishment 238w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 340–1w
Oil 237–8w
Peacekeeping operations 98w, 211w, 238w, 810w, 1204w, 1218w, 1231–2w
Prisoners 27w

Iraq Committee of Inquiry
547w, 967w
Cabinet Office 840–1w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 238w
Ministry of Defence 833–4w
Northern Ireland Office 22w

Irish language
531–2w

Iron and steel
Teesside (16.12.2009) 300–7wh

Irranca-Davies, Huw, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs*
Chamber Debates
Floods, Cumbria (08.12.2009) 330–6
Questions
Agriculture, Wales 185–6w
Badgers 7w
Biodiversity 534–5w
Birds of prey, East of England 645w
British Waterways Board, Public relations 648w
CEFAS Endeavour 10–1w
Common land, Registration 646w
Countryside, Access 379–80w
Fishing catches 1142w
Flood control 500, 536–7w, 649w
Flood control, Expenditure 377–8w
Flood Risk Regulations 2009 1142w
Floods 536w
Floods, Fire services 187w
Floods, Property development 1142–3w
Floods, York 498
Forests 537w
Forests, West Midlands 538w
Inland waterways 490–1, 499
Inland waterways, Bedfordshire 502–3
International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources 538w
Marine and Fisheries Agency 539w
Marine conservation zones 491
Marine Management Organisation 378w, 538–9w
National Forest Company, Public relations 647w
Natural England 652w
Nuclear power stations, Bradwell-on-Sea 483–4
Rights of way, Appeals 1143w
River Dee, Salmon 539w
River Tame, EC law 188–9w
Rivers, Fly tipping 501–2
Rural development programme 653–4w
Seas and oceans, Pollution 1143–5w
Sewers, Private sector 190–1w
Water, EC law 656–7w
Water charges 503–4
Water charges, Concessions 191w
Whales, Conservation 977–8w, 1145w
White fish, Quotas 535–6w

Islam
Cemeteries 1239w

Isle of Man
Health services 273w, 795–6w, 1041w, 1049–50w

Islington
Housing benefit 1014–5w

Israel
Film 529w
Origin marking 28ws, 579–80w, 582–3w, 653w, 852–3w, 977w, 1229–30w
Prisoners 357w
Religious freedom 238w

Israeli-Palestinian conflict
see Middle East

Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 843, 856, 862, 867–71
Questions
Inland waterways 490–1

Jack, Rt Hon Michael—continued
Swine flu, Disease control 504

Jackson, Ms Glenda
Questions
Pre-school education, Hampstead 1173–4w
Sure start programme, Hampstead 313w

Jackson, Stewart
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 460, 462
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 760
Post offices, Petitions (09.12.2009) 468
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 381
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1035–8
Questions
Affordable housing 1258–9w
Business and Community Safety Forum 299w
Community development 1262w
Council housing, Waiting lists 1262–3w
Councillors, Fraud 1264w
Empty property, Council tax 896w
Empty property, Non-domestic rates 915w
Empty property, Shops 1307w
Family and Parenting Institute 141–2w
Fire prevention 302–3w, 1271w
Fire services 142, 899w, 988–9w
Fire services, Contracts 900w
Fire services, Finance 900–1w
Fire services, Standards 302w
Fire services, Working hours 1358w
Floods, Cumbria 990w
General practitioners, Training 1060w
Government Office for the East of England, Training 1272w
Homes and Communities Agency, Contracts 1282w
Housing, Construction 901w
Housing, Energy 1283w
Housing, Prices 1286w
Local government 911–2w
Local government, Compensation 1291w
Local government, Fees and charges 1290–1w
Local government, Pensions 994w, 1292w
Local government, Reorganisation 994–5w, 1293–4w
Local government, Standards 1294w
Local government, Suffolk 1294–5w
Local government finance 912–3w, 1289–90w
Local government services 983–4w
Non-domestic rates, Microgeneration 1008w
Planning permission, Appeals 1302w
Public expenditure, Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w
Pupil exclusions, Tourettes syndrome 1070–1w
Regional government 1303–4w
Sleeping rough 1001w
Social rented housing, Standards 1306w
Social security benefits, Peterborough 249–50w
Teachers, Training 1083w
Thames Gateway Delivery Unit 1307w
Travellers, Caravan sites 981–2w
Vacant land 1001–2w

Jenkin, Mr Bernard
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 654
Defence (15.12.2009) 813
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 975

Jenkin, Mr Bernard—continued
Questions
Armed forces, Manpower 522–4w
Nuclear power stations, Bradwell-on-Sea 483–4
Recruitment, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Recruitment, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w
Recruitment, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Recruitment, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 419w
Recruitment, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w

Jenkins, Mr Brian
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 38
Questions
Apprentices, Staffordshire 1085–6w
Dietetics 282w, 335–6w, 1093w, 1315–7w
Excise duties, Beer 254w
Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority 796w
Local government finance, Lichfield 63–4w
Members, Correspondence 194w
Olympic Games 2012, West Midlands 1221w
Prisons, Education 128–9w
Recycling, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682–3w
River Tame, EC law 188–9w
Sheltered housing, Tamworth 308w
Vocational training 520w, 1101–2w

Jersey
EC law 1241w

Job creation
Third sector 349–50w

Jobcentre Plus
171–4w
South East 173–5w

Jobseeker's allowance
1015–20w
Interviews 175–6w
South East 248w

Johnson, Rt Hon Alan, Secretary of State for the Home Dept
Written Statements
Electronic surveillance, Admissibility of evidence 31–2ws
EU Justice and Home Affairs Council 15–9ws
Hillsborough Independent Panel 111–2ws
"Home Office Autumn Performance Report 2009" 19ws
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 637–8, 712w
Association of Chief Police Officers 638
Asylum, Children 68–70w
Asylum, Young people 413w
Borders, Personal records 1104w
Crime prevention, Cardiff 635–6
Crime prevention, Nottingham 628–9
Crime prevention, Young people 634
Crimes of violence, Females 636
Cybercrime, International cooperation 1391w
Departmental responsibilities, Home Office 634
Deportation, Palestinians 413–4w
Extradition, USA 627–8, 636–7
Identity cards 77w, 636
Identity cards, Greater Manchester 77w
Immigration 638–40
Immigration, Children 78w, 1114–5w

Johnson, Rt Hon Alan,—continued
Immigration controls 723w
Information and communications technology, Home Office 716w
Legislation, Home Office 71–3w
Members, Correspondence 79w, 416w, 724–5w
National Policing Improvement Agency, Public relations 1115–6w
Passports, Fees and charges 416w
Police, Demonstrations 634
Police, Inspections 637
Publicity, Home Office 1108w
Railways, Home Office 1389w
Speed limits, Cameras 637

Johnson, Diana R, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Children, Schools and Families and an Assistant Whip
Written Statements
Primary education, Admissions 26–8ws
Questions
Advertising, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139w
Badman, Graham 692w
British Educational Communications and Technology Agency, Finance 1066w
Capita, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 675w
Children, Communication 685–6w
Children, Mental health 316–7w
Christmas, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 677–8w
Class sizes 685w
EC law, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 685w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1064w
Employment agencies, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
Energy, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 678w
Extracurricular activities 686–8w
Faith schools, Community relations 678w
Free school meals 688–9w, 1067w
Free school meals, Leeds 1068w
Free school meals, Sixth form education 687–8w
Freedom of information, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
GCSE 689–90w
Gifted children, Kent 691–2w
Gifted children, Milton Keynes 316w
Home education 144w, 315w
International relations, Education 317w
KBR, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 315–6w
Legal costs, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139–40w
Legislation, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 140–2w
Manpower, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
Mobile phones, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 681–2w
Physical education, Kent 693w
Press, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w
Public expenditure, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 681w
Public relations, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1068w
Pupil exclusions 146w
Pupil exclusions, Tourettes syndrome 1070–1w
Recruitment, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w
Recycling, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682–3w

Johnson, Diana R.—continued*
School Food Trust, Public relations 1071w
Schools, Admissions 695–8w
Schools, Energy 1071–2w
Schools, Rural areas 699–700w, 1074w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Scientists, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Secondary education 149w
Secondary education, Gifted children 425–32w
Secondary education, Gloucestershire 149w
Security, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683w
Special educational needs 673–4w, 700–1w, 1073–8w
Special educational needs, Young offenders 318–9w
Working hours, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683–4w
Written questions, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1066w
Written questions, Government responses 709w

Joint Committee on Human Rights see Human Rights Joint Select Committee

Joint rapid reaction force
1212w

Jones, David
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 94–8, 109
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 928–9
Questions
Food, Origin marking 494
Home information packs 145, 297w
NHS, Information and communications technology 27
Presbyterian Mutual Society 1233w
Prisons, Wales 275–6w
Unemployment 12–3

Jones, Mr Kevan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Defence*
Chamber Debates
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure (10.12.2009) 614–8
Westminster Hall Debates
British Forces Post Office (09.12.2009) 140–2wh
Written Statements
Veterans advisory and pensions committees 57ws
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 201w, 209–10w, 361–2w, 816w
Armed forces, Absence without leave 202–3w, 956w
Armed forces, Cadets 955–7w, 1205–6w
Armed forces, Compensation 363–4w
Armed forces, Deployment 819w
Armed forces, Education 1211w
Armed forces, Energy 203w
Armed forces, Health 820–2w
Armed forces, Housing 90–1w, 203–4w
Armed forces, Manpower 522–4w
Armed forces, Mental health services 822–3w, 957w
Armed forces, Pay 204w
Armed forces, Pensions 91–2w
Armed forces, Sports 958w
Armed forces, Telephone services 92w
Art works, Ministry of Defence 827w

Jones, Mr Kevan,—continued*
Buildings, Ministry of Defence 365w, 827w
Christmas, Ministry of Defence 824w
Climate change, Ministry of Defence 92w
Conferences, Ministry of Defence 1207w, 1209w
Cyprus, Military bases 92–4w, 832w
Defence Estates, Manpower 825w
Defence Medical Services, Manpower 209w
Defence Nuclear Safety Regulator, Manpower 825w
Empty property, Ministry of Defence 828w
Energy, Ministry of Defence 827–8w
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure 97–8w, 205w, 210w
Freedom of information, Ministry of Defence 828w
Gurkhas, Pensions 205w
Hotels, Ministry of Defence 1211–2w
Improvised explosive devices 833w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 1204w
Kentigern House 211–2w, 367–8w, 834w
Lost property, Ministry of Defence 829–30w, 959w
Low flying 98w
Members, Correspondence 834w
Met Office, Public relations 366w
Military aircraft 209w
Military bases, Browndown 960w
Military bases, Energy 99w
Navy, Discharges 99w
Official cars, Ministry of Defence 1208w
Official hospitality, Ministry of Defence 366w
Royal Fleet Auxiliary 836w
Secondment, Ministry of Defence 521–2w
Security, Ministry of Defence 96w
Sick leave, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Training, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Written questions, Ministry of Defence 367w, 959–60w

Jones, Dr Lynne
Chamber Debates
Asylum (07.12.2009) 129
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 320
Questions
Gender identity disorder, Prisoners 283–4w
Work capability assessment 246–7w, 1149–50w

Jowell, Rt Hon Ms Tessa, Minister for the Olympics and London, Cabinet Office and Paymaster General*
Questions
Buildings, Cabinet Office 1252w
Caparo Group, Cabinet Office 250w
Central Office of Information, Hotels 1248–9w
Christmas, Minister for the Olympics 961w
Conferences, Minister for the Olympics 961w, 1219w
Flood control 1254w
Government Communications Review 1254–5w
Government departments, Telephone services 1255–6w
Hotels, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Internet, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 547w
Ministers 251w, 1256w
Official engagements, Treasury 1254w
Olympic Delivery Authority, Public relations 641w

Jowell, Rt Hon Ms Tessa,—continued*
Olympic Games 2012 641w, 962–3w
Olympic Games 2012: Culture 1219–20w
Olympic Games 2012, River Thames 641–2w
Olympic Games 2012, Security 1220w
Olympic Games 2012, West Midlands 1221w
Public relations, Minister for the Olympics 641w
Siemens, Minister for the Olympics 340w
Training, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Travel, Cabinet Office 251w

Joyce, Mr Eric
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 888
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1054–6

Judicial Diversity Advisory Panel
431–2w

Judiciary
Bosnia and Herzegovina 1025w
Criminal records 621–2w

Kaufman, Rt Hon Sir Gerald
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 842
Questions
Health education, Sex 1049w
Legal aid, North West 437–8w
Members, Correspondence 79w, 416w, 724–5w, 1338w

Kawczynski, Daniel
Questions
Afghanistan, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1221–2w
Afghanistan, Reconstruction 355w, 573w, 1024w
Carbon emissions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Contracts, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1223w
Deportation 1109–10w
Deportation, Illegal immigrants 773w
DNA, Databases 24w, 217–9w, 564w
Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review 582w
Historic buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Libya, Weapons of mass destruction 1226w
Middle East, Diplomatic service 778w
Middle East, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 771–2w
Military aircraft, Helicopters 1205w
Pay, Home Office 717w
Public finance 791
Recruitment, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 575w
Terrorism, Detainees 85w
Training, Home Office 1110w
Travel information 1232w

KBR
Cabinet Office 3w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 315–6w
Dept for Transport 35w
Dept for Work and Pensions 248w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 133w
Home Office 227–8w

Keeble, Ms Sally
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 405, 414, 443–4, 448
Questions
Unemployment, Young people 3–4

Keeble, Ms Sally—continued
Young offenders, Sentencing 129w

Keeley, Barbara, Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the House of Commons
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 748–9, 751, 753
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 984, 1063–8
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 220–3wh
Questions
Conferences, Leader of the House of Commons 979w
Electronic equipment, Leader of the House of Commons 979–80w
Hotels, Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Plants, Leader of the House of Commons 710w
Training, Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Written questions, Leader of the House of Commons 980w

Keen, Ann, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Health
Westminster Hall Debates
Neuroblastoma (16.12.2009) 311–4wh
Written Statements
Kidney patients, Health services 57–8ws
Questions
Accident and emergency departments, Crimes of violence 748–9w
Accident and emergency departments, Greater London 738w
Agency nurses, Greater London 758–9w
Ambulance services, Crimes of violence 153w, 1308–9w
Ambulance services, Uniforms 734–5w
Arthritis, Health services 466–7w
Bolton Primary Care Trust, Manpower 467–8w
Cancer, Health services 737–8w, 1310–1w
Cancer, Leeds 1311w
Cholesterol 1044–5w
Chronically sick people 1046w
Coeliac disease 469w
Complementary medicine, Regulation 155w
Diabetes, Leicester 1052w
Dialysis machines, Yorkshire and the Humber 1318w
Dietetics 282w, 1315–7w
Eyesight, Testing 156w
Family nurse partnership programme 744w
Fibromyalgia 477w
General practitioners, Training 1060w
General Social Care Council 284w
Health professions, Females 477–8w
Health services, Leeds 1050w
Health services, Offences against children 156–7w
Health visitors, East Sussex 746w
Health visitors, Training 747w
Heart diseases, Health services 479w
Home care services 764–5w
Hospital wards, Leeds 1317–8w
Hospitals, Admissions 470–2w
Hospitals, Crimes of violence 159–60w
Hospitals, Food 1050w
Hospitals, Infectious diseases 479–80w
Hospitals, Manpower 480–90w
Maternity services 741–2w
Medical treatments 491w
Members, Correspondence 160–1w

Keen, Ann,—continued
Mental health services, Young people 769w
Midwives, North West 491–2w
Neuroblastoma 551–2w
NHS, Manpower 157–8w
NHS, Ministers of religion 1320w
NHS, Standards 750w
NHSU 494w
Nurses, Graduates 161w
Nurses, Training 46–7w, 759w
Pinderfields and Pontefract Hospitals NHS Trust, Manpower 287–8w
Sickle cell diseases, Health services 164–5w
Sight impaired, Health services 150w
Strokes, Health education 166w
Transplant surgery 500–1w

Keetch, Mr Paul
Questions
Academies, National curriculum tests 1060w
Animal welfare, Circuses 6–7w
Military aircraft, Helicopters 833w
Out of area treatment, Wales 644w

Kellogg Brown and Root
see KBR

Kennedy, Rt Hon Jane
Questions
Police, Bureaucracy 624

Kent
Affordable housing 893w
Bankruptcy 331w
Burglary 215–6w
Gifted children 691–2w
Physical education 693w
Railways 43w
Warm front scheme 328–9w

Kentigern House
211–2w, 367–8w, 834w

Key, Mr Robert
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 653
Defence (15.12.2009) 810
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 974

Khan, Rt Hon Sadiq, Minister of State, Dept for Transport
Westminster Hall Debates
Large goods vehicles, Safety belts (08.12.2009) 52–5wh
Written Statements
Bus services 38–9ws
Bus services, Finance 119–20ws
Community transport 64ws
"Department for Transport Autumn Performance Report 2009" 30ws
EU Transport, Telecommunications and Energy Council 120–2ws
Public transport, Tickets 122ws
Roads, Snow and ice 122–4ws
Questions
Aviation, Exhaust emissions 1154–6w
Biofuels 8w
Biofuels, Imports 1155w
Bridges, Cumbria 34–5w
Bridges, Workington 539–40w
Bus services, Fares 1155–6w
Bus services, Finance 29w, 31w, 540w, 1156–9w
Bus services, Lincolnshire 31w, 540w
Bus services, Standards 30w
Crossrail line 540–2w
Cycling 29–30w
Cycling England, Public relations 542–3w
EC law, Dept for Transport 970w
Invalid vehicles, Dangerous driving 100w

Khan, Rt Hon Sadiq,—continued
Invalid vehicles, Insurance 35w
Motor vehicles, Exhaust emissions 1159w
Motor vehicles, Fuels 31–2w
Motor vehicles, Sales 1165–6w
Parking, Dept for Transport 33–4w
Public transport, Autism 1168–9w
Public transport, Crimes of violence 971w
Public transport, North West 635–6w
Railways, Liverpool 43w
Rapid transit systems 637–8w
Road traffic control 638w
Roads, Construction 639–40w
Roads, Snow and ice 544w
Taxis, Guide dogs 972–3w
Taxis, Licensing 972w
Tolls, Dartford-Thurrock Crossing 1159–60w
Tolls, Humber bridge 1163w
Tolls, Severn bridge 971–2w, 1166w
Transport, Exhaust emissions 1169–70w
Transport, Per capita costs 544–7w
Transport, Planning 639–40w
Transport, Tyne and Wear 43–4w, 640w
Travel, Dept for Transport 634w, 970w

Kidney, David, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Energy and Climate Change
Written Statements
EU Transport, Telecommunications and Energy Council 100–1ws
Questions
Advertising, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w
Billing, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w
Capita, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1326–31w, 1337w
Climate change, Conferences 1331w
Climate change, International cooperation 1340w
Climate change, Publicity 1331–2w
Coal Authority, Cap Gemini 130–1w
Coal Authority, Information and communications technology 131w, 1332w
Electricity 1121–2w
Electricity, Pensions 420w
Electricity, Scotland 1121–2w
Energy, Cybercrime 927w, 1340w
Energy, Disconnections 1122w, 1334–5w
Energy, Housing 1331w
Energy, Meters 325w, 928–9w, 1335w
Energy, National policy statements 1335–6w
Energy, Prices 326w, 420–1w
Energy supply 926–7w
Fuel poverty 132–3w, 795w, 929w
Fuel poverty, Pensioners 1122–3w, 1336w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority, Conferences 1336w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority, Hotels 929–30w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority, Internet 1333w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority, Public relations 929w
Gas fired power stations, Carbon emissions 1336–7w
Geothermal power 1337w
Industrial diseases, Compensation 555–8w
Members, Correspondence 930w
Nuclear power 326w, 550w, 1124w
Nuclear power stations, Oldbury 1125w
Nuclear power stations, Public consultation 421–2w
Power failures 1125w

Kidney, David,—continued*
Publications, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555–6w
Radioactive waste, Waste management 1341w
Renewable energy 559w, 1125–6w
Renewable energy, EC law 1126w
Sellafield 1126w
Solar power 931w
Tidal power 1338–9w
Tidal power, River Severn 1339w
Travel, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1334w
Warm front scheme 932w
Warm front scheme, Derbyshire 1340–1w
Warm front scheme, Kent 328–9w
Wind power 329w, 1126–7w, 1341–2w

Kidney patients
Health services 57–8ws

Kilfoyle, Mr Peter
Questions
Liverpool City Council, Information and communications technology 65w
Regeneration, Liverpool 139

Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 46, 50
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 301
Questions
Entry clearances, Overseas students 711–2w
Housing benefit 14

Kirkby
Regeneration 290w

Knight, Rt Hon Greg
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 835
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 756, 761
Questions
Cheques 254w
Floods, Fire services 107w
Health education, Internet 1317w
Humberside Road Safety Partnership 1163w
M5, Automatic number plate recognition 383–4w
Police, Skin piercing 1302–3w
Tidal power 1338–9w

Knight, Rt Hon Jim, Minister of State and Minister for the South West, Dept for Work and Pensions*
Questions
Buildings, Dept for Work and Pensions 243w
Capita, Dept for Work and Pensions 1145–6w
Conditions of employment 1146w
Contracts, Dept for Work and Pensions 409w
Council tax benefits 408w
Crime, Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
Data protection, Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
Disclosure of information, Dept for Work and Pensions 244–5w
Domestic visits, Dept for Work and Pensions 168–9w
Employment and support allowance 1149w
Employment schemes, Gloucestershire 13
Internet, Dept for Work and Pensions 409w, 1147w
Jobcentre Plus 171–4w

Knight, Rt Hon Jim,—continued*
Jobcentre Plus, South East 173–5w
Jobseeker's allowance, Interviews 175–6w
Jobseeker's allowance, South East 248w
KBR, Dept for Work and Pensions 248w
Legal costs, Dept for Work and Pensions 1147w
Lost property, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
National insurance, Foreign workers 176w
New deal for young people 175–6w, 525w, 1150w
New deal schemes 525w
Pay, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Poverty 248w
Public expenditure, Dept for Work and Pensions 245w, 410w
Recruitment, Dept for Work and Pensions 1149w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Scientists, Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Security, Dept for Work and Pensions 245w
Social security benefits, Disqualification 176–7w
Social security benefits, Legal aid 1021w
Social security benefits, Peterborough 249–50w
Taxis, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Telephone services, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w, 1148–9w
Travel, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Unemployed people, Work experience 249w, 412w
Unemployment 8–9, 12–5, 168w
Unemployment, Young people 9–10, 17–8, 167w, 178w, 1150w
Vacancies 1153w
Vocational training 1153–4w
Work capability assessment 1149–50w
Working hours, Dept for Work and Pensions 243–4w

Knives
Crime 216–7w, 563w, 962
Injuries 749–50w
Sentencing 276–7w
Sussex 749–50w

Kramer, Susan
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 840
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 319–20
Questions
Fixed penalties, Royal parks 115–6w
Sri Lanka, Politics and government 577–8w
Stock market 701

Kumar, Dr Ashok
Westminster Hall Debates
Iron and steel, Teesside (16.12.2009) 300–4wh
Questions
Business, Government assistance 1346–8w
Children, Day care 422–3w
Financial services, Regulation 1007w
Firearms 223–4w
GCSE 143w
Minimum wage 342–3w
Post offices, Bank services 255w

Kurds
Petitions (15.12.2009) 938

Laboratories
Building schools for the future programme 1061–2w

Labour turnover
Independent Police Complaints Commission 724w

Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 665, 670, 677, 679, 688, 691–6, 698, 706, 712
Questions
Driving, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 336–8w
Driving, Dept for Transport 382–3w
Driving, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1120–1w
Driving, Dept of Health 282–3w

Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 325–6
Questions
Bill of Rights 789–90w
British constitution 257–8w
Electoral register 954w
Official engagements, Treasury 1254w

Lait, Mrs Jacqui
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 668, 674, 684, 694, 704–7
Questions
Swine flu, Vaccination 1059w

Lamb, Norman
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 665, 667, 672, 675, 680, 685, 696–702
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 189–92wh
Questions
Ambulance services 733–4w
Ambulance services, Uniforms 734–5w
Baby care units 751w
Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust 161w, 737w, 1319w
Emergency calls 1268w
General Social Care Council 284w
Health services, East of England 161w
Hospitals, Admissions 747–8w
Hospitals, Standards 160w
Medical treatments 491w
Mental health services 550w, 753–4w, 1052w
NHS, Assets 1053–4w
NHS, Drugs 756w
NHS, Finance 286w, 757w
NHS, Standards 758w
Patient choice schemes 162–4w, 494w
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 761w

Lamb Inquiry
see Special Educational Needs and Parental Confidence Inquiry

Lammy, Rt Hon David, Minister of State, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills*
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 568–72
Westminster Hall Debates
Science, Finance (15.12.2009) 228–30wh
Written Statements
Delivery of Financial Support to Students in England by the Student Loans Company Review 11–2ws

Lammy, Rt Hon David,—continued*
EU Competitiveness Council 43–4ws
Questions
Chronic fatigue syndrome, Research 46w
Dietetics 335–6w, 1093w
Domestic visits, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351–2w
Education, Prisons 1363–4w
Graduates 941–3w
Graduates, Science 1358–60w
Graduates, Unemployment 1361–2w
Graduates, Work experience 1359w
Higher education 610–1w
Higher education, Admissions 1370–2w
Higher education, Barnsley 1359w
Higher education, Finance 1094–5w, 1349w, 1371–2w
Higher education, International cooperation 340w
Higher education, Leeds 939–41w, 1094w, 1360–1w
Higher education, Lewes 942w
Internet, Copyright 944w
London Metropolitan University 341w, 608–9w
Medical equipment, EC law 341–2w
National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts, Public relations 343–4w
National Geoscience Data Centre 945w
Overseas students 340w
Research, EC grants and loans 1346w
RRS James Cook 49w
RV Prince Madog 47–8w
Student Loans Company 1365–70w, 1374–5w
Students, Disabled 1098w, 1371w
Students, Loans 609w, 950–1w, 1098–9w, 1372–4w
Students, Radicalism 28w, 1375w
Vocational training 1101–2w

Lancashire
Crimes of violence 712w
Depressive illnesses 751w
Housing benefit 992w
Public sector 842–3w
Schools 1072w
Welfare tax credits 858w

Lancaster, Mark
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 300
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 5wh, 12–3wh, 23wh
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 87w
Armed forces, Education 1211w
Armed forces, Training 958–9w
Broadband 503w
Business, Closures 609–10w
Business questions 516
Death, Obesity 1250–1w
Death, Smoking 1251–2w
Defence, Procurement 93–4w
Educational visits, Dept for International Development 252–3w
Gifted children, Milton Keynes 316w
Hospitals, Parking 160w
Housing, Construction 151–2
Inland waterways, Bedfordshire 502–3
International relations, Education 317w
Sustainable Communities Act 2007 137–8
University Officer Training Corps 1205w
Young people, Unemployment 516w

Land use
Agriculture 149

Landfill
504

Lansley, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 323–4
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 666, 668, 671–2, 674, 676–91, 723–4, 741
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 154–63, 169–71
Questions
Cannabis, Misuse 1311–2w
NHS, Information and communications technology 21–3
Swine flu, Vaccination 166–7w

Large goods vehicles
1164w
Accidents 1164w
Licensing 633–5w
Registration 1164–5w
Safety belts (08.12.2009) 49–55wh
Testing 38ws

Laws, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 810
Questions
Child care tax credit 57w
Disabled facilities grants 300–1w
Disabled facilities grants, Somerset 300–1w
Education, Assessments 318w, 684–6w
Energy, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 678w
Free school meals 688–9w
Free school meals, Sixth form education 687–8w
Pre-school education, Finance 694w
Press, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w
Pupils, Per capital costs 700w
Revenue and Customs, Somerset 855w
Schools, Admissions 695–8w
Schools, Standards 318w
Secondary education, Gifted children 425–32w
Secondary education, Standards 699–700w
Specialised diplomas, Rural areas 1078w
Working hours, Solicitor-General 181w

Lazarowicz, Mr Mark
Questions
Telephone services, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192–3w
Telephone services, Dept for International Development 549w
Telephone services, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148–9w
Telephone services, Dept of Health 743w
Telephone services, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w
Telephone services, Home Office 1109–10w
Telephone services, Ministry of Defence 366w
Telephone services, Ministry of Justice 793–4w
Telephone services, Northern Ireland Office 661–2w
Telephone services, Treasury 849–50w

Leader of the House of Commons
Conferences 979w
Electronic equipment 979–80w
Hotels 980w
Plants 710w
Training 980w
Written questions 980w

Learning and Skills Council for England
512–3w
Correspondence 1095w
Pay 607–8w

Learning disability
Further education 501w
Police 80–3w

Learning Lessons From the 2007 Floods Review
see Flooding Lessons Learned Review

Leasehold Valuation Tribunal
920–1w

Leave
Electoral Commission 1w

Leech, John
Chamber Debates
Health centres, Petitions (15.12.2009) 935–6
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 299, (09.12.2009) 468
Mugabo, Adela Mahoro, Petitions (09.12.2009) 469–70
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 39–42wh
Questions
Autism 1309w
Autism, Public transport 1168–9w
Business expenses, Dept for Transport 629w
Charities Act 2006 1249w
Charity Commission 1128w
Civil service agencies, Dept for Transport 1159w
NHS walk-in centres, Greater Manchester 355
Pay, Dept for Transport 629–30w
Unemployed people, Work experience 249w

Leeds
Affordable housing 1260w
Cancer 1311w
Council housing 1263w
Death 1129–32w
Diseases 1133–4w
Employment 1134–5w
Empty property 898w
Free school meals 1068w
Health services 1050w, 1318w
Higher education 939–41w, 1094w, 1360–1w
Homelessness 990–1w
Hospital wards 1317–8w
Housing 1284–6w
National income 1135–6w
Pensioners 1381w
Population 1136w
Schools 1072–4w
Sports 1172w
Welfare tax credits 1383–4w
Winter fuel payments 1021w

Leeds City Council Bill 2007–08
Chamber Debates
Order for consideration read (10.12.2009) 483

Legacy Sports Board
see Sport Legacy Delivery Board

Legal aid
141ws, 434–5w, 622w
Asylum 272–3w
Hazel Grove 796–9w
North West 437–8w
Social security benefits 1021w

Legal costs
  Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 605–6w
  Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139–40w
  Dept for Work and Pensions 1147w
  Home Office 1388–9w

Legal profession
  Females 436w

Legal Services Commission
  Fees and charges 117w
  Public relations 1242w

Legislation
  117–8ws
  Dept for Children, Schools and Families 140–2w
  Dept for Transport 33w
  Dept of Health 473–5w, 491w, 751w
  Government Equalities Office 1233w
  Home Office 71–3w
  Ministry of Justice 259–61w
  Northern Ireland Office 21w
  Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w

Leicester
  Diabetes 1052w

Leigh, Mr Edward
    Chamber Debates
  Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 379–80

Leisure
  East of England 103w, 193–4w
  Sports 963w

Lepper, Mr David
    Chamber Debates
  Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 290–1
    Westminster Hall Debates
  Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 57wh, 61wh

Letwin, Rt Hon Oliver
    Chamber Debates
  Equitable Life Assurance Society, Petitions (14.12.2009) 772
    Questions
  Rights of way, Appeals 1143w

Levitt, Mr Tom
    Chamber Debates
  Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 301–2
  London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 750
    Questions
  Carbon monoxide, Alarms 504w
  Carbon monoxide, Poisoning 305w
  Common land, Registration 646w
  Third sector, Finance 599w
  Third sector, Government assistance 338–9

Lewes
  Higher education 942w

Lewis, Ivan, Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office
    Westminster Hall Debates
  Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 7wh, 9wh, 21–4wh
  Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 92–6wh
    Questions
  Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 361w, 954–5w, 1202w
  Afghanistan, Politics and government 354–5w, 571–3w
  Afghanistan, Population 354w

Lewis, Ivan, —continued
  Afghanistan, Reconstruction 355w, 573w, 1024w
  Africa, Armed conflict 1232–3w
  Antarctic, Climate change 375–6w
  Antisemitism 769w, 1222–3w
  Australia, Antisemitism 769–70w
  Bangladesh, Climate change 574w
  Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda 770–1w, 808–9w
  Equatorial Guinea, Human rights 237w
  Hezbollah 1226w
  India, Christianity 357w
  Iran, Nuclear power 576w
  Iraq, Capital punishment 238w
  Iraq, Oil 237–8w
  Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 238w, 1231–2w
  Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 238w
  Israel, Prisoners 357w
  Israel, Religious freedom 238w
  Libya, Weapons of mass destruction 1226w
  Members, Correspondence 773w
  Mercenaries 771w, 1231w
  Middle East 773w
  Middle East, Antisemitism 239w
  Middle East, Armed conflict 239w, 357–8w, 576w, 773–8w, 1034–6w, 1227–9w
  Middle East, Diplomatic service 77[illegible]w
  Middle East, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 771–2w
  Middle East, Peace negotiations 778w
  Middle East, Trade 239w
  Morocco, Deportation 356w
  Morocco, Mining 358–9w
  Morocco, Origin marking 1229–30w
  Nuclear weapons, Proliferation 359w
  Occupied territories, Housing 1034w
  Official gifts, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225w
  Palestinians 1037w
  Palestinians, Human rights 1037w
  Palestinians, Overseas aid 576–7w, 1230w
  Palestinians, Politics and government 1230w
  Palestinians, Religious freedom 241w
  Panchen Lama 1037–8w
  Philippines, Politics and government 242w
  Religious freedom 359–60w
  Somalia 1038w
  Sri Lanka, Politics and government 577–8w
  Sudan, Politics and government 360w
  Sudan, War crimes 1232w
  Taliban 360w
  Trade unions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1038–9w
  Treaties, Armed forces 819w
  USA, Antisemitism 360–1w
  Western Sahara, Human rights 361w
  Western Sahara, Politics and government 359w, 1229w

Lewis, Dr Julian
    Chamber Debates
  Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1028–9, 1031–5
    Questions
  Business questions 514–5
  HMS Endurance 367w

Libraries
  see Public libraries

Libya
  Weapons of mass destruction 1226w

Licensed premises
  373w

Licensing laws
  354, 671w

Lichfield
  Local government finance 63–4w

Liddell-Grainger, Mr Ian
    Questions
  Revenue and Customs 54–6w
  Tourism, VAT 673w

Lidington, Mr David
    Chamber Debates
  Defence (15.12.2009) 808
    Westminster Hall Debates
  Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 181–3wh
  Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 33–6wh
    Questions
  Armed forces, Sports 958w
  Iran, Nuclear power 576w

Lighting
  Housing 907w

Lincolnshire
  Bus services 31w, 540w
  Children's centres 313w
  Classroom assistants 319w
  Specialist schools 319w
  Sure start programme 313w
  Teachers 319w

Linton, Martin
    Questions
  Natural gas, Planning permission 140–1

Lisbon Treaty (Referendum) Bill 2009–10
    Chamber Debates
  1R (16.12.2009) 979

Litter
  Animals 735w
  Private roads994w
  Roads 486–7

Liverpool
  Passenger ships 142ws
  Railways 43w
  Regeneration 139–40

Liverpool City Council
  Information and communications technology 65w

Livestock
  Animal welfare 188w

Lloyd, Mr Tony
    Chamber Debates
  Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 659
    Questions
  Research, Bees 501
  Research, Food 493–4

Llwyd, Mr Elfyn
    Westminster Hall Debates
  House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 198wh
    Questions
  Dairy farming 493
  Entry clearances, Overseas students 626
  Probation 801–2w
  Probation, Wales 801–2w

Loans
  Banks 791–2
  Royal Bank of Scotland 583–4w
  Salix Finance 328w
  Students 609w, 950–1w, 1098–9w, 1372–4w

Local Authorities (Overview and Scrutiny) Bill 2009–10
    Chamber Debates
  1R (16.12.2009) 978

Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Act 2009
Questions
1287–8w

Local development frameworks
1288w

Local government
911–2w
Carbon emissions 134w
Chorley 1291w
Compensation 1291w
Elections 1264w
Equality 898–9w, 1291w
Estimates days (10.12.2009) 573–606
Fees and charges 1290–1w
Freedom of information 913w
National parks authorities 1289w
Northumberland 297–8w
Pensions 994w, 1291–2w
Per capita costs 1292–4w
Procurement 65w
Reorganisation 13–4ws, 994–5w, 1293–4w
Standards 913–4w, 995w, 1294w
Suffolk 1294–5w
Sustainable development 309–10w

Local government finance
65w, 397w, 912–3w, 984–5w, 1289–90w, 1302–3w
Bury 306w
Chorley 397–8w
Lichfield 63–4w
Opposition days (08.12.2009) 214–67

Local Government (Infrastructure Requirement Plans) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 981

Local government services
142–3, 983–4w

Local housing allowance see Housing benefit

London
see Greater London

London City Airport
35–7w, 198w
Noise (15.12.2009) 939–46

London Metropolitan University
341w, 608–9w

London Select Committee
(07.12.2009) 124, (08.12.2009) 267, (09.12.2009) 466, (10.12.2009) 607, (14.12.2009) 748–70

Lone parents
Employment 596–8w
In work credit 784w

Lorries
see Large goods vehicles

Lost property
Defence equipment 823–4w
Dept for International Development 807w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Ministry of Defence 829–30w, 959w
Scotland Office 628w

Loughton, Tim
Questions
Brinsford Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 465w
Children, Databases 675–6w
Children in care, Guardianship 694–5w
Children in care, Prisoners 801w
Entry clearances, Iran 1110–1w
Foster care 795w
Foster care, Young offenders 279–80w

Loughton, Tim*—continued*
GCSE 689–90w
GCSE, Citizenship 139–40w
Homelessness 1274w
Mentally ill, Homicide 1318–9w
National Safeguarding Delivery Unit 1069–70w
Office for Criminal Justice Reform, Finance 692–3w
Public expenditure, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 313–4w
Schools, Standards 148–9w
Special educational needs 1073–7w
Teenage pregnancy 151w
Young offenders, Sentencing 129w
Young people, Homelessness 676w
Young people, Stop and search 570w
Youth offending teams, Finance 1248w

Love, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 217–8
Questions
Bank services, Fees and charges 788

Low carbon buildings programme
931w

Low flying
98w

Lucas, Ian, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills
Questions
Ammunition, Exports 338–9w
Audit, Regulation 1098w
Bankruptcy 329–31w
Bankruptcy, Kent 331w
Business, Government assistance 1348–9w
Business, Transport 951–2w
Construction 1092–3w
Cybercrime 602–3w
Electric vehicles 508w
Export credit guarantees 338w
Freight 940w
Impact assessments, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1097w
Impact assessments, Taxation 1099w
Iraq, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 340–1w
Motor vehicles, Manufacturing industries 513–4w
National Investment Corporation 1362–3w
Public companies, Voting rights 1102w
Risk and Regulation Advisory Council, Public relations 344w
Trade agreements, Peru 1099w
UK Trade and Investment, Hotels 1099–100w
UK Trade and Investment, Internet 1375w

Luff, Mr Peter
Questions
Cancer, Health services 737–8w, 1310–1w
Radio frequencies 800

M4
Speed limits 233w

M5
Automatic number plate recognition 383–4w

M6
Walsall 37w, 635–6w

McCafferty, Ms Chris
Questions
Chronically sick people 1046w
Housing, Carbon emissions 148–9

McCafferty, Ms Chris*—continued*
Prescription drugs 1054w
Tenants' rights 298w

McCarthy-Fry, Sarah, Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury
Written Statements
Banks, Insolvency 127ws
"Fraud Report 2008–09" 94ws
Tax allowances, Pensions 21–2ws
Questions
Bank services, Fees and charges 50w, 787–8
Banks, Finance 50–3w, 253–4w
Building societies 1005w
Buildings, Treasury 52w, 848w
Cheques 254w
Child Trust Fund 579–80w, 847w
Conferences, Treasury 848w
Consultants, Treasury 50w
Credit cards 798
Crown Estate Commissioners, Conferences 1378–9w
Crown Estate Commissioners, Hotels 1379w
Crown Estate Commissioners, Internet 847w
Crown Estate Commissioners, Public relations 847w
DP World 1379w
EC law, Treasury 52w
Energy, Housing 1380w
Energy, Treasury 848w, 1379w
Equitable Life Ex-gratia Payment Scheme Review 582w
Excise duties, Alcoholic drinks 582w
Excise duties, Beer 254w
Excise duties, Fuels 1382w
Excise duties, Motor vehicles 1380w
Excise duties, Oil 405w
Financial services 52w
Financial services, EC action 788–9
Financial services, Regulation 405w, 1007w
Financial Services Authority, Public relations 850w
Fiscal policy 845–6w
Freedom of information, Treasury 848–9w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Treasury 56w
Hotels, Treasury 851w
Information officers, Treasury 52w
International assistance, Vaccination 1006w
Internet, Treasury 849w
Mortgages 845w
Northern Rock, Public relations 852w
Pay, Treasury 1007w
Pension credit 845w
Public expenditure, Treasury 254w
Public Works Loan Board, Hotels 851w
Public Works Loan Board, Internet 848w
Royal Bank of Scotland, Finance 1376w
Royal Bank of Scotland, Loans 583–4w
Royal Mint, Public relations 855w
Security, Treasury 581w
Sick leave, Treasury 849w
Stamp duty land tax 855w
Taxation, Banks 855–6w
Taxation, Betting 404–5w
Taxation, Gaming machines 56–7w, 1383w
Telephone services, Treasury 849–50w
Training, Treasury 848w, 850w
UK Debt Management Office, Hotels 851w
UK Debt Management Office, Internet 848w
Written questions, Treasury 405w

McCartney, Rt Hon Ian
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 876–8, 882

McCrea, Dr William
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 412, 462
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 976
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 99–100wh, 102wh
Questions
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 952–3

McDonagh, Ms Siobhain
Chamber Debates
Exservicemen, Radiation exposure (10.12.2009) 610–3

McDonnell, John
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 841, 881–3
Questions
Complementary medicine, Regulation 155w
Fire services 585w
Fire services, Finance 585–9w
Fire services, Risk assessment 1270w
Heathrow Airport 1162w
Homelessness, Young people 903w, 1274–82w
ICE, Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w
Pay, Dept for Transport 631w
Pay, Dept of Health 741w
Prison Service, Manpower 275w
Prisoners, Mentally ill 118–9w
Standards, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030w
Transport, Tyne and Wear 640w
Unemployed people, Work experience 412w

McFadden, Rt Hon Patrick, Minister of State, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills
Westminster Hall Debates
Iron and steel, Teesside (16.12.2009) 304–7wh
Questions
Art works, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Assets, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603w
Buildings, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351w
Caparo Group, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Capita, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Christmas, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 602w, 1349–50w
City of London Guilds, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Climate Change Projects Office 937w
Conferences, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w, 1357w
Contracts, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Cost effectiveness, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 603–5w
Disclosure of information, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Driving, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 336–8w
EC law, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 939–40w

McFadden, Rt Hon Patrick, —continued
Electronic equipment, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Energy, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1352–4w
Energy and Climate Change Unit 939w
Flexible working, Wales 410–1w
Freedom of information, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1354–5w
Gaddafi, Saif al-Islam 345w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 49w
Housing, Carbon emissions 339–40w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1361w
Industrial health and safety, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334w
Internet, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1355–6w
Investors in People 512w
Legal costs, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 605–6w
Manpower, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1356w
Minimum wage 342–3w
Pay, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334–5w
Post Office, Disciplinary proceedings 946w
Post Office, Finance 47w
Post Office, Information and communications technology 947–8w
Post offices 946–7w
Post offices, Bank services 255w
Post offices, Closures 47w
Postal services, Armed forces 1365w
Postal Services Commission, Conferences 1345w
Postal Services Commission, Hotels 948w
Postal Services Commission, Internet 948w
Public expenditure, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Railways, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Recruitment, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Retirement 411w
Royal Mail, Industrial disputes 48w, 514–5w
Royal Mail, Pay 48w
Royal Mail, Public relations 344–5w
Scientists, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Sugar, Lord 341w, 513w, 1362w
Taxis, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Trade unions, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 346w
Training, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504–5w, 606w, 1356–7w
UK Innovation Investment Fund 509–10w
Union Learning Fund 519–20w
Union Modernisation Fund 347–8w
Working hours, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 505–7w
Working hours, Fire services 1358w
Written questions, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 507w, 1357w

McFall, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 378–9

McGrady, Mr Eddie
Questions
Religious freedom, Israel 238w

McGrady, Mr Eddie —continued
Religious freedom, Palestinians 241w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 948

McGuire, Rt Hon Anne
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 832
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 167, 169, 179–81

McIntosh, Miss Anne
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 899–902
Flood Risk Regulations, Points of order (10.12.2009) 528
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 933
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 4w, 185w
Bridges, Cumbria 34–5w
Business questions 512–3
Climate change, International cooperation 963
Crimes of violence, Retail trade 563–4w
Drinking water, Cabinet Office 595w
Fines 619–20w
Fixed penalties, Antisocial behaviour 611w
Flood control 536–7w, 649w, 1254w
Flood Risk Regulations 2009 1142w
Floods 536w
Floods, Cumbria 346, 902w
Floods, Property development 147, 1142–3w, 1302w
Fuel poverty 795w
Fuel poverty, Pensioners 1336w
Motor vehicles, Manufacturing industries 513–4w
Passports 568–9w, 1116w
Police, Databases 799–800w
Police, North Yorkshire 630
Police community support officers, North Yorkshire 725w
Roads, Accidents 386–8w
Roads, Litter 487
Royal Mail, Industrial disputes 514–5w
Rural Payments Agency, Manpower 189–90w
Sewers, Private sector 18w
Social rented housing, Insurance 918w
Student Loans Company 1375w
Student Loans Company, Finance 1374–5w
Student Loans Company, Manpower 1366w
Student Loans Company, Pay 1366–7w
Students, Loans 1374w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 969w, 1239w
Unemployment 15
Warm front scheme 932w
Waste disposal, EC law 655–6w
Waste disposal, Metals 652w, 1143w
Water, EC law 20w
Welfare tax credits 584w
Welfare tax credits, Complaints 584w
Young offenders, Training 626w, 803–4w

McIsaac, Shona
Questions
Winter fuel payments 4

MacKay, Rt Hon Andrew
Questions
Affordable housing 149–50
British Airways, Industrial disputes 956
Entry clearances, Overseas students 633–4
Identity cards 636
Mortgages, Government assistance 135–6
Official engagements, Prime Minister 956

MacKay, Rt Hon Andrew—continued
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Recruitment 949–50

McKechin, Ann, Minister of State, Scotland Office
Questions
Buildings, Scotland Office 627w
Christmas, Scotland Office 627w
Conferences, Scotland Office 627w
Contracts, Scotland Office 374w
Electronic equipment, Scotland Office 627w
Excise duties, Fuels 629w
Freedom of information, Scotland Office 526w
Hotels, Scotland Office 527w
Internet, Scotland Office 1175–6w
Lost property, Scotland Office 628w
Official hospitality, Scotland Office 526w
Publicity, Scotland Office 526w
Sick leave, Scotland Office 628w
Taxis, Scotland Office 1w
Training, Scotland Office 628w
Written questions, Scotland Office 526–7w, 628–9w

Mackinlay, Andrew
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 36
Questions
Autism 549w
Children, Abuse 1234w
Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting 548w, 710–1w
Crown dependencies 612w
DA notices 93w
Electoral Commission, Leave 1w
Electoral Commission, Pay 1w
Entry clearances, Republic of Ireland 1111–2w
Extradition, USA 636–7
Financial services, Regulation 785
Foreign workers 963
Health services, Channel Islands 273w
Health services, Isle of Man 273w, 795–6w, 1041w, 1049–50w
Health services, Reciprocal arrangements 284–5w
Mental Capacity Act 2005 550w
Offenders, Deportation 533w
Pipex Homecall, Complaints 344w
Religious freedom 359–60w
Thurrock Council, Public appointments 135
Written questions, Government responses 1139w, 1239w, 1324–5w, 1394w

McLoughlin, Mr Patrick
Chamber Debates
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 752, 755, 760
Questions
Bovine tuberculosis, Disease control 8w
Broadband, East Midlands 369w
Members, Correspondence 930w
Social security benefits, Widowed people 17

MacNeil, Angus
Westminster Hall Debates
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 255–6wh, 267wh
Questions
Deportation 73–4w
Excise duties, Fuels 629w
Hebrides missile range 832–3w, 1200–1w
Immigration 74–6w

MacNeil, Angus—continued
St Kilda, Ministry of Defence 836w

MacShane, Mr Denis
Questions
Business questions 510
Entry clearances, Overseas students 625–6

Mactaggart, Fiona
Questions
Business questions 515
Entry clearances, Pakistan 638, 1111w
Prostitution 631–2
Renewable energy, Planning permission 307w

Magilligan Prison
23–4w, 183w

Main, Anne
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 654–5
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 51, 106–12, 120
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 762
Questions
Bangladesh, Climate change 548w, 574w
Bangladesh, Overseas aid 548–9w
Hotels, Cabinet Office 840w
Hotels, Central Office of Information 1248–9w
Hotels, Charity Commission 1249–50w
Hotels, Crown Estate Commissioners 1379w
Hotels, Crown Prosecution Service 1004–6w
Hotels, Dept for Communities and Local Government 395w
Hotels, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 372w
Hotels, Dept for International Development 808w
Hotels, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Hotels, Dept of Health 1051w
Hotels, Electoral Commission 954w
Hotels, Food Standards Agency 1049w
Hotels, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1034w
Hotels, Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 929–30w
Hotels, Government Actuary's Department 850w
Hotels, Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Hotels, Minister for the Olympics 962w
Hotels, Ministry of Defence 1211w
Hotels, National School of Government 1257w
Hotels, Northern Ireland Office 1238w
Hotels, Office of Fair Trading 1095–6w
Hotels, Office of Rail Regulation 634w
Hotels, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w
Hotels, Postal Services Commission 948w
Hotels, Prime Minister 1256w
Hotels, Public Works Loan Board 851w
Hotels, Revenue and Customs 854w
Hotels, Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office 1004–6w
Hotels, Scotland Office 527w
Hotels, Serious Fraud Office 1004–6w
Hotels, Solicitor-General 1004–6w
Hotels, Treasury 851w
Hotels, UK Debt Management Office 851w
Hotels, UK Trade and Investment 1099–100w

Maintenance
Children 19–20, 167–8w, 242–3w, 1010–2w

Major Accident Off-Site Emergency Plan (Management of Waste from Extractive Industries) (England and Wales) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(14.12.2009) 770

Males
Teachers 707w

Malik, Shahid, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Communities and Local Government
Westminster Hall Debates
Rented housing, Fire prevention (15.12.2009) 242–6wh
Questions
Al Muhajiroun 1261w
Business and Community Safety Forum 299w
Community development 1262w
Community development, Finance 982–3w
Emergency calls 1268w
Empty property, Non-domestic rates 915w
Fire prevention 298w, 302–3w, 584–5w, 590–1w, 1271w
Fire services 141–2, 585w, 899w, 988–9w, 1268–9w
Fire services, Contracts 900w
Fire services, Emergency calls 585w
Fire services, Finance 585–90w, 900–1w, 1269w
Fire services, Manpower 589–90w
Fire services, Risk assessment 1269–70w
Fire services, Standards 302w
Fire services, Vehicles 1271w
Fires, Death 901w
Regional planning and development 1000w
Thames Gateway Delivery Unit 1307w
Travellers, Caravan sites 981–2w
Travellers, Republic of Ireland 920w

Malins, Mr Humfrey
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 297

Mallaber, Judy
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 457
Questions
Climate change, International cooperation 956–7

Malta
Petitions (15.12.200[illegible] 934–5

Manchester
see Greater Manchester

Mann, John
Questions
Compost, Health hazards 496
Fibromyalgia 477w
Housing benefit 783–4w
Police, Nottinghamshire 356

Manufacturing industries
Closures 47w
Motor vehicles 513–4w

Marine Accident Investigation Branch (Reports) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 981

Marine and Fisheries Agency
539w

Marine conservation zones
491

Marine Management Organisation
378w, 538–9w

Marketing
NHS Direct 756w

Married people
Entry clearances 226–7w

Marris, Rob
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 117, 119
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 383
Public sector (07.12.2009) 39
Questions
Children, Maintenance 19–20
Human rights, Colombia 24–5w
Human rights, Palestinians 1037w
Israel, Origin marking 653w, 852–3w
NHS, Information and communications technology 27
Occupational pensions 5

Marshall-Andrews, Mr Robert
Questions
Administration of justice 964

Martlew, Mr Eric
Chamber Debates
Floods, Cumbria (08.12.2009) 332
Higher education (10.12.2009) 536–9, 572
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 34wh, 38–9wh, 44wh

Mason, John
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 403, 408, 413, 464–5
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 526, (15.12.2009) 829
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 160, 165, 175, 179, 182, 198–201
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12 2009) 37–9wh
Questions
Buildings: Ministry of Defence 365w
Kentigern House 211–2w, 367–8w
Pay, Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Pay, Ministry of Defence 830–1w
Written questions, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 507w
Written questions, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1066w
Written questions, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391–2w
Written questions, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101w
Written questions, Dept for International Development 352w
Written questions, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Written questions, Dept of Health 475w
Written questions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031–2w
Written questions, Home Office 717–8w
Written questions, Ministry of Defence 367w
Written questions, Ministry of Justice 794–5w
Written questions, Northern Ireland Office 661–2w
Written questions, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 349w
Written questions, Scotland Office 526–7w
Written questions, Treasury 405w

Mass media
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1295w

Maternity services
741–2w

Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Questions
Third sector, Government assistance 339

May, Mrs Theresa
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 820–2
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 172
Unemployment, Points of order (08.12.2009) 153
Questions
Crime, Dept for Work and Pensions 1146w
Crimes of violence, Females 562–3w, 715w
Crimes of violence, Public transport 971w
Employment schemes 595w
Family intervention projects 424–5w
Future Jobs Fund 840w
In work credit, Lone parents 784w
Mental health services, Young people 769w
Pensioners, Income 248w
Unemployment 1137–8w
Unemployment, Young people 2–3, 844w, 1150w

Meacher, Rt Hon Michael
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 380
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 213–4wh

Medical equipment
EC law 341–2w
VAT 856–7w

Medical treatments
491w

Members
Allowances 33–8ws, 349–51, 711w
Correspondence 79w, 160–1w, 194w, 411w, 416w, 724–5w, 773w, 834w, 851w, 930w, 1226w, 1338w
Pensions 118ws
Surveillance 547–8w

Men
see Males

Mental Capacity Act 2005
Questions
286w, 550w, 751–3w

Mental health
Children 316–7w

Mental health services
7ws, 550–1w, 753–4w, 1052–3w
Armed forces 822–3w, 957w
Autism 1310w
Young people 769w

Mentally disturbed offenders
286w

Mentally ill
Employment 9–10ws
Employment and support allowance 781w
Homicide 1318–9w
Prisoners 118–9w

Mephedrone
566–7w

Mercenaries
137–8ws, 771w, 1218w, 1231w

Mercer, Patrick
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (14.12.2009) 770–1
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 5–6wh
Questions
Counter-terrorism 629–30
Counter-terrorism, Expenditure 75–6w
Entry clearances 1118w
Sherwood Forest Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust, Finance 761–2w

Merron, Gillian, Minister of State, Dept of Health
Westminster Hall Debates
Bone marrow disorders, Donors (15.12.2009) 235–8wh
Written Statements
EU Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council 6ws
Genetics 58ws
Questions
Abortion 1044w
Alcoholic drinks, Misuse 732–4w
Alcoholic drinks, Prices 465–6w
Autism 549w
Cord blood 470w
Dietary supplements, Health hazards 1047w
Donors, Blood 467–8w
Donors, Bone marrow disorders 468–9w
Drugs, Misuse 476w, 743–4w
Drugs, Rehabilitation 476w, 1048–9w
Exercise 283w, 477w
Food Standards Agency, Conferences 1317w
Food Standards Agency, Hotels 1049w
Food Standards Agency, Internet 1049w
Food Standards Agency, Public relations 742–3w
Health education, Internet 1317w
Health education, Sex 1049w
Health services, Isle of Man 1049–50w
Health services, Reciprocal arrangements 284–5w
HIV infection, Circumcision 158–9w
HIV infection, Health education 159w
Hospitals, Hygiene 285w
Infectious diseases 735w
Influenza, Stockport 490–1w
Influenza, Vaccination 160w
Injuries, Knives 749–50w
MMR vaccine, Basingstoke 754–6w
Neuroblastoma 552w
NHS, Finance 286w, 742w
NHS, Redundancy 489w
NHS Blood and Transplant, Public relations 1313w
Smoking 1054–6w
Smoking, Children 1055w
South East Coast Strategic Health Authority 498–9w, 767–8w
Sunbeds, Young people 1059w
Swine flu, Telephone services 1059–60w
Swine flu, Vaccination 166–7w, 499–500w, 768w, 1059w, 1324w
Tuberculosis, Health services 296–7w
Written questions, Government responses 1324–5w

Merseyside
Crimes of violence 258w
Dangerous dogs 470–2w
Homophobia 258w
Parks 398w

Met Office
Public relations 366w

Metals
Waste disposal 652w, 1143w

Meters
Energy 325w, 928–9w, 1335w

Michael, Rt Hon Alun
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 922–3
Questions
Crime prevention, Cardiff 635–6
Inland waterways 490
Police, Bureaucracy 633

Microgeneration
Non-domestic rates 1008w

Middle East
773w
Antisemitism 239w
Armed conflict 239w, 357–8w, 576w, 773–8w, 834w, 1034–6w, 1227–9w
Diplomatic service 778w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 771–2w
Peace negotiations 778w, 958
Petitions (10.12.2009) 17–8p
Trade 239w

Midwives
North West 491–2w

Milburn, Rt Hon Alan
Westminster Hall Debates
Large goods vehicles, Safety belts (08.12.2009) 49–52wh, 54wh

Miliband, Rt Hon David, Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs*
Written Statements
Mercenaries 137–8ws
Serbia, International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia 2–3ws
Sri Lanka, Politics and government 105–7ws
Questions
Bosnia and Herzegovina, Judiciary 1025w
Buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026–7w
Caparo Group, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1222w
Cost effectiveness, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224–5w
Hakluyt, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1033–4w
Manpower, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1029w
Middle East, Armed conflict 1229w
Overseas price mechanism 241w
Peacekeeping operations, Finance 1230–1w
Public expenditure, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 240–1w
Training, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225w

Miliband, Rt Hon Edward, Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change*
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 41–9, 52, 57

Military aircraft
see also Low flying
209w
Deployment 1212w
Helicopters 99–100ws, 833–5w, 1205w, 1213–4w

Military aircraft—continued*
Navy 960w

Military bases
Air force 89–90w, 1215–6w
Browndown 960w
Cyprus 92–4w, 832w
Energy 99w

Miller, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 810
Public sector (07.12.2009) 37
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 831
Questions
NHS, Information and communications technology 25

Miller, Maria
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 878–81
Questions
Care homes, Standards 281w
Child care tax credit 256w
Child care vouchers 846w
Child Trust Fund 579–80w
Children, Day care 676w
Children, Disabled 550w
Children's centres 701–8w, 1064w
Criminal Records Bureau, Finance 413w
Family nurse partnership programme 744w
Foster care 687w
Grandparents, Child tax credit 579w
Grandparents, Welfare tax credits 857–8w
Health visitors, Training 747w
Maternity services 741–2w
MMR vaccine, Basingstoke 754–6w
NHS, Finance 742w
Nurses, Training 759w
Playgrounds, Finance 693–4w
Pre-school education 694w
Public expenditure, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 678–82w
Special educational needs 701w

Milton, Anne
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 291–2
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Buckinghamshire (15.12.2009) 193–5wh
Questions
Care Quality Commission 281–2w
Death, Pressure sores 1131–2w
Hospital beds, Surrey 747w
Third sector, Government assistance 337

Milton Keynes
Gifted children 316w
Hospitals 160w
Young people 516w

Minimum wage
342–3w

Mining
Morocco 358–9w

Minister for the Olympics
Christmas 961w
Conferences 961w, 1219w
Hotels 962w
Internet 962w
Public relations 641w
Siemens 349w
Training 962w

Ministerial policy advisers
Chequers 710w

Ministerial statements
Afghanistan (14.12.2009) 641–63
Defence (15.12.2009) 801–17
Employment (15.12.2009) 818–33
European Council (14.12.2009) 641–63
Housing benefit (15.12.2009) 818–33
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 967–76
Public sector (07.12.2009) 29–39
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 518–26

Ministers
251w, 1256w
Pay 961

Ministers of religion
NHS 1320w

Ministry of Defence
Afghanistan 813–4w
Art works 827w
Buildings 365w, 827w
Caparo Group 824w, 1206w
Capita 205–6w
Chief information officers 1208w
Christmas 824w
Climate change 92w
Compensation 365w, 1206–7w
Conferences 1207w, 1209w
Contracts 94w, 210w
Cost effectiveness 94–6w, 1210w
Domestic visits 95w
Drinking water 96w
EC law 831–2w
Electronic equipment 1207w
Empty property 828w
Energy 827–8w
Freedom of information 828w
Hotels 1211–2w
Internet 828–30w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 833–4w
Lost property 829–30w, 959w
Official cars 1208w
Official engagements 835w
Official hospitality 366w
Pay 830–1w
Public expenditure 366w
Public relations 831w
Publicity 831w
St Kilda 368–9w, 836w
Scientific advisers 212–3w
Secondment 521–2w
Security 96w
Sick leave 1209w
Standards 1209w
Taxis 96–7w
Telephone services 366w
Training 1209w
Travel 97w
Written questions 367w, 959–60w

Ministry of Justice
Christmas 611w, 1040–1w
Domestic visits 108w
EC law 433w
Food 109–10w
Freedom of information 792w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser 276w
Immobilisation of vehicles 116w
Information officers 793w
Legislation 259–61w
Manpower 1241w
Offenders 107w
Official hospitality 793w
Secondment 792w
Security 261w
Taxis 261–2w
Telephone services 793–4w
Travel 109–10w
Working hours 110–1w
Written questions 794–5w

Misuse
Alcoholic drinks 732–4w
Cannabis 1311–2w
Drugs 476w, 743–4w

Mitchell, Mr Andrew
Questions
Afghanistan, Poverty 804w
Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda 808–9w

Mitchell, Mr Austin
Questions
A160 44–5w
British overseas territories, Companies 1377–8w
Bus services, Lincolnshire 31w, 540w
Council housing, Finance 299–300w
Pensions, Armed forces 91–2w
Pensions, Gurkhas 205w
Specialist schools, Lincolnshire 319w
Sure start programme, Lincolnshire 313w
Teachers, Lincolnshire 319w

MMR vaccine
Basingstoke 754–6w

Mobile homes
Petitions (09.12.2009) 467
Tribunals 135–6ws

Mobile phones
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 681–2w
Dept for Transport 632w

Moffat, Anne
Questions
Third sector, Job creation 349–50w

Moffatt, Laura
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 702–4
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 192–4
Questions
Business, Government assistance 1005–6w
Medical equipment, EC law 341–2w
Strokes, Health education 166w

Moldova
Politics and government 577w

Mole, Mr Chris, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Transport
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 28wh, 34wh, 45–8wh
Written Statements
Railways 64–6ws
Railways, Construction 63–4ws
Questions
A160 44–5w
Assets, Dept for Transport 197–8w
British Transport Police, Public relations 542w
Buildings, Dept for Transport 630w
Business expenses, Dept for Transport 629w
Caparo Group, Dept for Transport 31w, 1154w
Capita, Dept for Transport 197w
Civil service agencies, Dept for Transport 1159w
Conferences, Dept for Transport 1160w
Consultants, Dept for Transport 32w
Driving, Dept for Transport 382–3w
East coast railway line 384w
East coast railway line, Rolling stock 543–4w

Mole, Mr Chris,—continued
Electronic equipment, Dept for Transport 380w, 630w
Food, Dept for Transport 32–3w
Freedom of information, Dept for Transport 630w
Information and communications technology, Dept for Transport 1160w
Information officers, Dept for Transport 380–1w
Internet, Dept for Transport 631w
KBR, Dept for Transport 35w
Legislation, Dept for Transport 33w
M5, Automatic number plate recognition 383–4w
M6, Walsall 37w, 635–6w
Mobile phones, Dept for Transport 632w
National Express East Anglia, Complaints 42w
Norwich-London railway line 199w, 384w
Office of Rail Regulation, Conferences 1160–1w
Office of Rail Regulation, Hotels 634w
Office of Rail Regulation, Internet 631–2w
Pay, Dept for Transport 629–31w
Plants, Dept for Transport 542w
Public transport, Crimes of violence 38w
Public transport, Tickets 385–6w
Publicity, Dept for Transport 1161w
Railway network 38w, 199w
Railway stations 39–40w
Railway stations, Greater London 40–2w
Railway stations, Repairs and maintenance 637w
Railway stations, Security 42w
Railways, Dept for Transport 543w, 633w
Railways, Electrification 42–3w
Railways, Fares 1165w
Railways, Fuels 45w
Railways, Kent 43w
Railways, Standards 384–5w
Roads, Repairs and maintenance 44w
Rolling stock 45w, 388w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Transport 1168w
Scientists, Dept for Transport 633w
Security, Dept for Transport 634w
Siemens, Dept for Transport 201w
Taxis, Dept for Transport 382w
Theft, Dept for Transport 381w
Training, Dept for Transport 1161w
Transport, Wales 631–3w
Waterloo Station 1170w
Working hours, Dept for Transport 381–2w
Written questions, Dept for Transport 1161w
Written questions, Government responses 547w

Monarchy
Succession 273w, 438–9w

Money laundering
Estate agents 510–1w, 606–7w, 1362w

Money lenders
959

Moon, Madeleine
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 166, 172
Questions
Cyprus, Military bases 92–4w, 832w
Iraq, Peacekeeping operations 1231–2w
Mercenaries 1218w, 1231w
St Kilda, Ministry of Defence 368–9w

Moran, Margaret
Questions
Council housing, Sales 389–90w
Domestic violence, Reoffenders 463–4w
Empty dwelling management orders 898w
Homes and Communities Agency, Expenditure 67w
Housing benefit 782w
Offences against children, Internet 560–1w, 568w
Rape, Police cautions 463w
Social rented housing 66–7w, 308–10w

Morden, Jessica
Questions
Carer's allowance 17
Climate change 534w
Climate change, Forests 485
Crime prevention, Young people 634
Departmental responsibilities, Home Office 634
Flexible working, Wales 410–1w
Flood control 500
New deal for lone parents 167w

Morgan, Julie
Chamber Debates
Sunbeds (Regulation) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 978
Questions
Business questions 511

Morley, Mr Elliot
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 82
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 852–5

Morocco
Deportation 356w
Mining 358–9w
Origin marking 1229–30w

Mortgage Repossessions (Protection of Tenants Etc.) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 978

Mortgages
845w, 914w
Government assistance 18–9, 135–7, 306–7w, 784w, 788w, 914–5w, 1225–7w
Repossession orders 917w, 995w, 1304–5w

Moss, Mr Malcolm
Questions
Bingo, Closures 45w
Burglary 215w
Business, Closures 593w, 598–602w
Crimes of violence 70–2w
Knives, Crime 216–7w
Leisure, East of England 103w, 193–4w
Playing fields, East of England 193–4w
Population, East of England 841–2w
Prosecutions, Truancy 279–80w
Road traffic offences 231w
Shoplifting 231–2w, 1117–8w
Sports, Leisure 963w

Motability
525w

Motor sports
971w

Motor vehicles
Excise duties 198–9w, 1380w
Exhaust emissions 1159w, 1167w
Fuels 31–2w
Manufacturing industries 513–4w
Sales 1165–6w

Mugabo, Adela Mahoro
Petitions (09.12.2009) 469–70

Mulholland, Greg
Chamber Debates
Enterprise Inns, Points of order (09.12.2009) 387
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 681, 700
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Older people (16.12.2009) 281–4wh
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 25–31wh, 43wh
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 134wh
Questions
Child Trust Fund 847w
Class sizes 685w
Fire services, Emergency calls 585w
Foreign workers 1113w
Graduates, Unemployment 1361–2w
Multiple occupation, Licensing 140
Public transport, North West 635–6w
Sleeping rough 1000–1w
Taxis, Licensing 972w
Transport, Per capita costs 545–7w

Multiple occupation
398w, 915w
Licensing 140

Munn, Meg
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 656
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 988–91
Questions
Police community support officers 620
Railways, Electrification 962

Murphy, Rt Hon Jim, Secretary of State for Scotland*
Questions
Dungavel House Immigration Removal Centre 629w

Murphy, Rt Hon Paul
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 920–1

Murrison, Dr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 382
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 105wh, 107–8wh, 110wh
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 199wh, 201–2wh, 204wh
Questions
Compensation, Ministry of Defence 1206–7w

Musculoskeletal disorders
Health services 153w

Museums and galleries
Yorkshire and the Humber 194–6w

Music
Copyright 666–7w (5[illegible]mc)
Finance 102w

National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Transport) Order 2010
Written Statements
66ws

National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order 2009
Chamber Debates
(15.12.2009) 908–31

National curriculum tests
Academies 1060w
Expenditure 144w

National debt
800

National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts
Public relations 343–4w

National Express East Anglia
Complaints 42w

National Forest Company
Public relations 647w

National Geoscience Data Centre
925w, 945w, 1123w

National Health Service Public Interest Disclosure Support Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 980

National Health Service University
see NHSU

National identity register
77w

National income
Leeds 1135–6w

National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence
Public relations 742w

National insurance
Foreign workers 176w

National insurance contributions
1008w
Foreign workers 53–4w

National Investment Corporation
1362–3w

National Lottery
672w
Grants 373–4w

National Lottery Commission
Public relations 668w

National offender management information system
106–7w, 257w

National parks authorities
Local government 1289w

National Policing Improvement Agency
79–80w
Public appointments 416–7w
Public relations 1115–6w

National policy statements
995–6w
Energy 1335–6w

National Safeguarding Delivery Unit
1069–70w

National School of Government
Conferences 1256–7w
Hotels 1257w
Internet 1257–8w

National Star College
Capital investment 514w

NATO
836w

NATO response force
99w

Natural England
652w

Natural gas
Planning permission 140–1

Nature conservation
Crime 16w

Navy
Discharges 99w
Military aircraft 960w
Supply estimates (10.12.2009) 607

Naysmith, Dr Douglas
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 309–10

Neill, Robert
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 600–3
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 214–25, 228, 234, 237
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 751, 754, 762
Questions
Official engagements, Prime Minister 346–7
Spain, G20 347

Network Rail
Freedom of information 620w

Neuroblastoma
(16.12.2009) 308–14wh, 551–2w

New deal for lone parents
167w

New deal for young people
175–6w, 525w, 1150w

New deal schemes
525w

Newcastle upon Tyne
Drugs 271–2w

Newmark, Brooks
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 669, 711
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 380
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1017
Westminster Hall Debates
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 74wh
Questions
Post Office, Disciplinary proceedings 946w
Post Office, Information and communications technology 947–8w

NHS
30–1ws, 138–9ws
Assets 1053–4w
Data protection 492–3w
DHL 493w
Drugs 756w
Finance 286w, 493w, 742w, 757w
Information and communications technology 21–8, 493–4w, 757w, 1319–20w
Manpower 157–8w
Ministers of religion 1320w
Private patients 757w
Procurement 287w, 757–8w
Redundancy 489w
Standards 758w

NHS Blood and Transplant
Public relations 1313w

NHS Business Services Authority
Consultants 755–6w

NHS Connecting for Health
Expenditure 1319w

NHS Direct
Marketing 756w

NHS Information Centre
see Information Centre for Health and Social Care

NHS South East Coast see South East Coast Strategic Health Authority

NHS Supply Chain
Public relations 742w

NHS walk-in centres
Greater Manchester 355

NHSU
494w

Nigeria
Peacekeeping operations 99w

Nimrod aircraft
Ministerial statements (16.12.2009) 967–76

Nitrate vulnerable zones
15–6w

Noise
London City Airport (15.12.2009) 939–46

Non-departmental public bodies
Vocational training 1097–8w

Non-domestic rates
65–6w, 396w, 398–400w, 799, 1297–8w
Churches 996w
Empty property 400–2w, 915w, 1301w
Garages and petrol stations 1381w
Greater London 996w, 1298–300w
Microgeneration 1008w
Ports 852w, 1300w
Public libraries 996w
Sports 591w
Valuation 147–8, 150–1, 297w, 402w, 405–6w, 583w, 851–2w, 857w, 996–7w, 1300–1w, 1303w, 1306–7w

Non-Domestic Rating (Chargeable Amounts) (England) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(15.12.2009) 907

Norfolk
Speed limits 637

Norris, Dan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs
Questions
Bees, Imports 7w
Bees, Research 501
Capita, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376w
Christmas cards, Recycling 977w
Christmas trees, Recycling 916w, 977w
Climate change 534w
Commission for Rural Communities, Public relations 645–6w, 648–9w
Compost, Health hazards 496
Domestic waste, Waste disposal 974–5w
Drinks, Consumption 975w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Energy, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Fish, Procurement 975–6w
Fly tipping, Bexley 650w
Forestry Commission, Internet 976w
Forests, Disease control 650–1w
Freedom of information, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Hazardous substances, Waste disposal 19w
Hydrofluorocarbons 651–2w
Incinerators 419–20w, 976w

Norris, Dan,—continued
Information and communications technology, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 646w
Internet, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376–7w
Lighting, Housing 987w
Litter, Roads 486–7
Metals, Waste disposal 652w, 1143w
Official cars, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 11w
Oils, Waste disposal 378–9w
Origin marking, Israel 977w
Pay, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 647w
Publications, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Renewable energy, Fuel oil 422w
Renewable energy, Waste 20w, 534w
Rural areas, Economic situation 495
Rural areas, Financial services 496–7
Rural development programme 654w
Scientific advisers, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 654w
Taxis, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 377w
Travel, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Waste and Resources Action Programme, Public relations 647–8w, 654–5w
Waste disposal, EC law 655–6w

North Atlantic Treaty Organisation see NATO

North East
GCSE 315–6w

North East Economic Forum
1301w

North West
Employment 596–8w
Homophobia 225w, 565w
Hospitals 480–90w
Identity cards 112ws
Legal aid 437–8w
Midwives 491–2w
Prisons 462w
Public transport 635–6w

North Yorkshire
Police 630
Police community support officers 725w

Northern Cyprus
see Cyprus

Northern Ireland
Administration of justice 658w
Armed forces 823w
Children 1234w
Crime prevention 947–8
Crimes of violence 183–4w, 660w
Criminal investigation 1233–4w
Devolution 1233w
Driving offences 663–4w
Electricity 1121w
Employment 531–2w
Human trafficking 1234w
Offenders 533w
Police 374–5w
Prisoners' release 23w
Prisons 951–2
Racially aggravated offences 183w
Sentencing 182w
Serious Organised Crime Agency 183w
Sexual offences 183–4w
Terrorism 533w, 952–5, 969w, 1234w, 1239w
VAT 57w
Weapons 375–6w, 948–9

Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People
Public relations 663w

Northern Ireland Court Service
Public relations 532–3w

Northern Ireland Equality Commission
Public relations 374w

Northern Ireland government
955–6

Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission
Public relations 1238w

Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission
Public relations 533w, 657–8w

Northern Ireland Office
Buildings 968w
Capita 20–1w
Christmas 530w, 968w, 1234–5w
Conferences 1235–6w
Consultants 182w
Disabled 22w, 182w
Electronic equipment 1236–7w
Freedom of information 660w
Hotels 1238w
Information officers 21w
Internet 660w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry 22w
Legislation 21w
Pay 21–2w
Public expenditure 22w
Publicity 968–9w
Security 182–3w
Sick leave 1237w
Taxis 1237–8w
Telephone services 661–2w
Travel 183w
Written questions 661–3w

Northern Ireland Police Service
see Police Service of Northern Ireland

Northern Lighthouse Board
Public relations 381–2w

Northern Rock
13ws
Public relations 852w

Northumberland
Local government 297–8w

Norwich
Driving offences 113–4w

Norwich-London railway line
199w, 384w

Nottingham
Crime prevention 628–9

Nottinghamshire
Police 356

Nuclear power
326w, 558w, 1124w
Iran 576w

Nuclear power stations
Bradwell-on-Sea 483–4
Oldbury 1125w
Public consultation 421–2w

Nuclear weapons
100w, 1214–5w
Proliferation 359w

Nurses
Graduates 161w
Training 46–7w, 759w

Nursing homes
see Care homes

Nutrition Action Plan Delivery Board
161–2w

Oaten, Mr Mark
Questions
Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda 770–1w
Democratic Republic of Congo, Asylum 713w
Democratic Republic of Congo, Politics and government 805w
Entry clearances 719w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 724w
Learning and Skills Council for England, Correspondence 1095w
Prisoners, Voting rights 1042–3w
Telephone services, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Telephone services, Government departments 1255–6w
VAT, Medical equipment 856–7w
Wickham Research Laboratories, Animal experiments 417w
Work capability assessment 1022–4w

Obesity
Death 1250–1w
Sports 964w, 1172–3w

O'Brien, Rt Hon Mike, Minister of State, Dept of Health
Chamber Debates
Gastrointestinal cancer, Surgery (09.12.2009) 475–8
Westminster Hall Debates
General practitioners (16.12.2009) 272–6wh
Written Statements
Pharmaceutical price regulation scheme 59–60ws
Questions
Accident and emergency departments, Greater London 280w, 1308w
Ambulance services 733–5w
Ambulance services, Emergency calls 1309w
Baby care units 751w
Back pain, Waiting lists 736–7w
Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust 161w, 737w
Care Quality Commission 281–2w, 478–80w, 744–6w
Gastrointestinal cancer, Surgery 759–60w
Health services, East of England 161w
Health services, Greater London 478w, 757w
Health services, Leeds 1318w
Hearing aids, Greater London 747w
Hospital beds 153w
Hospital beds, Greater London 1317w
Hospital beds, Surrey 747w
Hospitals, Admissions 479w, 747–8w
Hospitals, Inspections 1050–1w
Hospitals, Parking 160w
Hospitals, Standards 160w
Information Centre for Health and Social Care, Public relations 1313–4w
Intensive care, Greater London 747w
Mental health services 754w
Musculoskeletal disorders, Health services 153w
National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, Public relations 742w
NHS, Assets 1053–4w
NHS, Data protection 492–3w
NHS, DHL 493w
NHS, Drugs 756w
NHS, Finance 286w, 493w, 757w
NHS, Information and communications technology 493–4w, 757w, 1319–20w
NHS, Private patients 757w

O'Brien, Rt Hon Mike, —continued
NHS, Procurement 287w, 757–8w
NHS Business Services Authority, Consultants 755–6w
NHS Connecting for Health, Expenditure 1319w
NHS Direct, Marketing 756w
NHS Supply Chain, Public relations 742w
Patient choice schemes 162–4w, 494w
Patients, Death 749w
Patients, Transport 760w
Pharmacy 494w
Pharmacy, General practitioners 1321w
Plastic surgery, Internet 760w
Prescription drugs 1054w
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 761w
Radiotherapy 767–8w
Sherwood Forest Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust, Finance 761–2w
Tranquillisers, Per capita costs 761w

O'Brien, Mr Stephen
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 291
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 682, 699, 706–7, 712–4, 717, 727, 734–9
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 180, 191
Westminster Hall Debates
Health services, Older people (16.12.2009) 278wh, 281wh, 284–91wh, 294–5wh
Questions
Basildon and Thurrock University Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust 1310w
Care homes 154w, 281w, 1312w
Chequers, Ministerial policy advisers 710w
Coeliac disease 469w
Disability living allowance 16
Health services, Social enterprises 288–9w
Home care services 165–6w, 289–95w, 494–8w, 553–4w, 762–5w, 1057w, 1321–4w
Hospital beds 153w
Hospitals, Inspections 1050–1w
Impact assessments, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1097w
Impact assessments, Dept of Health 285w, 749w
Impact assessments, Taxation 1099w
Legislation, Dept of Health 491w, 751w
NHS, Data protection 492–3w
NHS, DHL 493w
NHS, Information and communications technology 493–4w, 757w, 1319–20w
NHS, Procurement 287w, 757–8w
NHS Connecting for Health, Expenditure 1319w
Nutrition Action Plan Delivery Board 161–2w
Official engagements, Dept of Health 743w
Palliative care 162w
Social security benefits, Disabled 18, 1055–7w
Social services 552–3w, 762w, 765–7w, 1057–8w, 1323–4w
Social services, Finance 549–50w
Swine flu, Vaccination 499–500w
Transplant surgery 500–1w

Occupational pensions
4–6, 15

Occupied territories
Housing 1034w

Offences against children
960–1
Health services 156–7w
Internet 560–1w, 568w

Offences against the administration of justice
1242–6w

Offenders
725w
Deportation 533w
Females 61–2ws, 257w
Foreign nationals 76–7w
Ministry of Justice 107w
Northern Ireland 533w
Rehabilitation 440–52w

Offensive weapons
Schools 147–8w

Office for Criminal Justice Reform
Finance 692–3w

Office for Tenants and Social Landlords
see Tenant Services Authority

Office of Fair Trading
Conferences 1096w
Hotels 1095–6w

Office of Public Sector Information
451w

Office of Rail Regulation
Conferences 1160–1w
Hotels 634w
Internet 631–2w

Office of the Commissioner for Children and Young People for Northern Ireland
see Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People

Office of the Secretary of State for Wales
Billing 1140w
Buildings 642w
Chief information officers 642w
Christmas 642w
Conferences 643w, 1140w
Electronic equipment 643w
Freedom of information 179w
Hotels 644w
Internet 643w
Legislation 1140w
Manpower 179w
Official hospitality 643w
Pay 981w, 1140–1w
Publicity 643w
Security 179w
Sick leave 981w
Training 644w, 981w
Written questions 349w, 1141w

Official cars
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 11w
Dept for International Development 137w
Dept of Health 155w
Exhaust emissions 971w
Home Office 1107w
Ministry of Defence 1208w

Official engagements
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Dept of Health 743w
Ministry of Defence 835w
Prime Minister 2w, 346–7, 353, 956
Treasury 1254w

Official gifts
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225w

Official hospitality
Cabinet Office 1132w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 191–2w
Dept for International Development 807w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w, 925w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1029w
Ministry of Defence 366w
Ministry of Justice 793w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Scotland Office 526w

Ofgem
see Gas and Electricity Markets Authority

Oikos Storage
Canvey Island 997w

Oil
326–7w
Iraq 237–8w
Excise duties 405w

Oils
Waste disposal 378–9w

Oldbury
Nuclear power stations 1125w

Older people
Care homes see Care homes
Community relations 895–6w
Health services (16.12.2009) 277–99wh
Housing 905–6w, 1282w

Older workers
Training 1096–7w

Olympic Delivery Authority
Public relations 641w, 1170w

Olympic Games 2012
641w, 962–3w
Culture 1219–20w
East Sussex 102w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1036w
River Thames 641–2w
Security 1220w
West Midlands 1221w

Opening hours
Revenue and Customs 1382w

Operating costs
Government Equalities Office 578w

Öpik, Lembit
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 391
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 837, 839
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 908–9
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 158
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 2wh, 6wh
Questions
Dietary supplements, Death 1128–9w
Dietary supplements, Health hazards 1047w

Opinion Leader Research
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1125w

Opposition days
Disabled (08.12.2009) 154–213
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 214–67

Ordnance Survey
591w, 916w, 997w, 1301w
Public relations 592w

Organic farming
379w, 652w

Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe
1036w

Origin marking
Food 487–90, 494, 497, 534w
Israel 28ws, 579–80w, 582–3w, 653w, 852–3w, 977w, 1229–30w
Morocco 1229–30w

Osborne, Mr George
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 371–4
Questions
Business, Government assistance 784
Public expenditure 797

Ottaway, Richard
Questions
Mortgages, Government assistance 18–9
Occupational pensions 4–5
Public companies, Voting rights 1102w

Out of area treatment
Wales 644w

Out of town shopping centres
Planning permission 299w

Out-of-court Disposals Review
60–1ws

Overseas aid
253w, 979w
Afghanistan 134–5w
Bangladesh 548–9w
Ethiopia 139–40ws
Palestinians 353w, 576–7w, 1230w, 1343–5w

Overseas price mechanism
241w

Overseas students
340w
Entry clearances (08.12.2009) 56–64wh, 74–6w, 221–3w, 625–6, 633–4, 711–2w, 719–20w, 723–4w

Overseas Territories Consultative Council
1036–7w

Overseas visitors
Holiday accommodation 193w

Owen, Albert
Chamber Debates
Grocery Market Ombudsman Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 978
Questions
Knives, Crime 962

Paice, Mr James
Questions
Agriculture, Energy 1377w
Birds of prey, East of England 645w
Natural England 652w
Rural development programme 653–4w

Pakistan
Entry clearances 638, 720w, 1111w

Palestinian-Israeli conflict
see Middle East

Palestinians
1037w
Deportation 413–4w
Education 352w
Human rights 1037w
Overseas aid 353w, 576–7w, 1230w, 1343–5w
Politics and government 1230w
Religious freedom 241w

Palliative care
162w

Panchen Lama
1037–8w

Paper
Dept for Communities and Local Government 398w

Parenting orders
228–9w, 561–2w

Parking
Dept for Transport 33–4w
Fees and charges 66w
Hospitals 160w
Royal parks 672w

Parks
Merseyside 398w

Parliamentary private secretaries
711w

Parliamentary Standards Authority
see Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority

Passenger ships
Liverpool 142ws

Passport and Identity Service see Identity and Passport Service

Passports
414–5w, 568–9w, 1116w
Fees and charges 416w

Paterson, Mr Owen
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 315
Questions
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 954–5

Pathogens Access Appeals Commission
451–2w

Patient choice schemes
162–4w, 494w

Patients
Death 749w
Transport 760w

Pay
Armed forces 204w
Banks 786–7
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 334–5w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 986w, 1266w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 647w
Dept for International Development 1342–3w
Dept for Transport 629–31w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322–3w
Dept of Health 741w
Electoral Commission 1w
Home Office 716–7w
Independent Police Complaints Commission 1393w

Pay—continued*
Infrastructure Planning Commission 1296–8w
Learning and Skills Council for England 607–8w
Ministers 961
Ministry of Defence 830–1w
Northern Ireland Office 21–2w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w, 1140–1w
Public sector 786–7, 842–3w
Royal Mail 48w
Student Loans Company 1366–7w
Teachers 150w
Treasury 1007w

Peace negotiations
Middle East 778w, 958

Peacekeeping operations
Afghanistan (08.12.2009) 1–24wh, 14–5ws, 87–9w, 201–2w, 209–11w, 348–9, 361–2w, 810w, 814–6w, 826w, 954–5w, 1202–4w, 1218w, 1231–2w
Finance 1230–1w
Iraq 98w, 211w, 238w, 810w, 1204w, 1219w, 1231–2w
Nigeria 99w
Sierra Leone 99w

Pearson, Ian, Economic Secretary to the Treasury*
Written Statements
Fiscal Responsibility Bill 2009–10 21ws
Questions
Banks, Finance 792, 1005w
Banks, Loans 791–2
Business, Government assistance 1005–6w
Council tax, Valuation 580–1w, 1378w
Defence Training College 52w
Fiscal policy 1379–80w
Government Actuary's Department, Hotels 850w
Government Actuary's Department, Internet 851w
Insolvency 797
Non-domestic rates, Garages and petrol stations 1381w
Non-domestic rates, Microgeneration 1008w
Non-domestic rates, Ports 852w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 405–6w, 583w, 851–2w, 857w, 1300–1w, 1303w, 1306–7w
Stock market 781–2
Unemployment, Young people 794, 1009w

Pelling, Andrew
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 89
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 307–8
Local government (10.12.2009) 576, 578
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 219, 253–5
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 756–7, 763
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 666
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 366
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1003, 1048
Questions
Buses, Injuries 969–70w
Business questions 513
Cemeteries, Islam 1239w
Civil servants, Location 1377w
Illegal immigrants, Croydon 636
Teachers, Training 150–1w
UK Border Agency 629

Pembrokeshire
Rescue services 835w, 980–1w, 1217–8w

Pendle
Building schools for the future programme 674–5w

Penning, Mike
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 299
Questions
Ambulance services, Crimes of violence 1308–9w
Ambulance services, Emergency calls 1309w
Members, Correspondence 160–1w, 1226w
Patients, Transport 766w

Penrose, John
Questions
Food, Origin marking 488, 534w
Members, Correspondence 773w

Pension credit
784–5w, 845w
Greater London 785–6w

Pensioners
Fuel poverty 1122–3w, 1336w
Income 249w
Leeds 1381w
Poverty (10.12.2009) 143–76wh
Social security benefits 12, 787–8w
Taxation 57w, 1381w

Pensions
Armed forces 91–2w, 205w
Electricity 420w
Gurkhas 205w
Local government 904w, 1291–2w
Members 110ws
Public sector 853–4w
Tax allowances 21–2ws

Permanent Secretary Government Communications
see Government Communications

Personal accounts
1019w

Personal Care at Home Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
2R, Programme motion and Money res* (14.12.2009) 664–746

Personal injury
Compensation 273–4w, 1041w

Personal records
Borders 1104w
Departmental coordination 20

Peru
Trade agreements 1099w

Pest control
House of Commons 893w

Peterborough
Social security benefits 249–50w

Petitions
Armed forces (14.12.2009) 21–3p
Asylum (16.12.2009) 1070–1
Climate change (09.12.2009) 468, (15.12.2009) 934
Equitable Life Assurance Society (08.12.2009) 288, 295, 323, (10.12.2009) 17p, (14.12.2009) 23–34p, 772, (15.12.2009) 37p, 40–1p, (16.12.2009) 58–60p, 1069
Health centres (15.12.2009) 935–6
Home Education Independent Review (07.12.2009) 1–4p, (08.12.2009) 5–12p, 268–326, (09.12.2009) 13–4p, 466–8,

Petitions—continued*
470–1, (10.12.2009) 15–6p, 608–9, (14.12.2009) 770–3, (15.12.2009) 35–40p, 932–3, 935–8, (16.12.2009) 45–61p, 1068–71
Kurds (15.12.2009) 938
Malta (15.12.2009) 934–5
Middle East (10.12.2009) 17–8p
Mobile homes (09.12.2009) 467
Mugabo, Adela Mahoro (09.12.2009) 469–70
Post offices (09.12.2009) 468
Princess Royal Barracks (09.12.2009) 469
Shops (15.12.2009) 41–4p
Sri Lanka (10.12.2009) 18–20p
Travel (09.12.2009) 469
Waste disposal (16.12.2009) 61–2p

Pharmaceutical price regulation scheme
59–60ws

Pharmacy
494w
General practitioners 1321w

Philippines
Politics and government 242w

Phillis Review
see Government Communications Review

Physical education
Kent 693w

Pinderfields and Pontefract Hospitals NHS Trust
Manpower 287–8w

Pipex Homecall
Complaints 344w

Piracy
636w
Somalia 213w

Pitt Review
see Flooding Lessons Learned Review

Planning
Transport 639–40w

Planning obligations
148

Planning permission
997–9w
Appeals 66w, 1302w
Historic buildings 902w
Natural gas 140–1
Out of town shopping centres 299w
Ports 307w, 995w
Pyestock 962–4
Renewable energy 307w

Plants
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 668w
Dept for Transport 542w
Leader of the House of Commons 710w
Solicitor-General 1003–4w

Plaskitt, James
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 222

Plastic surgery
Internet 760w

Playgrounds
Finance 693–4w

Playing fields
East of England 193–4w
Schools 672w

Plea bargaining
Fraud 1246w

Pleural plaques
Compensation 1041w

Poisoning
 Carbon monoxide 305w

Police
 Bureaucracy 623–5, 633
 Databases 799–800w
 Demonstrations 634
 Essex 569–70w, 725–7w
 Hoaxes and false alarms 1242–6w
 Inspections 637
 Learning disability 80–3w
 Manpower 631–3
 North Yorkshire 630
 Northern Ireland 374–5w
 Nottinghamshire 356
 Reorganisation 569w
 Skin piercing 1392–3w

Police cautions
 230w
 Domestic violence 463w
 Rape 463w

Police community support officers
 619–20
 North Yorkshire 725w

Police Complaints Independent Commission
 see Independent Police Complaints Commission

Police Service of Northern Ireland
 Finance 969w
 Recruitment 949–51

Political Honours Scrutiny Committee
 3w

Political parties
 Conferences 83–4w

Political refugees
 see Asylum

Politics and government
 Afghanistan 354–5w, 571–3w
 Burma (09.12.2009) 73–96wh
 Democratic Republic of Congo 805w
 Fiji 26–7w
 Moldova 577w
 Palestinians 1230w
 Philippines 242w
 Sri Lanka 105–7ws, 577–8w
 Sudan 360w, 809–10w
 Western Sahara 359w, 1229w

Pollution
 Seas and oceans 1143–5w

Polyclinics and GP-led health centres see Health centres

Pope, Mr Greg
 Questions
 Child benefit 846w

Population
 727w
 Afghanistan 354w
 East of England 841–2w
 Leeds 1136w

Ports
 Inland waterways 16–7w
 Non-domestic rates 852w, 1300w
 Planning permission 307w, 993w

Post Office
 Disciplinary proceedings 946w
 Finance 47w
 Information and communications technology 947–8w

Post office card account
 Castle Point 1019–20w

Post offices
 946–7w
 Bank services 255w
 Closures 47w

Post offices*—continued*
 Petitions (09.12.2009) 468

Postal services
 Armed forces 1365w

Postal Services Commission
 Conferences 1345w
 Hotels 949w
 Internet 949w

Poultry
 17w
 Animal welfare 501

Poverty
 249w
 Afghanistan 804w
 Children 391–2, 837–9w
 Pensioners (10.12.2009) 143–76wh

Power failures
 1125w

Power stations
 Biofuels 921w

Pre-Budget Report 2009
 (09.12.2009) 359–86

Prentice, Bridget, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Justice
 Written Statements
 Civil Law Reform Bill (Draft) 115–6ws
 Legal aid 141ws
 Questions
 Access to Justice Act 1999 256–7w
 Asylum 68w
 Cemeteries, Islam 1239w
 Crown courts 791–2w
 Debts, Advisory services 258w
 Legal aid 434–5w, 622w
 Legal aid, Asylum 272–3w
 Legal aid, Hazel Grove 796–9w
 Legal aid, North West 437–8w
 Legal profession, Females 436w
 Legal Services Commission, Public relations 1242w
 Northern Ireland Court Service, Public relations 532–3w
 Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission, Public relations 533w, 657–8w
 Personal injury, Compensation 273–4w, 1041w
 Pleural plaques, Compensation 1041w
 Solicitors Regulation Authority, Public relations 625w

Prentice, Mr Gordon
 Chamber Debates
 Defence (15.12.2009) 812
 Freedom of information (14.12.2009) 774–7
 Public sector (07.12.2009) 38
 Questions
 Afghanistan, Armed forces 811w
 Archives, Prime Minister 181–2w
 Building schools for the future programme, Pendle 674–5w
 Community relations, Faith schools 678w
 Council tax 60w
 Embassies, Closures 237w
 Freedom of information, Cabinet Office 342–3, 639w
 House of Commons, Pest control 893w
 Housing benefit, Fraud 992w
 Immigration, Heads of state 720w
 NHS, Information and communications technology 26
 Patients, Death 749w
 Personal records, Departmental coordination 20

Prentice, Mr Gordon*—continued*
 Political Honours Scrutiny Committee 3w
 Public sector, Pay 842–3w
 Schools, Lancashire 1072w
 Secondment, Information Commissioner 621w
 Secondment, Ministry of Justice 792w
 Taxation, Domicil 1382–3w

Presbyterian Mutual Society
 1233w

Pre-school education
 694w
 Finance 25–6ws, 694w
 Hampstead 1173–4w

Prescription drugs
 1054w

Prescriptions
 Fees and charges 761w

Press
 Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w

Pressure sores
 Death 1131–2w

Price, Adam
 Chamber Debates
 National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 913
 Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 385
 Questions
 Public expenditure, Wales 798

Prices
 Alcoholic drinks 214w, 465–6w
 Energy 326w, 420–1w
 Housing 305w, 907–10w, 994w, 1286w

Primarolo, Rt Hon Dawn, Minister of State, Dept for Children, Schools and Families
 Written Statements
 Pre-school education, Finance 25–6ws
 Questions
 Child minding, South East 423–4w
 Children, Abuse 146w
 Children, Databases 138w, 675–6w
 Children, Day care 422–3w, 676w, 1174w
 Children, Protection 676–7w
 Children, Social services 424w
 Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service, Complaints 1062w
 Children in care, Guardianship 694–5w
 Children's centres 701–8w, 1063–4w
 Children's centres, Barnsley 1064w
 Extracurricular activities 1066–7w
 Families, Advisory services 314–5w
 Family and Parenting Institute 141–2w
 Family intervention projects 424–5w
 Foster care 687w
 National Safeguarding Delivery Unit 1069–70w
 Office for Criminal Justice Reform, Finance 692–3w
 Playgrounds, Finance 693–4w
 Pre-school education 694w
 Pre-school education, Finance 694w
 Pre-school education, Hampstead 1173–4w
 Public expenditure, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 313–4w, 678–82w
 Sure start programme, Hampstead 313w
 Sure start programme, Lincolnshire 313w
 Teenage pregnancy 151w
 Young offenders 709–10w
 Young people, Alcoholic drinks 1084w
 Young people, Homelessness 676w
 Young people, Video games 1062–3w

Primarolo, Rt Hon Dawn, —continued
Youth Opportunity Fund 431w
Youth services, Greater London 151–2w

Primary education
Admissions 26–8ws

Primates
Sales 17–8w

Prime Minister
Archives 181–2w
Conferences 966w
Consultants 2–3w
Electronic equipment 966w
Energy 1253w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser 2w
Hotels 1256w
Information officers 251w
Official engagements 2w, 346–7, 353, 956
Security 547w

Princess Royal Barracks
Petitions (09.12.2009) 469

Prisk, Mr Mark
Chamber Debates
Equitable Life Assurance Society, Petitions (08.12.2009) 287–8
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 288
Questions
Business, Government assistance 934–7w
Business, Taxation 255–6w, 406w, 856w
Housing, Carbon emissions 339–40w
Manufacturing industries, Closures 47w

Prison accommodation
119–22w

Prison sentences
127–8w

Prison Service
Industrial disputes 622w
Manpower 275w

Prisoner escapes
123w
East Sutton Park Prison 115w

Prisoners
Children in care 801w
Females 115w, 118–9w
Gender identity disorder 283–4w
Iraq 27w
Israel 357w
Mentally ill 118–9w
Repatriation 230–1w, 1116w, 1393w
Suicide 1042w
Voting rights 1042–3w

Prisoners' release
800–1w
Foreign nationals 23w, 800w
Homicide 116w
Northern Ireland 23w

Prisons
452–60w
Alcoholic drinks 124w
Collective worship 801w
Crimes of violence 789–91w
Drugs 122–4w, 274–5w, 1047–8w
Education 128–9w, 1363–4w
North West 462w
Northern Ireland 951–2
Overcrowding 274w
Security 124–6w
Smuggling 123–4w
Sussex 122w
Television 1245w
Training 459–61w
Visits 1043w
Wales 275–6w

Pritchard, Mark
Questions
Abortion 1044w
Africa, Water 136–7w, 252w
Agriculture, Engineers 184w
Al Muhajiroun 1261w
Cybercrime 602–3w
Cybercrime, Energy 927w, 1340w
Electronic warfare 1210–1w
Equatorial Guinea, Human rights 237w
Primates, Sales 17–8w

Private Members' bills
(07.12.2009) 124, (08.12.2009) 268, (09.12.2009) 466, (10.12.2009) 607–8, (14.12.2009) 770, (15.12.2009) 931, (16.12.2009) 1068

Private patients
NHS 757w

Private rented housing
133–5, 403–4w
Greater London 1000w

Private roads
Litter 994w

Private sector
Sewers 18w, 190–1w

Probation
801–2w
Information and communications technology 118w
Wales 801–2w

Probation officers
South East 461–4w

Programme motions
see Timetabling of bills

Proliferation
Nuclear weapons 359w

Property development
Floods 145–7, 402–3w, 1142–3w, 1302w

Prosecutions
Animal welfare 623w
Hunting Act 2004 434w
Truancy 279–80w

Prostitution
631–2

Public appointments
National Policing Improvement Agency 416–7w
Thurrock Council 135

Public companies
Voting rights 1102w

Public expenditure
127ws, 789–90, 793–5, 797, 853w, 1006w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 938w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 313–4w, 678–82w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 987w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1172w
Dept for Work and Pensions 245w, 410w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 323w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 240–1w
Government Equalities Office 251w
Home Office 1107–8w
Ministry of Defence 366w
Northern Ireland Office 22w
Treasury 254w
Wales 798

Public finance
790–1

Public libraries
Non-domestic rates 996w

Public relations
Arts Council England East 529–30w
Audit Commission 57–60w
Big Lottery Fund 104w
British Board of Film Classification 102–3w
British Council 574–5w
British Museum 192w
British Transport Police 542w
British Waterways Board 648w
Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice for Northern Ireland 659–60w
Church Commissioners 521w
Civil Aviation Authority 543w
Commission for Rural Communities 645–6w, 648–9w
Competition Commission 1091w
Crown Estate Commissioners 847w
Cycling England 542–3w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1068w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Dept of Health 282w
Digital switchover help scheme 371w
Digital UK 192w
Energy Saving Trust 925w
Equality and Human Rights Commission 351–2w
Financial Services Authority 850w
Food Standards Agency 742–3w
Gambling Commission 370–1w
Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 929w
Heritage Lottery Fund 370w
House of Commons 664w
Identity and Passport Service 720w
Information Centre for Health and Social Care 1313–4w
Legal Services Commission 1242w
Met Office 366w
Minister for the Olympics 641w
Ministry of Defence 831w
National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts 343–4w
National Forest Company 647w
National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence 742w
National Lottery Commission 668w
National Policing Improvement Agency 1115–6w
NHS Blood and Transplant 1313w
NHS Supply Chain 742w
Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People 663w
Northern Ireland Court Service 532–3w
Northern Ireland Equality Commission 374w
Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 1238w
Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission 533w, 657–8w
Northern Lighthouse Board 381–2w
Northern Rock 852w
Olympic Delivery Authority 641w, 1170w
Ordnance Survey 592w
Remploy 525–6w
Risk and Regulation Advisory Council 344w
Royal Mail 344–5w
Royal Mint 855w
School Food Trust 1071w
Solicitors Regulation Authority 625w
Sport England 101w
Student Loans Company 1367w
Tenant Services Authority 1307w
VisitBritain 668w
Waste and Resources Action Programme 647–8w, 654–5w

Public sector
1–2ws
Information 948–50w
Lancashire 842–3w
Ministerial statements (07.12.2009) 29–39
Pay 786–7, 842–3w
Pensions 853–4w

Public transport
Autism 1168–9w
Crimes of violence 38w, 971w
North West 635–6w
Tickets 122ws, 385–6w

Public Works Loan Board
Hotels 851w
Internet 848w

Publications
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555–6w

Publicity
Cabinet Office 1133w
Climate change 1119w, 1331–2w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 897–8w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Dept for International Development 807w
Dept for Transport 1161w
Dept of Health 743w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 575w
Home Office 1108w
Ministry of Defence 831w
Northern Ireland Office 968–9w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 643w
Revenue and Customs 854w
Scotland Office 526w

Pugh, John
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 999, 1027
Westminster Hall Debates
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 82–4wh, 87wh, 95wh
Questions
Dangerous dogs 186–8w
Hospitals, Admissions 470–2w
National curriculum tests, Expenditure 144w
New deal for young people 1150w
Offenders, Foreign nationals 76–7w
Reoffenders 126w
Repatriation, Prisoners 230–1w, 1116w, 1393w
Taliban 360w

Pupil exclusions
137–8w, 145–6w
Tourettes syndrome 1070–1w

Pupil referral units
Per capita costs 146–7w

Pupils
Greater London 1071w
Herefordshire 147w
Per capita costs 147–8w, 700w

Purchase, Mr Ken
Questions
Banks, Pay 786

Pyestock
Planning permission 962–4

Racially aggravated offences
Northern Ireland 183w

Radiation exposure
Exservicemen 97–8w, 205w, 210w, (10.12.2009) 610–8

Radicalism
Civil servants 417w
Students 28w, 1375w

Radio frequencies
800

Radioactive waste
AWE Management 365w
Waste management 1341w

Radiotherapy
767–8w

RAF Fairford
1216–7w

RAF Lyneham
1217w

RAF Welford
1217w

Railway network
38w, 199w

Railway stations
39–40w
Greater London 40–2w
Repairs and maintenance 637w
Security 42w

Railways
64–6ws
Construction (08.12.2009) 25–48wh, 63–4ws
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Dept for Transport 543w, 633w
Electrification 42–3w, 962
Fares 1165w
Fuels 45w
Home Office 1389w
Kent 43w
Liverpool 43w
Standards 384–5w
West Midlands 797

Rammell, Bill, Minister of State, Ministry of Defence
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 201w, 811w
Afghanistan, Detainees 812–3w
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 810w, 816w, 955w, 1203–4w
Air force, Deployment 202w, 955–6w
Air force, Military bases 89–90w, 1215–6w
Armed forces 816–20w
Armed forces, Manpower 822w, 957w
Armed forces, Northern Ireland 823w
Armed forces, Training 958–9w, 1204–5w
British Forces Post Office 211w
Cluster munitions 206w
Defence equipment, Bridges 959w
EC law, Ministry of Defence 831–2w
EU battlegroups 210w
Internet, Ministry of Defence 828–30w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Ministry of Defence 833–4w
Joint rapid reaction force 1212w
Middle East, Armed conflict 834w
Military aircraft, Deployment 1212w
Military aircraft, Helicopters 1205w
Military aircraft, Navy 960w
Public expenditure, Ministry of Defence 366w
RAF Fairford 1216–7w
RAF Lyneham 1217w
RAF Welford 1217w
Rescue services, Helicopters 368w
Rescue services, Pembrokeshire 835w, 960–1w, 1217–8w
Royal Naval Reserve 212w
Somalia, Piracy 213w
Territorial Army 99–100w

Rammell, Bill, —continued
University Officer Training Corps 836–8w, 1205w

Randall, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (10.12.2009) 608–9
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 754–64

Rape
Police cautions 463w

Rapid transit systems
637–8w

Raves
East Sussex 230w

Reading Borough Council Bill 2007–08
Chamber Debates
Order for consideration read (10.12.2009) 483

Real Estate Investment Trusts (Prescribed Arrangements) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(08.12.2009) 267

Recess motions
(16.12.2009) 983–1068

Reciprocal arrangements
Health services 284–5w

Reconstruction
Afghanistan 135–6w, 355w, 573w, 1024w

Recruitment
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1148w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 419w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w, 575w
Police Service of Northern Ireland 949–51

Recycling
Christmas cards 977w
Christmas trees 916w, 977w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 682–3w

Redundancy
NHS 489w

Redundancy pay
Civil servants 349w

Redwood, Rt Hon John
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 308–9
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 215, 227, 236, 242, 245–50, 259
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 757
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 379
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 827
Questions
DP World 1379w
Public expenditure 795
Royal Bank of Scotland, Finance 1376w

Reed, Mr Andy
Questions
Bermuda, Firearms 1024w
Economic growth 793
Third sector, Government assistance 337–8
Warm front scheme 932w

Reed, Jamie
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 404, 414, 417
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 51, 54, 60, 77, 90–4
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 844, 866, 885–8
Floods, Cumbria (08.12.2009) 327–30, 333

Refugees
see Asylum

Regeneration
Bexley 404w
Coalville 150–1
Housing 305w
Kirkby 298w
Liverpool 139–40

Regional government
1303–4w

Regional planning and development
916w, 1080w

Registration of births deaths marriages and civil partnerships
Bexley 1136–7w

Regulation
Audit 1098w
Aviation 39–40ws
Business 965–6
Charities 350w
Complementary medicine 155w
Financial services 405w, 785–6, 1007w
Social rented housing 67w

Rehabilitation
Drugs 476w, 1048–9w
Offenders 440–52w
Sexual offences 277–8w

Religion
Voluntary work 1258w

Religious freedom
359–60w
Israel 238w
Palestinians 241w

Remand in custody
Ashford Kent 464w

Remembrance Day
British overseas territories 575w

Remploy
Public relations 525–6w

Renewable energy
559w, 1125–6w
Developing countries 134w
EC law 1126w
Fuel oil 422w
Planning permission 307w
Waste 20w, 534w

Renewables Advisory Board
327w

Renewables obligation
327–8w

Rennie, Willie
Questions
Afghanistan, Ministry of Defence 813–4w
Armed forces, Health 821–2w
Armed forces, Housing 90–1w
British Forces Post Office 211w
Compensation, Ministry of Defence 365w
Defence equipment 207–9w
Defence equipment, Lost property 823–4w
Devonport Dockyard 97w

Rennie, Willie—continued*
Drinking water, Ministry of Defence 96w
Dunfermline Building Society 798
Empty property, Ministry of Defence 828w
Official engagements, Ministry of Defence 835w
Trident submarines 1218w

Rent a room scheme
255w

Rented housing
916–7w
Fire prevention (15.12.2009) 239–46wh

Rents
Council housing 896w, 984w
Social rented housing 309w

Reoffenders
126w, 1246–8w
Domestic violence 463–4w

Repatriation
Asylum 1043w
Prisoners 230–1w, 1116w, 1393w

Repossession orders
Mortgages 917w, 995w, 1304–5w
Rural areas 917w

Republic of Ireland
Entry clearances 1111–2w
Travellers 920w

Rescue services
Helicopters 368w
Pembrokeshire 835w, 960–1w, 1217–8w

Research
Bees 501
Chronic fatigue syndrome 46w
Dementia 738–9w
EC grants and loans 1346w
Food 493–4
Horticulture 15–6w
Housing 909–11w

Resettlement
Ilois 356–7w

Residential care homes
see Care homes

Retail trade
Crimes of violence 563–4w

Retirement
411w

Revenue and Customs
54–6w
Hotels 854w
Internet 854w
Opening hours 1382w
Publicity 854w
Somerset 855w

Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office
Hotels 1004–6w
Internet 890–1w

Rifkind, Sir Malcolm
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 807–8

Right to buy scheme
Rural areas 592–3w

Rights of way
Appeals 1143w

Risk and Regulation Advisory Council
Public relations 344w

Risk assessment
Fire services 1269–70w

Ritual slaughter
502

River Dee
Salmon 539w

River Severn
Tidal power 1339w

River Tame
EC law 188–9w

River Thames
Olympic Games 2012 641–2w

Rivers
Fly tipping 501–2

Road traffic control
638w

Road traffic offences
231w

Roads
Accidents 199–200w, 386–8w, 544w, 638–9w, 1165–7w
Berkshire 199–200w, 386w
Construction 639–40w
Cumbria 34–5w
Freight 1167w
Litter 486–7
Repairs and maintenance 44w
Snow and ice 122–4ws, 544w

Robathan, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 655
Business questions intervention (10.12.2009) 508
Defence (15.12.2009) 815
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (10.12.2009) 609
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 752, 756, 759
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 208
Questions
Bovine tuberculosis, Disease control 495–6
Home information packs 144–5, 152
Poultry, Animal welfare 501
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 1234w

Robertson, Angus
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 661
Defence (15.12.2009) 812–3
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 975
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 209–10w, 362w, 955w, 1203w
Armed forces, Absence without leave 956w
Defence, USA 214w
Defence equipment, Bridges 959w
Members, Correspondence 834w
Military aircraft 209w
Nuclear weapons 100w, 1214–5w
Trident missiles 100w, 213–4w

Robertson, Hugh
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 814
Questions
East Sutton Park Prison, Prisoner escapes 115w
Olympic Games 2012 641w, 962–3w
Sport Legacy Delivery Board 530w
Sports, Non-domestic rates 591w
UK School Games 105–6w

Robertson, John
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 813
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 47, 60, 62

INDEX—SESSION 2009–2010

7th December–16th December 2009

Robertson, John—continued*
Questions
Capital investment 795–6
Departmental responsibilities, Treasury 795
Horticulture 538w
International assistance, Vaccination 1006w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 952

Robertson, Mr Laurence
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 838, 845, 859, 874–6
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 311–2
Questions
Child Maintenance and Enforcement Commission, Information and communications technology 1009w
Hazardous substances, Waste disposal 19w
Legal Services Commission, Fees and charges 117w
Low flying 98w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 949

Robinson, Mr Geoffrey
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 654

Robinson, Mrs Iris
Questions
Magilligan Prison 23–4w, 183w

Rochdale
Common land 502

Rogerson, Daniel
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 580, 597–600
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 237, 241
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 503

Rolling stock
45w, 388w
East coast railway line 543–4w

Rooney, Mr Terry
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 827
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 143–6wh, 163wh
Questions
Business questions 512

Rosindell, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (14.12.2009) 771–2
Remembrance Day, Points of order (16.12.2009) 977
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 810w
Biofuels 320w
Climate change 922–3w
Climate change, International cooperation 321w
Climate change, Publicity 1119w, 1331–2w
Cycling 29–30w
Cycling, Safety 30w
Electric vehicles 508w
Military aircraft, Deployment 1212w
Motor vehicles, Fuels 31–2w
Oil 326–7w
Parking, Dept for Transport 33–4w

Rosindell, Mr Andrew—continued*
Sickle cell diseases, Health services 164–5w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 952–3
Travel, Dept for Transport 970w
Unemployment, Young people 1–2

Rowen, Paul
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 161–5wh, 168wh, 170wh, 174wh
Questions
Building societies 1005w
Census 345
Chronic fatigue syndrome, Research 46w
Common land, Rochdale 502
Employment and support allowance, Mentally ill 781w
Excise duties, Alcoholic drinks 582w
Schools, Asbestos 138w

Roy, Lindsay
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 1203w
Child tax credit 353
Official engagements, Prime Minister 353
Sudan, Politics and government 809–10w
Trade unions, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1038–9w
Unemployment 299w

Royal Auxiliary Air Force
212w

Royal Bank of Scotland
Finance 1376w
Loans 583–4w

Royal Fleet Auxiliary
836w, 1208w

Royal Mail
Industrial disputes 48w, 514–5w
Pay 48w
Public relations 344–5w

Royal Mint
Public relations 855w

Royal Naval Reserve
212w

Royal Navy
see Navy

Royal parks
Fixed penalties 115–6w
Parking 672w

RRS James Cook
49w

Ruane, Chris
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 111–2
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 216
Westminster Hall Debates
Bone marrow disorders, Donors (15.12.2009) 231–5wh
Rented housing, Fire prevention (15.12.2009) 240wh
Questions
Blood, Donors 467–8w
Bone marrow disorders, Donors 468–9w
Children, Mental health 316–7w
Cholesterol 1044–5w
Cord blood 470w
Driving offences 262w
Electoral Commission, Finance 152
Electoral register 840w
Employment, Northern Ireland 531–2w
Hospitals, Hygiene 285w
Hospitals, Infectious diseases 479–80w
Housing, Regeneration 305w
Incapacity benefit 170–2w

Ruane, Chris—continued*
Multiple occupation, Licensing 140
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Recruitment 950
Schools, Playing fields 672w

Ruddock, Joan, Minister of State, Dept of Energy and Climate Change*
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 87, 117–22
Questions
Biofuels 320w, 1325–6w
Biofuels, Power stations 921w
Boilers, Standards 921–2w
Buildings, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 131w
Caparo Group, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 130w, 922w
Carbon emissions 320w, 417–8w, 1120w
Carbon emissions, Local government 134w
Carbon reduction commitment energy efficiency scheme 320–1w
Carbon sequestration 130w
Christmas, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 554w
Climate change 922–3w
Climate change, International cooperation 130w, 321–2w, 554–5w, 922w
Climate change, Publicity 1119w, 1332w
Committee on Climate Change 322w
Conferences, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Consultants, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1119w
Domestic visits, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Driving, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1120–1w
Electronic equipment, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w
Energy, Agriculture 1377w
Energy, Billing 928w
Energy, Conservation 927w
Energy, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Energy, Housing 131–2w, 324–7w, 420w, 1122w
Energy Saving Trust, Advertising 323–4w
Energy Saving Trust, Public relations 925w
Freedom of information, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923–4w
Hotels, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1337w
Information officers, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 418w
Internet, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322w, 418–9w, 924w
KBR, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 133w
Low carbon buildings programme 931w
Manpower, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1119–20w
Members, Correspondence 930w, 1338w
National Geoscience Data Centre 925w, 1123w
Official engagements, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Official hospitality, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 555w, 925w
Oil 326–7w
Opinion Leader Research, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1125w
Pay, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322–3w
Public expenditure, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 323w

Ruddock, Joan,—continued*
Recruitment, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 419w
Renewable energy, Developing countries 134w
Renewables Advisory Board 327w
Renewables obligation 327–8w
Salix Finance, Loans 328w
Scientific advisers, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Security, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Siemens, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 328w
Solar power 931–2w
Taxis, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 556w, 926w
Travel, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
UK Innovation Investment Fund 1123–4w
Working hours, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1334w
Written questions, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w

Ruffley, Mr David
Questions
National Express East Anglia, Complaints 42w
Norwich-London railway line 199w, 384w
Parenting orders 228–9w
Police, Bureaucracy 624–5
Police cautions 230w
Political parties, Conferences 83–4w
Prisons, Drugs 122–3w
Young offenders 709–10w, 1083–4w
Young people, Tobacco 233–4w
Young people, Video games 235w

Rugby
Television (09.12.2009) 128–35wh

Rural areas
Affordable housing 893–4w
Economic situation 495
Empty property 1307w
Financial services 496–7
Housing 305w, 395–6w, 591w
Repossession orders 917w
Right to buy scheme 592–3w
Schools 147–8w, 699–700w, 1074w
Specialised diplomas 1078w

Rural development programme
653–4w

Rural Payments Agency
Manpower 189–90w

Russell, Bob
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 658
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 935
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1014–7, 1030
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 154, 169, 178, 205
Questions
Elections, Armed forces 619w
Immigrants, Detainees 225–6w

Russia
Detainees 1231w

RV Prince Madog
47–8w

Ryan, Ms Joan
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 721

Ryan, Ms Joan—continued*
Questions
Mephedrone 567w
Schools, Enfield 698w

Safety and Conservation Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 979

Safety belts
Large goods vehicles (08.12.2009) 49–55wh

St Helena
Airports 114–5ws

St Kilda
Ministry of Defence 368–9w, 836w

Sales
Council housing 389–90w
Motor vehicles 1165–6w
Primates 17–8w

Salix Finance
Loans 328w

Salmon
River Dee 539w

Salter, Mr Martin
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 211–3wh, 217wh, 221wh

Sanctions
Iran 959

Sanders, Mr Adrian
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 312
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 58wh
Rented housing, Fire prevention (15.12.2009) 239–42wh, 245wh
Questions
Animal experiments 413w
Children, Protection 676–7w
Departmental reorganisation, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 547w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 75w
Families, Advisory services 314–5w
Fire prevention 584–5w
NHS, Information and communications technology 1319w
Older people, Community relations 895–6w
Older people, Housing 905–6w, 1282w
Pensioners, Fuel poverty 1122–3w
Sheltered housing 917–8w
Supporting people programme 919w

Saville Inquiry
see Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry

School Food Trust
Public relations 1071w

School Transport Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 981–2

Schools
Admissions 695–8w
Asbestos 138w, 317w
Crimes of violence 1104–5w
Drugs 147–8w
Electric cables 317w
Energy 1071–2w
Enfield 698w
Essex 317w
Finance 317–8w
Floods 698w
Herefordshire 318w
Homophobia 1068–9w
Lancashire 1072w

Schools—continued*
Leeds 1072–4w
Offensive weapons 147–8w
Playing fields 672w
Rural areas 147–8w, 699–700w, 1074w
Standards 148–9w, 318w
Yorkshire and the Humber 1073w

Science
Finance (15.12.2009) 224–30wh
Graduates 1358–60w
Teachers 707–8w

Scientific advisers
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1000w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 103w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 654w
Dept for Transport 1168w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 930w
Dept of Health 164w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 242w
Ministry of Defence 212–3w

Scientists
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 314w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Dept for Transport 633w
Dept for Work and Pensions 1150w
Dept of Health 155w

Scotland
Armed forces 203–4w
Asylum 713–4w
Electricity 1121–2w
Excise duties 629w

Scotland Office
Buildings 627w
Christmas 627w
Conferences 627w
Contracts 374w
Electronic equipment 627w
Freedom of information 526w
Hotels 527w
Internet 1175–6w
Lost property 628w
Official hospitality 526w
Publicity 526w
Sick leave 628w
Taxis 1w
Training 628w
Written questions 526–7w, 628–9w

Scott, Lee
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 215
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 750
Questions
Pay, Dept for Communities and Local Government 986w
Pay, Dept for International Development 1342–3w
Pay, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w
Pay, Treasury 1007w

Screening
Diabetes 355

Seabeck, Alison
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 807

Seabeck, Alison—continued*
Questions
Government, Assets 151

Seas and oceans
Pollution 1143–5w

Secondary education
149w
Gifted children 425–32w
Gloucestershire 149w
Standards 699–700w

Secondment
Information Commissioner 621w
Ministry of Defence 521–2w
Ministry of Justice 792w

Security
Cabinet Office 351w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 60w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192w
Dept for International Development 137w
Dept for Transport 634w
Dept for Work and Pensions 245w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Dept of Health 155w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 772w
Government Equalities Office 578–9w
Home Office 1108w
House of Commons 893w
Internet 607w, 945w, 1115w
Ministry of Defence 96w
Ministry of Justice 261w
Northern Ireland Office 182–3w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Olympic Games 2012 1220w
Prime Minister 547w
Prisons 124–6w
Railway stations 42w
Treasury 581w

Security Forces Collusion with Loyalist Terrorists Inquiry
663w

Security guards
Training 110–1ws

"Security Industry Authority Report and Accounts 2008–09"
23–4ws

Sellafield
1126w

Selly Oak Hospital
Hearing impaired 164w

Selous, Andrew
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 397–402, 404, 415, 422, 439–40, 442, 454–7
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 293–4
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 519–21
Westminster Hall Debates
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 251wh, 260–4wh
Questions
Children, Disadvantaged 353
Food, Origin marking 487–8
Housing benefit 11, 782–3w
Public finance 790
Working hours, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 505–7w
Working hours, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683–4w

Selous, Andrew—continued*
Working hours, Dept for Transport 381–2w
Working hours, Dept for Work and Pensions 243–4w
Working hours, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1334w
Working hours, Ministry of Justice 110–1w
Written questions, Government responses 547w, 709w, 1043w

Sentencing
1241–2w, 1245w
Data protection 1240–1w
Driving offences 615–8w
Knives 276–7w
Northern Ireland 182w
Young offenders 129w

Serbia
International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia 2–3ws

Serious Fraud Office
Conferences 1199–200w
Hotels 1004–6w
Internet 890–1w

Serious Organised Crime Agency
Manpower 1116–7w
Northern Ireland 183w

Service industries
Training 1095w

Severn bridge
Tolls 971–2w, 1168w

Sewers
Private sector 18w, 190–1w

Sex
Health education 1049w

Sexual offences
623–4w
Northern Ireland 183–4w
Rehabilitation 277–8w
Victim support schemes 3–4w, 1117–8w

Shapps, Grant
Questions
Affordable housing 1259w
Affordable housing, Rural areas 893–4w
Council housing, Property transfer 1263w
Energy, Cabinet Office 593–5w
Energy, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1352–4w
Energy, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 973w
Energy, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Energy, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1028w
Energy, Ministry of Defence 828w
Energy, Prime Minister 1253w
Energy, Solicitor-General 1003w
Energy, Treasury 848w
Estate agents, Money laundering 510–1w, 606–7w, 1362w
Homelessness 1305–6w
Homelessness, Young people 991w
Homes and Communities Agency 903–4w, 1281–2w
Homes and Communities Agency, Harlow 63w
Housing, Energy 906w
Housing, Prices 305w, 907–10w
Housing, Research 909–11w
Housing, Rural areas 395–6w, 591w
Housing benefit 783w
Leasehold Valuation Tribunal 920–1w
Lost property, Ministry of Defence 829–30w

Shapps, Grant—continued*
Mass media, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1295w
Mobile phones, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 681–2w
Mobile phones, Dept for Transport 632w
Mortgages, Government assistance 306–7w, 915w
Mortgages, Repossession orders 917w, 995w
Pay, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 322–3w
Pay, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140–1w
Plants, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 668w
Plants, Dept for Transport 542w
Plants, Leader of the House of Commons 710w
Plants, Solicitor-General 1003–4w
Private rented housing 134–5
Rented housing 916–7w
Right to buy scheme, Rural areas 592–3w
Schools, Rural areas 699–700w, 1074w
Sleeping rough 1001w, 1305–6w
Theft, Dept for Transport 381w

Shared ownership schemes
Yorkshire and the Humber 1305w

Sharma, Mr Virendra Kumar
Questions
Tuberculosis, Health services 296–7w
Tuberculosis, South East Asia 353w

Shaw, Jonathan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and Minister for the South East, Dept for Work and Pensions*
Chamber Debates
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 157, 175, 195, 204–8
Written Statements
Equality 2025 40–2ws
Questions
Attendance allowance 16, 407w, 779w
Christmas, Dept for Work and Pensions 168w
Disability living allowance 16, 20, 779w, 1012–4w (505 5–8mc)
Electric cables, Safety 938–9w
Employment and support allowance, Mentally ill 781w
Employment and support allowance, Sight impaired 247w
Employment and support allowance, Telephone services 781w
Employment services, Autism 19, 169–70w, 782w
Future Jobs Fund 18
Incapacity benefit 170–2w, 246–8w
Income support, Carers 407–8w
Motability 525w
Personal records, Departmental coordination 20
Remploy, Public relations 525–6w
Social security benefits 787w
Social security benefits, Disabled 6–8, 18, 410–2w
Work capability assessment 246–7w, 780–1w, 1022–4w
Written questions, Government responses 788w

Sheep
Conservation 18–9w

Sheerman, Mr Barry
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 545, 549, 551

Sheerman, Mr Barry—continued*
Questions
Business questions 511–2
Detention centres, Children 621
Food, Origin marking 488

Sheltered housing
66w, 307–8w, 917–8w
East Sussex 308w
Fees and charges 63w
Tamworth 308w

Sheridan, Mr Jim
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 811
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 757, 760, 763
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 166
Questions
Employment services, Autism 19
Unemployment 168w

Sherwood Forest Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust
Finance 761–2w

Shoeburyness
Firing ranges 836w

Shoplifting
231–2w, 1117–8w

Shops
Chorley 149
Empty property 307w
Petitions (15.12.2009) 41–4p

Short, Rt Hon Clare
Chamber Debates
Asylum (07.12.2009) 125–8, 130
Questions
Members, Correspondence 724w
Prisons 452–60w

Sick leave
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 528–9w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030w
Ministry of Defence 1209w
Northern Ireland Office 1237w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 981w
Scotland Office 628w
Treasury 849w

Sickle cell diseases
Health services 164–5w

Sickness benefits
EC law 248–9w, 786w

Siemens
Dept for Transport 201w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 328w
Dept of Health 165w
Minister for the Olympics 349w

Sierra Leone
Peacekeeping operations 99w

Sight impaired
Employment and support allowance 247w
Health services 158w

Simmonds, Mr Mark
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 840, 849, 853, 888–91
Questions
Care Quality Commission 478–80w, 744–6w
Dr Foster 156w
General practitioners, Pharmacy 1321w
Heart diseases, Health services 479w

Simmonds, Mr Mark—continued*
Home care services 396–7w
Hospitals, Admissions 479w
Local government finance 397w
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 761w
Social services, Finance 296w
Sunbeds, Young people 1059w

Simon, Mr Sion, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport*
Chamber Debates
Video Recordings Bill, 1R (15.12.2009) 834
Westminster Hall Debates
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 133–5wh
Written Statements
EU Education, Youth and Culture Council 22–3ws
Questions
Art works, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Big Lottery Fund, Public relations 104w
Billing, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170–1w
British Board of Film Classification, Public relations 102–3w
Buildings, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Chief information officers, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170w
Conferences, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w, 669–70w
Digital switchover help scheme, Public relations 371w
Digital UK, Public relations 192w
EC law, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101–2w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Film, Israel 529w
Freedom of information, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Heritage Lottery Fund, Public relations 370w
Hotels, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 372w
Internet, Advertising 1115w
Internet, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667w
Manpower, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 667–8w
Music, Copyright 666–7w (503 2mc)
Music, Finance 102w
National Lottery 672w
National Lottery, Grants 373w
Official hospitality, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 191–2w
Plants, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 668w
Public relations, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Publicity, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Scientists, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Security, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192w
Sick leave, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 528–9w
Telephone services, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192–3w
Television, Licensing 1173w
Training, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Written questions, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101w, 670w

Simpson, David
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 408–10
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 97–9wh, 103wh
Questions
Crime prevention, Northern Ireland 948
Crimes of violence, Accident and emergency departments 748–9w
Crimes of violence, Hospitals 159–60w
Crimes of violence, Northern Ireland 183–4w, 660w
Crimes of violence, Schools 1104–5w
Crimes of violence, Taxis 564w
Domestic visits, Dept for Work and Pensions 168–9w
Domestic visits, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923w
Domestic visits, Ministry of Defence 95w
Domestic visits, Ministry of Justice 108w
Driving offences, Northern Ireland 663–4w
Driving offences, Sentencing 615–8w
Drugs, Misuse 743–4w
Eyesight, Testing 156w
Homelessness 1272–4w
NHS, Manpower 157–8w
Racially aggravated offences, Northern Ireland 183w
Schools, Offensive weapons 147–8w
Sexual offences 623–4w
Training, Older workers 1096–7w

Simpson, Mr Keith
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 811
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 17–21wh
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 88–92wh
Questions
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations 954–5w, 1202w
Afghanistan, Politics and government 354–5w, 571–3w
Official engagements, Prime Minister 2w

Single parents
see Lone parents

Sixth form education
Free school meals 687–8w

Skilled workers
Entry clearances 1112–3w

Skin piercing
Police 1392–3w

Skinner, Mr Dennis
Chamber Debates
Business questions intervention (10.12.2009) 508
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 525

Slaughter, Andy
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 248–51, 257

Slavery
Developing countries 809w

Sleeping rough
1000–1w, 1305–6w

Smith, Rt Hon Andrew
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 533, 537, 545

Smith, Rt Hon Andrew—continued*
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 57wh, 64wh
Questions
Incinerators 976w

Smith, Angela C
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 31–3wh
Questions
Dangerous dogs 347–8

Smith, Rt Hon Angela E, Minister of State, Cabinet Office*
Written Statements
Third sector 128ws
Questions
Breast cancer 838w
Buildings, Cabinet Office 1252w
Business, Closures 593w, 598–602w, 609–10w
Business, Essex 1086w
Business, Yorkshire and the Humber 1087–92w
Census 344–5
Charities, Accountancy 843w
Charities, Fraud 1249w
Charities, Regulation 350w
Charities Act 2006 1249w
Charity Commission 1127–8w
Charity Commission, Hotels 1249–50w
Christmas, Cabinet Office 350w, 839w
Civil servants, Hearing impaired 350w
Civil servants, Redundancy pay 349w
Conferences, Cabinet Office 1253w
Conferences, National School of Government 1256–7w
Conferences, United Kingdom Statistics Authority 1137w
Death, Dietary supplements 1128–9w
Death, Leeds 1129–32w
Death, Obesity 1250–1w
Death, Pressure sores 1131–2w
Death, Smoking 1251–2w
Disadvantaged 339–40
Disadvantaged, Children 342
Diseases, Leeds 1133–4w
Drinking water, Cabinet Office 595w
Electoral register 840w
Electronic equipment, Cabinet Office 839w
Employment, Leeds 1134–5w
Employment schemes 595w
Energy, Cabinet Office 593–5w
Energy, Prime Minister 1253w
Food Strategy Task Force 595–6w
Freedom of information, Cabinet Office 342–3, 839w, 1253w
Future Jobs Fund 840w
Gift aid 1135w
Government departments, Information and communications technology 1255w
Hotels, Cabinet Office 840w
Hotels, National School of Government 1257w
Hotels, Prime Minister 1256w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Cabinet Office 840–1w
Jobseeker's allowance 1015–20w
Manpower, Cabinet Office 251w, 1253–4w
National income, Leeds 1135–6w
National School of Government, Internet 1257–8w
Official hospitality, Cabinet Office 1132w
Population, East of England 841–2w
Population, Leeds 1136w
Public sector, Pay 842–3w
Publicity, Cabinet Office 1133w

Smith, Rt Hon Angela E,—continued*
Registration of births deaths marriages and civil partnerships, Bexley 1136–7w
Security, Cabinet Office 351w
Third sector, Finance 343–4, 599w, 843–4w
Third sector, Government assistance 337–9
Third sector, Job creation 349–50w
Training, Cabinet Office 1254w
Unemployment 1137–8w
Unemployment, Essex 1150–3w
Unemployment, Graduates 599–600w
Unemployment, Young people 844w
Voluntary organisations 1138w
Voluntary work, Religion 1258w

Smith, Chloe
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 714, 725–9
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 194–8
Questions
Driving offences, Norwich 113–4w
Government departments, Standards 1381–2w
Home education 315w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 147–8
Pleural plaques, Compensation 1041w
Speed limits, Cameras 637
Vacancies 1153w

Smith, Geraldine
Chamber Debates
Public sector (07.12.2009) 36

Smith, Rt Hon Jacqui
Questions
Burglary 635

Smith, Mr John
Chamber Debates
Warsaw Convention (Carrier Liability) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 979

Smith, Sir Robert
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 656
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 45, 62, 120
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 753–4

Smoking
1054–6w
Children 1055w
Death 1251–2w

Smuggling
Prisons 123–4w

Snow and ice
Roads 122–4ws, 544w

Soames, Mr Nicholas
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 256
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 57wh, 62wh
Questions
Entry clearances, Skilled workers 1112–3w
Middle East, Peace negotiations 778w
Military aircraft, Navy 960w
Occupied territories, Housing 1034w
South East Coast Strategic Health Authority 767–8w

Social enterprises
Health services 288–9w

Social Housing Register
see Tenant Services Authority

Social rented housing
66–7w, 308–10w, 1001w
Asbestos 918w
Finance 1306w
Insurance 918w
Regulation 67w
Rents 309w
Standards 1306w

Social security benefits
786–7w, 1020–1w
Disabled 6–8, 18, 410–2w, 767w, 1055–7w
Disqualification 176–7w
Fraud 16–7
Legal aid 1021w
Ministerial statements (10.12.2009) 518–26
Pensioners 12, 787–8w
Peterborough 249–50w
Uprating 66–92ws
Widowed people 17

Social Security (Contributions Credits for Parents and Carers) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(08.12.2009) 267

Social services
295–6w, 552–3w, 762w, 765–7w, 1057–8w, 1323–4w
Children 424w
Finance 296w, 549–50w
Public consultation 1058–9w
Young offenders 1248w

Solar power
931–2w

Solicitor-General
Assets 180w
Christmas 859–60w
Conferences 1002–3w
Data protection 180w
Electronic equipment 889–90w
Energy 1003w
Hotels 1004–6w
Internet 890–1w
Plants 1003–4w
Training 891–2w
Working hours 181w
Written questions 1004w

Solicitors Regulation Authority
Public relations 625w

Somalia
1038w
Piracy 213w

Somerset
Disabled facilities grants 300–1w
Revenue and Customs 855w

Soulsby, Sir Peter
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1024–7
Westminster Hall Debates
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 30wh

South Asia
Diplomatic service 778w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 771–2w

South Downs National Park Authority
29–30ws

South East
Ambulance services 153w
Broadband 933–4w
Child minding 423–4w
Classroom assistants 150w
Health services 489w
Jobcentre Plus 173–5w
Jobseeker's allowance 248w

South East—continued*
Probation officers 461–4w
Teachers 150w

South East Asia
Tuberculosis 353w

South East Coast Strategic Health Authority
498–9w, 767–8w

Southworth, Ms Helen
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 383

Spain
EC presidency 1038w
G20 347, 711w

Speaker and deputies
Chamber Debates
Amendments and new clauses (08.12.2009) 154, 214, (09.12.2009) 388, 437, 446
Conduct of proceedings (07.12.2009) 23, 33, 61, 80, 90, 119, (08.12.2009) 145–6, 152, 157, 162, 170, 208, 217, 226, 231, 243, 250, 258, 268, 314, (09.12.2009) 343, 347, 350–2, 354, 370, 374–5, 379, 395, 452, 459–63, 468, (10.12.2009) 495, 509, 511, 513, 524, 529, 573, 613, 616, (14.12.2009) 621, 625, 652, 696, 710, 741, 743, 750–1, 754–5, 757, 759, 761–4, 776, (15.12.2009) 782, 791, 806–7, 817, 908, (16.12.2009) 954, 960, 963–4, 988, 995, 1015, 1054, 1056, 1061, 1068
Deferred divisions (09.12.2009) 415
Orders and regulations motions (07.12.2009) 123, (08.12.2009) 267
Points of order (07.12.2009) 40, (08.12.2009) 153, 257, 259, (09.12.2009) 387, (10.12.2009) 527–8, 568, (14.12.2009) 749–50, 752, 760, 763–4, (15.12.2009) 834, (16.12.2009) 977, 982
Royal Assent (16.12.2009) 977
Rulings and statements, Ten minutes rule (15.12.2009) 871, 917
Rulings and statements, Fifteen minutes rule (15.12.2009) 852, (16.12.2009) 983
Rulings and statements, Unparliamentary expressions (07.12.2009) 94
Westminster Hall Debates
Conduct of proceedings (08.12.2009) 27wh, 31wh, 36wh, 42wh, 48wh, 65wh, 70wh, (09.12.2009) 73wh, 78wh, 82wh, 96wh, 100wh, 127wh, 130–3wh, 135–6wh, (15.12.2009) 192wh, 204–5wh, 213wh, 221wh, 223wh, 230wh, 240wh
Points of order (15.12.2009) 197wh

Speaker's Adviser
528w, 664w

Special educational needs
673–4w, 700–1w, 1073–8w
Young offenders 318–9w, 701w

Special Educational Needs and Parental Confidence Inquiry
129–32ws

Specialised diplomas
Rural areas 1078w

Specialist schools
Lincolnshire 319w

Speed limits
Cameras 637, 640w
East Sussex 388–9w
Fines 233w
M4 233w
Norfolk 637
Wales 640w

Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 226, 230
Questions
Affordable housing 1258w
Audit Commission, Procurement 1261w
Audit Commission, Public relations 57–60w
Bellwin scheme 393–5w
Community assets programme 895w
Community infrastructure levy 895w
Council housing, Rents 896w, 984w
Council tax 984–5w
Council tax, Valuation 1378w
Council tax benefits 1263–4w
Disadvantaged 1267–8w
Domestic waste, Waste disposal 988w
Electronic equipment, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390w
Empty property 898w
Energy, Conservation 927w
English Regions Network, Finance 1268w
European Charter of Local Self-government 1289w
Fetes 988w
First time buyers 992w
Green belt 902w, 990w
Historic buildings, Planning permission 902w
Home care services 913w
Home information packs 1272w
Housing 904w
Housing, Carbon emissions 993w
Housing, Construction 902w
Housing, Finance 993w
Housing, Fire extinguishers 911w
Housing, Lighting 907w
Housing, Prices 908w, 994w
Housing, Standards 911w
Housing revenue accounts 992w
Infrastructure Planning Commission, Pay 1286–8w
Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Act 2009 1287–8w
Local development frameworks 1288w
Local government, Elections 1264w
Local government, Equality 898–9w
Local government, Pensions 1291–2w
Local government, Per capita costs 1292–4w
Local government, Standards 913–4w, 995w
Local government finance 912w, 984–5w, 1302–3w
Mortgages, Government assistance 914–5w, 1295–7w
Multiple occupation 915w
National policy statements 995–6w
Non-domestic rates 1297–8w
Non-domestic rates, Churches 996w
Non-domestic rates, Greater London 996w, 1298–300w
Non-domestic rates, Public libraries 996w
Non-domestic rates, Valuation 402w, 851–2w, 857w, 996–7w, 1300–1w, 1303w, 1306–7w
North East Economic Forum 1301w
Paper, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390w
Ports, Inland waterways 16–7w
Ports, Non-domestic rates 852w, 1300w
Ports, Planning permission 307w, 995w
Procurement, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1265w
Regional government 1304w

Spelman, Mrs Caroline—continued*
Regional planning and development 916w, 1000w
Social rented housing 1001w
Social rented housing, Finance 1306w
Stamp duty land tax 855w
Standards, Dept for Communities and Local Government 1266w
Sustainable Communities Act 2007 138–9
Tenancy deposit schemes 919–20w
Tenant Services Authority, Manpower 920w
Tenant Services Authority, Public relations 1307w
Travellers, Republic of Ireland 920w

Spink, Bob
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 662
Development on Flood Plains (Environment Agency Powers) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 980–1 Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.200[illegible]2
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 835–6
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (14.12.2009) 772–3
Kurds, Petitions (15.12.2009) 938
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 232
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 750
Nimrod aircraft (16.12.2009) 976
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 664
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1015
Westminster Hall Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (08.12.2009) 1wh
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 74wh, 76wh, 81wh, 88wh
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 247wh, 249wh
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 104wh, 106wh
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 198wh
Questions
Business, Essex 1086w
Housing, Construction 146
Oikos Storage, Canvey Island 997w
Plastic surgery, Internet 760w
Police, Manpower 631
Post office card account, Castle Point 1019–20w
Schools, Asbestos 317w
Special educational needs 700–1w
Unemployment, Essex 1150–3w
Vocational training, East of England 1100–1w

Sponsorship
Academies 1060–1w

Sport England
Public relations 101w

Sport Legacy Delivery Board
530w

Sports
Antisemitism 100w
Armed forces 958w
Leeds 1172w
Leisure 963w
Non-domestic rates 591w
Obesity 964w, 1172–3w
York 964–5w
Yorkshire and the Humber 103w

Sri Lanka
Internally displaced people 353–4w
Petitions (10.12.2009) 18–20p

Sri Lanka—continued*
Politics and government 105–7ws, 577–8w

Stabilisation Unit
139ws

Staffordshire
Apprentices 1085–6w

Stamp duty land tax
855w

Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 573–81
Questions
Business, Government assistance 783
Middle East 773w
Middle East, Armed conflict 774–8w, 1035–6w, 1228–9w
Mortgages, Government assistance 136
Origin marking, Food 488–9
Origin marking, Israel 579–80w, 582–3w, 653w
Overseas aid 979w
Palestinians 1037w
Palestinians, Overseas aid 1230w, 1344–5w
Social security benefits, Disabled 7

State retirement pensions
Uprating 66–92ws, 142–4ws

Statistics Board
see United Kingdom Statistics Authority

Statutory Instruments Joint Select Committee
(07.12.2009) 124

Steen, Mr Anthony
Chamber Debates
Anti-Slavery Day Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 979
Questions
Human trafficking 1114w
Human trafficking, Northern Ireland 1234w
Housing, Areas of outstanding natural beauty 590w
Prostitution 632

Stevens Inquiry
see Security Forces Collusion with Loyalist Terrorists Inquiry

Stewart, Ian
Questions
Taxis, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 377w
Taxis, Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Taxis, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 556w
Taxis, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030–1w
Taxis, Home Office 1108w

Stock market
781–2

Stockport
Influenza 490–1w

Stoke on Trent
Civil servants 799–800

Stop and search
Greater London 85–6w
Young people 570w

Stow Inquiry
see Bernard Lodge Inquiry

Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin
Questions
Forests, Climate change 485

Straw, Rt Hon Jack, Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor*
Written Statements
Freedom of information 33ws
Out-of-court Disposals Review 60–1ws
Succession, EC action 140–1ws
Questions
Ashwell Prison 106w, 1039–40w
Correctional Services Accreditation Panel 788–9w
Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority 611–2w
Domestic visits, Ministry of Justice 108w
Driving offences, Insurance 613–4w
Drugs, Sussex 617–20w
East Sutton Park Prison, Prisoner escapes 115w
Electoral register 271w
Freedom of information, Network Rail 620w
Gender recognition panels 464–5w
Government Chief Scientific Adviser, Ministry of Justice 276w
Henry VIII Clauses 271–2w
Hunting Act 2004, Prosecutions 434w
Immobilisation of vehicles, Ministry of Justice 116w
Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority 620–2w, 796w
Judicial Diversity Advisory Panel 431–2w
Judiciary, Criminal records 621–2w
Monarchy, Succession 273w
Offenders, Ministry of Justice 107w
Offenders, Rehabilitation 440–52w
Pathogens Access Appeals Commission 451–2w
Prison accommodation 119–22w
Prisoners, Suicide 1042w
Prisoners' release 800–1w
Prisons, Sussex 122w
Prisons, Visits 1043w
Security, Ministry of Justice 261w
Sexual offences, Rehabilitation 277–8w
Taxis, Ministry of Justice 261–2w
Travel, Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Victims' Advisory Panel 625–6w
Working hours, Ministry of Justice 110–1w
Written questions, Government responses 1043w

Streeter, Mr Gary
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 398, 402–5, 444, 447
Defence (15.12.2009) 811
Questions
Electoral Commission, Conferences 1141–2w
Electoral Commission, Hotels 954w
Electoral Commission, Internet 893w
Electoral Commission, Leave 1w
Electoral Commission, Pay 1w
Electoral register 954w
Home responsibilities protection 247w
Incinerators 419–20w

Stringer, Mr Graham
Questions
Bus services 30–1w
Buses, Safety 195–7w
Swine flu, Vaccination 167w

Strokes
Health education 166w

Stuart, Ms Gisela
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 657
Birmingham City Council, Accountancy (16.12.2009) 1073, 1077
Questions
Occupational pensions 5–6

Stuart, Graham
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 400–1, 404, 409–15, 419–21, 444–5, 453, 456, 459–64
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 268–9
Questions
Badman, Graham 692w
Caparo Group, Cabinet Office 250w
Caparo Group, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Caparo Group, Dept for Transport 31w, 1154w
Caparo Group, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 130w, 922w
Caparo Group, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1222w
Caparo Group, Ministry of Defence 824w, 1206w
Charity Commission 1127–8w
Conferences, Cabinet Office 1253w
Conferences, Crown Estate Commissioners 1378–9w
Conferences, Crown Prosecution Service 1002w
Conferences, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1357w
Conferences, Dept for Communities and Local Government 985–6w
Conferences, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669–70w
Conferences, Electoral Commission 1141–2w
Conferences, Food Standards Agency 1317w
Conferences, Gas and Electricity Markets Authority 1338w
Conferences, Minister for the Olympics 1219w
Conferences, Ministry of Defence 1209w
Conferences, National School of Government 1256–7w
Conferences, Office of Fair Trading 1096w
Conferences, Office of Rail Regulation 1160–1w
Conferences, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w
Conferences, Postal Services Commission 1345w
Conferences, Serious Fraud Office 1199–200w
Conferences, Solicitor-General 1002–3w
Conferences, United Kingdom Statistics Authority 1137w
Council housing, Construction 144
Pupil exclusions 137–8w, 145–6w
Pupil referral units, Per capita costs 146–7w
Unemployment, Young people 10
Work permits 86–7w

Student Loans Company
1365–70w, 1375w
Finance 1374–5w

Students
Disabled 1098w, 1371w
Loans 609w, 950–1w, 1098–9w, 1372–4w
Radicalism 28w, 1375w

Stunell, Mr Andrew
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 305–6
Questions
Alcoholic drinks, Crime 559w
Domestic violence 630–1
Driving under influence 613–6w
Driving under influence, Convictions 432w
Employment, Lone parents 596–8w
Extracurricular activities 686–8w
Hospitals, Manpower 480–90w
Legal aid, Hazel Grove 796–9w
Mentally disturbed offenders 286w
Midwives, North West 491–2w
Prisons, North West 462w
Sudan, Politics and government 360w
Winter fuel payments 250w

Succession
EC action 140–1ws
Monarchy 273w, 438–9w

Sudan
Asylum 1386–7w
Politics and government 360w, 809–10w
War crimes 1232w

Suffolk
Local government 1294–5w

Sugar, Lord
341w, 513w, 1362w

Suicide
Prisoners 1042w

Sunbeds.
Young people 1059w

Sunbeds (Regulation) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 978

Supermarkets
Competition 607w

Supply estimates
(10.12.2009) 607
Navy (10.12.2009) 607

Supporting people programme
919w

Sure start programme
Hampstead 313w
Lincolnshire 313w

Surgery
Gastrointestinal cancer (09.12.2009) 472–8, 759–60w

Surrey
Hospital beds 747w

Surveillance
Members 547–8w

Sussex
Drugs 617–20w
Knives 749–50w
Prisons 122w

Sustainable Communities Act 2007
Questions
137–9

Sustainable Communities Act 2007 (Amendment) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 979

Sustainable development
Local government 309–10w

Sustainable development—continued*

Sutcliffe, Mr Gerry, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport*
Questions
Betting, Horse racing 369w
Betting, Licensing 666w
Gambling Commission 37[illegible]w, 1171w
Gambling Commission, Public relations 370–1w
Gambling Commission, Travel 670w
Horserace Totalisator Board 193w, 1171w
Leisure, East of England 103w, 193–4w
Licensed premises 373w
Licensing laws 671w
National Lottery, Grants 373–4w
National Lottery Commission, Public relations 668w
Olympic Delivery Authority, Public relations 1170w
Olympic Games 2012, East Sussex 102w
Playing fields, East of England 193–4w
Sport England, Public relations 101w
Sport Legacy Delivery Board 530w
Sports, Antisemitism 100w
Sports, Leeds 1172w
Sports, Leisure 963w
Sports, Obesity 964w, 1172–3w
Sports, York 964–5w
Sports, Yorkshire and the Humber 103w
UK School Games 105–6w

Swayne, Mr Desmond
Questions
Food, Research 494

Swimming pools
East of England 193–4w

Swine flu
Children 167w
Disease control 504
Telephone services 1059–60w
Vaccination 166–7w, 499–500w, 768w, 1059w, 1324w

Swinson, Jo
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1049–54
Westminster Hall Debates
Burma, Politics and government (09.12.2009) 84–8wh
Questions
Civil servants, Redundancy pay 349w
Taxation 796–7
UN agencies, Females 808w, 810w

Swire, Mr Hugo
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 659
Defence (15.12.2009) 814
Gastrointestinal cancer, Surgery (09.12.2009) 473
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 318–9
Questions
Business questions 509–10
Gastrointestinal cancer, Surgery 759–60w
Local government, Reorganisation 1293–4w

SwitchCo
see Digital UK

Syms, Mr Robert
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 563
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (10.12.2009) 608
Local government (10.12.2009) 575, 588–90

Syms, Mr Robert—continued*
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 673–4, 684–5, 707–9
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (08.12.2009) 56–60wh

Taliban
360w

Tamworth
Sheltered housing 308w

Tax [illegible]ances
Pe[illegible]s 21–2ws

Tax avoidance
960
Charitable donations 93–4ws

Tax Credits (Excluded Companies) Regulations 2009
Chamber Debates
(07.12.2009) 123

Tax Law Rewrite Bills Joint Select Committee
(07.12.2009) 124

Taxation
796–7
Banks 855–6w, 1008w
Betting 404–5w
Business 255–6w, 406w, 856w
Domicil 1382–3w
Gaming machines 56–7w, 1383w
Holiday accommodation 796, 857w, 1383w
Impact assessments 1099w
Pensioners 57w, 1381w

Taxis
Crimes of violence 564w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 335w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 377w
Dept for Transport 382w
Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 556w, 926w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1030–1w
Guide dogs 972–3w
Home Office 1108w
Licensing 972w
Ministry of Defence 96–7w
Ministry of Justice 261–2w
Northern Ireland Office 1237–8w
Scotland Office 1w

Taylor, Ms Dari
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 384
Westminster Hall Debates
Iron and steel, Teesside (16.12.2009) 302wh, 305wh

Taylor, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 812
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 76, 111, 118
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 868
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 218–9, 247, 255, 257
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 158
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 105–7wh, 110wh, 112wh, 116wh
General practitioners (16.12.2009) 268–73wh
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 200wh, 213wh, 216wh

Taylor, Mr David—continued
Railways, Construction (08.12.2009) 25wh, 27wh
Questions
Animal experiments 637–8
Business questions 514
Census 345
Crime prevention, Northern Ireland 947
DNA, Databases 622
Economic situation 800
Financial services, EC action 788
ICE, Dept for Communities and Local Government 994w
Litter, Roads 486
Regeneration, Coalville 150–1
Ritual slaughter 502
Sustainable Communities Act 2007 138
Unemployment 8–9

Taylor, Mr Ian
Questions
Taxation, Gaming machines 1383w

Taylor, Dr Richard
Chamber Debates
National Health Service Public Interest Disclosure Support Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 980
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1046–9
Questions
NHS, Information and communications technology 26–7

Teachers
Armed forces 707w
Arts 1078–84w
Further education 1093–4w
Lincolnshire 319w
Males 707w
Pay 150w
Science 707–8w
South East 150w
Training 150–1w, 708–9w, 1083w

Teather, Sarah
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 320–1
Questions
Absenteeism, Dept for Communities and Local Government 391w
Asylum, Sudan 1366–7w
Christmas trees, Recycling 916w
DNA, Databases 564w
Energy, Conservation 255w
Flood control 537w, 649w
Floods 902w
Floods, Housing 905–7w
Floods, Schools 698w
Freedom of information, Cabinet Office 1253w
Freedom of information, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1354–5w
Freedom of information, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1065w
Freedom of information, Dept for Communities and Local Government 390–1w
Freedom of information, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 370w
Freedom of information, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 974w
Freedom of information, Dept for International Development 806w
Freedom of information, Dept for Transport 630w
Freedom of information, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 923–4w
Freedom of information, Dept of Health 282w

Teather, Sarah—continued
Freedom of information, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1224w
Freedom of information, Home Office 1105w
Freedom of information, Local government 913w
Freedom of information, Ministry of Defence 828w
Freedom of information, Ministry of Justice 792w
Freedom of information, Northern Ireland Office 660w
Freedom of information, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 179w
Freedom of information, Scotland Office 526w
Freedom of information, Treasury 848–9w
Housing, Autism 904–5w
Housing, Carbon emissions 993w
Housing, Finance 1283–4w
Immigration controls 1393–4w
Marine and Fisheries Agency 539w
Marine Management Organisation 378w, 538–9w
Mortgages 914w
Mortgages, Government assistance 1296–7w
Private rented housing 134
Rent a room scheme 255w
Roads, Accidents 544w
Roads, Snow and ice 544w
Work permits 1119–20w

Teenage pregnancy
151w

Teesside
Iron and steel (16.12.2009) 300–7wh

Telephone services
Armed forces 92w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 192–3w
Dept for International Development 549w
Dept for Work and Pensions 169w, 1148–9w
Dept of Health 743w
Employment and support allowance 781w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w
Fraud 49w
Government departments 1255–6w
Home Office 1109–10w
Ministry of Defence 366w
Ministry of Justice 793–4w
Northern Ireland Office 661–2w
Student Loans Company 1367–70w
Swine flu 1059–60w
Treasury 849–50w

Television
Licensing 1173w
Prisons 1245w
Rugby (09.12.2009) 128–35wh

Temporary accommodation
310–1w

Ten minutes rule
Rulings and statements (15.12.2009) 871, 917

Tenancy deposit schemes
919–20w

Tenant Services Authority
Expenditure 67w
Manpower 920w
Public relations 1307w

Tenants' rights
298w

Territorial Army
99–100w

Territorial waters
Gibraltar 1032–3w

Terrorism
see also Counter-terrorism
892w
Compensation 278w
Detainees 85w
Northern Ireland 533w, 952–5, 969w, 1234w, 1239w
USA 181w

Thames Gateway Delivery Unit
1307w

The Tote
see Horserace Totalisator Board

Theft
Bicycles 233–4w
Dept for Transport 381w
Student Loans Company 1365–7w

Third sector
128ws
Finance 343–4, 599w, 843–4w
Government assistance 337–9
Job creation 349–50w

Thomas, Mr Gareth (Harrow West), Minister of State, Dept for International Development*
Written Statements
Ethiopia, Overseas aid 139–40ws
Questions
Africa, Water 136–7w
Bangladesh, Climate change 548w
Bangladesh, Overseas aid 548–9w
Democratic Republic of Congo, Politics and government 805w
Developing countries, Climate change 804–5w (508 13–4mc)
Sudan, Politics and government 809–10w

Thornberry, Emily
Questions
Hunting 356–8

Thurrock Council
Public appointments 135

Thurso, John
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 292–3
Questions
Oils, Waste disposal 378–9w

Tickets
Public transport 122ws, 385–6w

Tidal power
1338–9w
River Severn 1339w

Timetabling of bills
(07.12.2009) 41–123, (14.12.2009) 664–746, (15.12.2009) 835–907

Timms, Rt Hon Stephen, Financial Secretary to the Treasury and Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills*
Chamber Debates
Consolidated Fund Bill, 1R (10.12.2009) 607
Written Statements
Capital gains tax 127–8ws
EU Transport, Telecommunications and Energy Council 44–6ws
Tax avoidance, Charitable donations 93–4ws

Timms, Rt Hon Stephen,—continued
Questions
Broadband 331w, 503w, 932–3w, 1361w
Broadband, East Midlands 369w
Broadband, Eastbourne 331–2w
Broadband, Finance 1346w
Broadband, South East 933–4w
Child benefit 846w
Child care tax credit 57w, 256w
Child care vouchers 846w
Child tax credit 1086–7w
Child tax credit, Grandparents 579w
Data protection, EC law 1387–8w
Digital technology 1357–8w
Digital technology, Fees and charges 46w
Economic growth 792–3
Electronic commerce, EC law 944–5w
Employer benefit trusts 1007w
Energy, Conservation 255w
Income tax 1007–8w
Internet, Copyright 943–4w
Internet, Registration 943w
Internet, Security 607w, 945w
Members, Correspondence 851w
National insurance contributions 1088w
National insurance contributions, Foreign workers 53–4w
Origin marking, Israel 579–80w, 582–3w, 852–3w
Pipex Homecall, Complaints 344w
Public finance 790–1
Public sector, Information 948–50w
Radio frequencies 800
Rent a room scheme 255w
Revenue and Customs 54–6w
Revenue and Customs, Hotels 854w
Revenue and Customs, Internet 854w
Revenue and Customs, Opening hours 1382w
Revenue and Customs, Publicity 854w
Revenue and Customs, Somerset 855w
Taxation, Banks 1088w
Taxation, Business 255–6w, 406w, 856w
Taxation, Domicil 1382–3w
Taxation, Holiday accommodation 796, 857w, 1383w
Taxation, Pensioners 57w, 1381w
Telephone services, Fraud 49w
VAT, Medical equipment 856–7w
VAT, Northern Ireland 57w
Welfare tax credits 406–7w, 584w
Welfare tax credits, Complaints 584w
Welfare tax credits, Grandparents 857–8w
Welfare tax credits, Lancashire 858w
Welfare tax credits, Leeds 1383–4w
Welfare tax credits, York 1384w
Working tax credit 858–9w

Timpson, Edward
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 311
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 722, 727

Tipping, Mr Paddy
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 47, 57, 59–63, 78
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 836, 849, 871–4

Tobacco
Young people 233–4w

Todd, Mr Mark
Chamber Debates
Flood and Water Management Bill, 2R (15.12.2009) 858, 861

Todd, Mr Mark—continued
Questions
Employment and support allowance, Telephone services 781w
Fire services, Finance 900w
Housing, Floods 1272w
Radiotherapy 767–8w

Tolls
Dartford-Thurrock Crossing 1159–60w
Humber bridge 1163w
Severn bridge 971–2w, 1169w

Tote
see Horserace Totalisator Board

Touhig, Rt Hon Don
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 925–6
Questions
Alcoholic drinks, Domestic violence 220w
Alcoholic drinks, Prices 214w, 465–6w
Capita, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 332w
Capita, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 675w
Capita, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 376w
Capita, Dept for Transport 197w
Capita, Dept for Work and Pensions 1145–6w
Capita, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1326–31w, 1337w
Capita, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 235w
Capita, Home Office 714w
Capita, Ministry of Defence 205–6w
Capita, Northern Ireland Office 20–1w
Contracts, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 333w
Contracts, Dept for Work and Pensions 409w
Contracts, Ministry of Defence 210w
Contracts, Scotland Office 374w
Employment services, Autism 169–70w
Industrial diseases, Compensation 555–6w

Tourettes syndrome
Pupil exclusions 1070–1w

Tourism
104w, 672–3w, 965–6w
Cumbria 195w
VAT 673w
Yorkshire and the Humber 104w

Town and Country Planning Act 1990 (Amendment) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 980

Trade
Middle East 239w

Trade agreements
Peru 1099w

Trade unions
Colombia 770w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 346w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1038–9w

Train to gain programme
345–6w

Training
Armed forces 958–9w, 1204–5w
Cabinet Office 1234w
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 504–5w, 606w, 1356–7w

Training—continued
Dept for Communities and Local Government 1267w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 669w
Dept for International Development 807–8w, 1343w
Dept for Transport 1161w
Dept of Health 1047w, 1314–6w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031w, 1225w
General practitioners 1060w
Government departments 515w
Government Office for the East of England 1272w
Health visitors 747w
Home Office 1110w, 1309w
Leader of the House of Commons 900w
Minister for the Olympics 962w
Ministry of Defence 1209w
Nurses 46–7w, 759w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 644w, 981w
Older workers 1096–7w
Prisons 459–61w
Scotland Office 620w
Security guards 110–1ws
Service industries 1095w
Solicitor-General 891–2w
Teachers 150–1w, 708–9w, 1083w
Treasury 848w, 850w
Young offenders 626w, 803–4w

Tranquillisers
Per capita costs 761w

Tranexamicum
770w

Transplant surgery
500–1w

Transport
Business 951–2w
Exhaust emissions 1169–70w
Further education 1364–5w
Patients 760w
Per capita costs 544–7w
Planning 639–40w
Tyne and Wear 43–4w, 640w
Wales 631–3w

Travel
Cabinet Office 251w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 371w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Dept for Transport 634w, 970w
Dept for Work and Pensions 169w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w, 1334w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1225–6w
Gambling Commission 670w
Ministry of Defence 97w
Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Northern Ireland Office 163w
Petitions (09.12.2009) 469

Travel information
1232w

Travellers
Caravan sites 981–2w
Republic of Ireland 920w

Treasury
Buildings 52w, 840w
Conferences 848w
Consultants 50w
Departmental responsibilities 795
EC law 52w
Energy 846w, 1379w
Freedom of information 848–9w

Treasury—continued
Government Chief Scientific Adviser 56w
Hotels 851w
Information officers 52w
Internet 849w
Official engagements 1254w
Pay 1007w
Public expenditure 254w
Security 501w
Sick leave 849w
Telephone services 849–50w
Training 848w, 850w
Written questions 405w

Treaties
Armed forces 819w

Tribunals
Mobile homes 135–6ws

Trickett, Jon
Questions
Bus services, Finance 29w, 1156–9w
Pinderfields and Pontefract Hospitals NHS Trust, Manpower 287–8w

Trident
1218–9w

Trident missiles
100w, 213–4w

Trident submarines
1218w

Truancy
Prosecutions 279–80w

Trust schools
Cooperatives 1174–5w

Truswell, Mr Paul
Questions
Energy, National policy statements 1335–6w
Wind power 1341–2w

Tuberculosis
Health services 296–7w
South East Asia 353w

Turks and Caicos Islands
Human rights 1039w

Turner, Mr Andrew
Westminster Hall Debates
Bible, Anniversaries (09.12.2009) 103wh
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 199wh
Questions
Public expenditure 853w

Turner, Dr Desmond
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 80–4

Turner, Mr Neil
Chamber Debates
Local government (10.12.2009) 590–4
Westminster Hall Debates
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 128–31wh, 133wh

Twigg, Derek
Westminster Hall Debates
Rugby, Television (09.12.2009) 131wh
Questions
Business, Government assistance 702
Climate change, International cooperation 354

Tyne and Wear
Empty property 392–3w
Transport 43–4w, 640w

Tyrie, Mr Andrew
Questions
Biofuels, Boilers 154w

UK Advisory Network on Disability Equality
see Equality 2025

UK Border Agency
32ws, 629, 727–32w, 1118w
Manpower 235w

UK Debt Management Office
Hotels 851w
Internet 848w

UK Innovation Investment Fund
509–10w, 1123–4w

UK Listing Authority
see Financial Services Authority

UK School Games
105–6w

UK Trade and Investment
Hotels 1099–100w
Internet 1375w

UN agencies
Females 808w, 810w

UN Central Emergency Response Fund
24ws

UN Committee on the Rights of the Child
778–9w

Unemployed people
Work experience 249w, 412w

Unemployment
8–9, 12–5, 168w, 299w, 515w, 1137–8w
Ashford Kent 680–1w
Essex 1150–3w
Graduates 599–600w, 1361–2w
Young people 1–4, 9–10, 17–8, 167w, 170w, 346w, 516–20w, 600–1w, 609–10w, 798, 844w, 1080w, 1150w

Unemployment benefits
798

Uniforms
Ambulance services 734–5w

Union Learning Fund
519–20w

Union Modernisation Fund
347–8w

Unitary councils
13–4ws

United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre
235w

United Kingdom Statistics Authority
Conferences 1137w

Universities
see Higher education

University Officer Training Corps
836–8w, 1205w

Unparliamentary expressions
Rulings and statements (07.12.2009) 94

Unsolicited goods and services
985w

USA
Antisemitism 360–1w
Defence 214w
Extradition 627–8, 636–7
Terrorism 181w

Vacancies
1153w

Vacant land
1001–2w

Vaccination
Bovine tuberculosis 9–10w
Influenza 106w
International assistance 1006w

Vaccination—continued
Swine flu 166–7w, 499–500w, 768w, 1059w, 1324w

Vaizey, Edward
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 316
Westminster Hall Debates
Science, Finance (15.12.2009) 226wh
Questions
Christmas, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 602w
Christmas, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1026w
Christmas, Home Office 1104w
Christmas, Ministry of Justice 611w

Valuation
Council tax 580–1w, 1378w
Non-domestic rates 147–8, 150–1, 297w, 402w, 405–6w, 583w, 851–2w, 857w, 996–7w, 1300–1w, 1303w, 1306–7w

Vara, Shailesh
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1059–63
Westminster Hall Debates
House of Commons, Reform (15.12.2009) 217–20wh
Questions
Police, Bureaucracy 633
Prisons, Alcoholic drinks 124w
Prisons, Drugs 124w
Prisons, Security 124–6w
Prisons, Smuggling 123–4w

VAT
Medical equipment 856–7w
Northern Ireland 57w
Tourism 673w

Vaz, Rt Hon Keith
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 661
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 1017–21
Westminster Hall Debates
DNA, Databases (09.12.2009) 106–7wh, 109wh, 111wh
Questions
Diabetes, Leicester 1052w
Diabetes, Screening 355
Extradition, USA 627–8

Vehicles
Fire services 1271w

Veterans advisory and pensions committees
57ws

Victim support schemes
Domestic violence 3–4w
Sexual offences 3–4w, 1117–8w

Victims' Advisory Panel
625–6w

Video games
Young people 235w, 1062–3w

Video Recordings Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (15.12.2009) 834

Viggers, Sir Peter
Questions
Military bases, Browndown 960w

Villiers, Theresa
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 298
Questions
Driving offences 1162w
Public transport, Tickets 385–6w
Waterloo Station 1170w

VisitBritain
Public relations 668w

Visits
Prisons 1043w

Vocational training
348w, 520w, 1101–2w, 1153–4w
East of England 1100–1w
Non-departmental public bodies 1097–8w
West Midlands 1376w

Voluntary organisations
1138w

Voluntary work
Disabled 340–2
Religion 1258w

Voting rights
Prisoners 1042–3w
Public companies 1102w

Wales
Agriculture 6w, 185–6w
Animal experiments 1102–3w, 1385–6w
EC grants and loans 25w
Flexible working 410–1w
Out of area treatment 644w
Prisons 275–6w
Probation 801–2w
Public expenditure 798
Speed limits 640w
Transport 631–3w

Wales Office
see Office of the Secretary of State for Wales

Walker, Charles
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 314
Questions
Autism, Mental health services 1310w

Wallace, Ben
Questions
Motor sports 971w
Prisoners' release, Homicide 116w

Walley, Ms Joan
Questions
Civil servants, Stoke on Trent 799–800
Public finance 790

Walsall
M6 37w, 635–6w

War crimes
Sudan 1232w

Ward, Ms Claire, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Justice
Written Statements
Bernard Lodge Inquiry 115ws
Questions
Crimes of violence, Homophobia 432w
Crimes of violence, Retail trade 563–4w
Criminal law, EC law 26w
Driving offences 111–4w, 262w
Driving offences, Sentencing 615–8w
Driving under influence 613–6w
Driving under influence, Convictions 432w
Drugs, Crime 113–4w, 271–2w
Fines 619–20w
Fixed penalties, Antisocial behaviour 611w
Fixed penalties, Royal parks 115–6w
Food, Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Knives, Sentencing 276–7w
Legislation, Ministry of Justice 259–61w
Police cautions 230w
Prison sentences 127–8w

Ward, Ms Claire,—continued
Prosecutions, Animal welfare 623w
Prosecutions, Hunting Act 2004 434w
Prosecutions, Truancy 279–80w
Rape, Police cautions 463w
Remand in custody, Ashford Kent 464w
Reoffenders 126w
Reoffenders, Domestic violence 463–4w
Sexual offences 623–4w
Terrorism, Compensation 278w
Young offenders, Training 626w

Warm front scheme
932w
Derbyshire 1340–1w
Kent 328–9w

Warsaw Convention (Carrier Liability) Bill 2009–10
Chamber Debates
1R (16.12.2009) 979

Waste
Renewable energy 20w, 534w

Waste and Resources Action Programme
Public relations 647–8w, 654–5w

Waste disposal
Domestic waste 974–5w, 988w
EC law 655–6w
Hazardous substances 19w
Metals 652w, 1143w
Oils 378–9w
Petitions (16.12.2009) 61–2p

Waste management
Radioactive waste 1341w

Water
Africa 136–7w, 252w
EC law 20w, 656–7w
Housing 1286w

Water charges
503–4
Concessions 191w

Water supply
536w

Waterloo Station
1170w

Waterson, Mr Nigel
Chamber Debates
Care Homes and Sheltered Accommodation (Domestic Pets) Bill, 1R (16.12.2009) 980
Westminster Hall Debates
Pensioners, Poverty (10.12.2009) 149wh, 164–9wh, 172wh, 174wh
Questions
British nationality, Assessments 215w
Broadband, Eastbourne 331–2w
Business, Eastbourne 934w
Occupational pensions 6
Personal accounts 1019w
Sheltered housing 66w
Sheltered housing, Fees and charges 63w
Young people, Video games 1062–3w

Watkinson, Angela
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 252
London Select Committee (14.12.2009) 749
Questions
Housing benefit 11
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 952–3

Watson, Tom
Questions
Arts Council of England 664–6w
British nationals abroad, Childbirth 236w

Watson, Tom*—continued*
British nationals abroad, Death 27w
Colombia, Trade unions 770w
Copyright, Music 666–7w (503 2mc)
Electronic commerce, EC law 944–5w
Fiji, Politics and government 26–7w
Honduras, Elections 772–3w
Internet, Copyright 943–4w
Internet, Security 607w, 945w
Mephedrone 567w
Moldova, Politics and government 577w
Olympic Games 2012, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1036w
Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe 1036w
Overseas Territories Consultative Council 1036–7w
Public sector, Pensions 853–4w
Russia, Detainees 1231w
Spain, EC presidency 1038w
Transcaucasus 778w

Weapons
Northern Ireland 375–6w, 948–9

Weapons of mass destruction
Libya 1226w

Webb, Mr Steve
Chamber Debates
Child Poverty Bill, Rep and 3R (09.12.2009) 388, 390–4, 407, 412, 420, 424–6, 456–8
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 522–3, (15.12.2009) 824–5
Social security benefits, Disabled (08.12.2009) 156–7, 174–9
Westminster Hall Debates
Child Support Agency (16.12.2009) 252–3wh, 256–60wh
Questions
Children, Maintenance 242–3w, 1010–2w
Christmas bonus 779–80w
Council tax benefits 408w
Crisis loans 408w, 1011–2w
Housing benefit 11, 408w
Jobcentre Plus 171–4w
Jobseeker's allowance, Interviews 175–6w
Mortgages, Government assistance 788w
New deal for young people 175–6w, 525w
Nuclear power stations, Oldbury 1125w
Occupational pensions 5
Teachers, Pay 150w

Weir, Mr Mike
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 43, 81, 101–6
Questions
Electricity 1121–2w
Electricity, Scotland 1121–2w
Energy, Disconnections 1122w, 1334–5w
Energy, Meters 929w
Fuel poverty 132–3w
Renewable energy, EC law 1126w
Taxation, Holiday accommodation 1383w

Welfare tax credits
406–7w, 584w
Complaints 584w
Grandparents 857–8w
Lancashire 858w
Leeds 1383–4w
York 1384w

Welsh language
2w

West Bank
see Palestinians

West Midlands
Forests 538w

West Midlands—continued*
Olympic Games 2012 1221w
Railways 797
Vocational training 1376w

West Yorkshire
Affordable housing 1260–1w
Antisocial behaviour orders 1103–4w
Winter fuel payments 1022w

West Yorkshire Police
Firearms 1118–9w

Western Sahara
Human rights 361w
Politics and government 359w, 1229w

Whales
Conservation 977–8w, 1145w

White fish
Quotas 535–6w

Whitehead, Dr Alan
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 69–74

Wickham Research Laboratories
Animal experiments 417w

Wicks, Rt Hon Malcolm
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 56
Social security benefits (15.12.2009) 830

Widdecombe, Rt Hon Ann
Questions
Railways, Kent 43w

Widowed people
Social security benefits 17

Wiggin, Mr Bill
Chamber Debates
Energy Bill, 2R (07.12.2009) 110
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 323
Questions
Afghanistan, Detainees 812–3w
Broadband 331w, 932–3w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 221w, 719–20w
Jobseeker's allowance 1015–20w
National Lottery 672w
Planning permission 997–9w
Pupils, Per capita costs 147–8w
Schools, Finance 317–8w
Schools, Herefordshire 318w
Schools, Rural areas 147–8w
Swine flu, Vaccination 1324w
Whales, Conservation 977–8w, 1145w

Willetts, Mr David
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 563–7, 571
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 325
Questions
Domestic visits, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 1351–2w
Education, Prisons 1363–4w
Graduates, Unemployment 599–600w
Graduates, Work experience 1359w
Higher education, International cooperation 340w
Learning and Skills Council for England, Pay 607–8w
Overseas students 340w
Student Loans Company 1365–70w
Students, Loans 950–1w, 1098–9w, 1372–4w
Sugar, Lord 341w
Train to gain programme 345–6w
Young people, Unemployment 346w, 516–20w

Williams, Mrs Betty
Chamber Debates
Afghanistan, Peacekeeping operations (14.12.2009) 659

Williams, Hywel
Chamber Debates
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 912, 917–20
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 674

Williams, Mark
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (15.12.2009) 936
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 914–6
Questions
English language, Education 509w
Excise duties, Oil 405w
Western Sahara, Politics and government 1229w

Williams, Mr Roger
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (09.12.2009) 471
National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Welsh Language) Order (15.12.2009) 916
Questions
Agriculture, Subsidies 491–2
Animal experiments, Wales 1102–3w, 1385–6w
Cheques 964
Christmas, Dept for Work and Pensions 168w
Common agricultural policy 500
Fixed penalties, Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 12w
Food, Dept for Transport 32–3w
Food, Ministry of Justice 109–10w
Post offices 946–7w
Renewable energy, Fuel oil 422w
Tolls, Humber bridge 1163w
Tolls, Severn bridge 971–2w, 1168w

Williams, Stephen
Chamber Debates
Asylum, Petitions (16.12.2009) 1070–1
Higher education (10.12.2009) 559–63
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (09.12.2009) 470
Questions
Further education 330w
Further education, Transport 1364–5w
Higher education 610–1w
Unemployment, Young people 609–10w

Willis, Mr Phil
Chamber Debates
Higher education (10.12.2009) 529–36, 558, 572
Questions
Buildings, Dept for Work and Pensions 243w
Buildings, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 25w
Buildings, Ministry of Defence 827w
Buildings, Treasury 52w
Students, Loans 609w, 1374w

Willott, Jenny
Questions
Advertising, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139w
Billing, Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 1170–1w
Billing, Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1333w
Billing, Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 1140w
Charities, Accountancy 843w
Iraq Committee of Inquiry, Cabinet Office 840–1w
Third sector, Finance 843–4w
Third sector, Government assistance 338
Voluntary organisations 1138w

Wills, Rt Hon Michael, Minister of State, Ministry of Justice
Chamber Debates
Freedom of information (14.12.2009) 777–80
Written Statements
"Freedom of Information Act 2000 Statistics on Implementation in Central Government July to September 2009" 116ws
House of Lords 116–7ws
Questions
Advisory Council on National Records and Archives 117–8w
Bill of Rights 789–90w
British constitution 257–8w
Channel Islands, Health services 273w
Christmas, Ministry of Justice 611w, 1040–1w
Crown dependencies 612w
Data protection, Sentencing 1240–1w
EC law, Ministry of Justice 433w
Elections, Armed forces 619w
Freedom of information 351w
Freedom of information, Academies 433–4w
Freedom of information, Ministry of Justice 792w
Information Commissioner, Secondment 621w
Information officers, Ministry of Justice 793w
Isle of Man, Health services 273w, 795–6w, 1041w
Jersey, EC law 1241w
Manpower, Ministry of Justice 1241w
Monarchy, Succession 438–9w
Office of Public Sector Information 451w
Official hospitality, Ministry of Justice 793w
Prisoners, Voting rights 1042–3w
Secondment, Ministry of Justice 792w
Telephone services, Ministry of Justice 793–4w
Written questions, Ministry of Justice 794–5w

Wilson, Mr Phil
Questions
Children, Databases 138w
Third sector, Finance 343

Wilson, Robert
Chamber Debates
Equitable Life Assurance Society, Petitions (16.12.2009) 1069
Higher education (10.12.2009) 553–60, 572
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 385
Public sector (07.12.2009) 38
Questions
DNA, Databases 622
Drugs, Crime 113–4w
Roads, Accidents 199–200w, 386w

Wilson, Robert—continued
Young offenders, GCSE 143–4w
Young offenders, Special educational needs 318–9w

Wilson, Sammy
Chamber Debates
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 382
Questions
Armed forces, Northern Ireland 823w
Criminal investigation, Northern Ireland 1233–4w
Operating costs, Government Equalities Office 578w
Police Service of Northern Ireland, Finance 969w
Prisons, Northern Ireland 951–2
Security Forces Collusion with Loyalist Terrorists Inquiry 663w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 533w

Wind power
329w, 1126–7w, 1341–2w

Wines
Government Hospitality 1033w

Winnick, David
Chamber Debates
Recess motions (16.12.2009) 983–5, 993
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 521, 523
Questions
DNA, Databases 623
M6, Walsall 37w, 635–6w
Members, Correspondence 851w
Social security benefits, Disabled 7

Winter fuel payments
4, 250w
Derbyshire 1021w
Greater London 785–6w
Leeds 1021w
West Yorkshire 1022w

Winterton, Ann
Chamber Debates
Defence (15.12.2009) 816
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 303–4
Questions
Afghanistan, Armed forces 1201–2w
Armoured fighting vehicles 824w
Banks, Loans 791–2
Financial services, Rural areas 496–7
Departmental responsibilities, Dept for Work and Pensions 16
Police, Inspections 637
Social security benefits, Fraud 16–7

Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Chamber Debates
Home Education Independent Review, Petitions (08.12.2009) 298
Social security benefits (10.12.2009) 524
Questions
Business questions 512
Gibraltar, Territorial waters 1032–3w
Police community support officers 619–20
Rural areas, Economic situation 495
Voluntary work, Disabled 341

Winterton, Rt Hon Rosie, Minister of State and Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills and Dept for Communities and Local Government
Written Statements
Unitary councils 13–4ws
Questions
Audit Commission, Procurement 1261w
Audit Commission, Public relations 57–60w

Winterton, Rt Hon Rosie,—continued
Business, Eastbourne 934w
Business, Government assistance 934–7w
Bye laws 64–5w
Disadvantaged 1267–8w
Electoral Commission, Finance 152
English Regions Network, Finance 1268w
European Charter of Local Self-government 1289w
Floods 902w
Floods, Cumbria 902w
Government Office for London 61–3w
Government Office for the East of England, Training 1272w
Housing, Floods 905–7w
Liverpool City Council, Information and communications technology 65w
Local Democracy, Economic Development and Construction Act 2009 1287–8w
Local government, Compensation 1291w
Local government, Elections 1264w
Local government, Equality 1291w
Local government, Freedom of information 913w
Local government, Northumberland 297–8w
Local government, Procurement 65w
Local government, Reorganisation 12[illegible]–4w
Local government, Standards 913–4w, 1294w
Local government, Suffolk 1294–5w
Local government, Sustainable development 309–10w
Local government services 983–4w
Non-domestic rates, Ports 1300w
North East Economic Forum 1301w
Parks, Merseyside 398w
Regional government 1303–4w
Shops, Chorley 149
Shops, Empty property 1307w
Social rented housing 66–7w
Thurrock Council, Public appointments 135
Unemployment 299w

Wishart, Pete
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 670
Questions
Detention centres, Children 718–9w
Developing countries, Slavery 809w
Dungavel House Immigration Removal Centre 629w
Legal costs, Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 605–6w
Legal costs, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 139–40w
Legal costs, Dept for Work and Pensions 1147w
Legal costs, Home Office 1388–9w
National Lottery, Grants 393–400
Palestinians, Overseas aid 1343w

Women
see Females

Wood, Mr Mike
Questions
Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs 559w
Drugs, Misuse 476w
Drugs, Prisons 1047–8w
Drugs, Rehabilitation 476w

Woodward, Rt Hon Shaun, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland
Questions
Administration of justice, Northern Ireland 658w
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry 658–9w
Christmas, Northern Ireland Office 968w
Devolution, Northern Ireland 1233w
Disabled, Northern Ireland Office 22w, 182w
Information officers, Northern Ireland Office 21w
Internet, Northern Ireland Office 660w
Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People, Public relations 663w
Northern Ireland Equality Commission, Public relations 374w
Northern Ireland government 955–6
Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, Public relations 1238w
Security Forces Collusion with Loyalist Terrorists Inquiry 663w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 952–5, 1234w
Travel, Northern Ireland Office 183w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 948–9

Woolas, Phil, Minister of State and Minister for the North West, Treasury and Home Office
Chamber Debates
Asylum (07.12.2009) 128–32
Westminster Hall Debates
Entry clearances, Overseas students (09.12.2009) 60–4wh
Written Statements
"Independent Chief Inspector of the UK Border Agency Report 2008–09" 112ws
UK Border Agency 32ws
Questions
Art works, Home Office 1388w
Assets, Home Office 715w
Asylum 215w
Asylum, Democratic Republic of Congo 713w
Asylum, Finance 635
Asylum, Repatriation 1043w
Asylum, Scotland 713–4w
Asylum, Sudan 1386–7w
Asylum, Yorkshire and the Humber 1387w
British nationality, Assessments 215w
Buildings, Home Office 1105w
Capita, Home Office 714w
Christmas, Home Office 714–5w, 1104w
Data protection, Home Office 717w
Departmental responsibilities, Home Office 1107w
Deportation 73–4w, 1109–10w
Detention centres 1390w
Detention centres, Children 718–9w
Detention centres, Manpower 719w
Entry clearances 74–6w, 719w, 723w, 1118w
Entry clearances, Iran 1110–1w
Entry clearances, Married people 226–7w
Entry clearances, Overseas students 75w, 221–3w, 625–6, 633–4, 711–2w, 719–20w, 723–4w
Entry clearances, Pakistan 638, 720w, 1111w
Entry clearances, Republic of Ireland 1111–2w
Entry clearances, Skilled workers 1112–3w
Foreign workers 1113w
Freedom of information, Home Office 1105w

Woolas, Phil,—continued*
Illegal immigrants, Croydon 636
Illegal immigrants, Deportation 773w
Immigrants, Detainees 225–6w, 721–2w
Immigrants, Finance 722–3w
Immigration 74–6w, 717w, 1114w
Immigration, Heads of state 720w
Immigration controls 220–2w, 1390–1w, 1393–4w
Information officers, Home Office 716w, 1105–7w
KBR, Home Office 227–8w
Legal costs, Home Office 1388–9w
Manpower, Home Office 716w
Members, Correspondence 724w
Offenders, Foreign nationals 76–7w
Official cars, Home Office 1107w
Pay, Home Office 716–7w
Population 727w
Procurement, Home Office 1389w
Public expenditure, Home Office 1107–8w
Repatriation, Prisoners 230–1w, 1116w, 1393w
Security, Home Office 1108w
Taxis, Home Office 1108w
Telephone services, Home Office 1109–10w
Training, Home Office 1389w
UK Border Agency 629, 727–32w, 1118w
UK Border Agency, Manpower 235w
Work permits 75w, 78w, 86–7w, 1119–20w
Written questions, Government responses 1394w

Work capability assessment
246–7w, 780–1w, 1022–4w, 1149–50w

Work experience
Graduates 1359w
Unemployed people 249w, 412w

Work permits
75w, 78w, 86–7w, 1119–20w

Working Age Agency see Jobcentre Plus

Working hours
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 505–7w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 683–4w
Dept for Transport 381–2w
Dept for Work and Pensions 243–4w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 1334w
Fire services 1358w
Ministry of Justice 110–1w
Solicitor-General 181w

Working tax credit
858–9w

Workington
Bridges 539–40w

World Conservation Union
see International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources

Wright, Mr Anthony D
Questions
Building schools for the future programme 963

Wright, Iain, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Children, Schools and Families*
Questions
Curriculum 1069w
Schools, Playing fields 672w
Specialised diplomas, Rural areas 1078w
Travel, Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1175w
Young people, Unemployment 516w

Wright, Jeremy
Chamber Debates
Personal Care at Home Bill, 2R (14.12.2009) 713, 729–33

Wright, Tony
Questions
Bank services, Standards 799
Stock market 782

Written questions
Dept for Business, Innovation and Skills 507w, 1357w
Dept for Children, Schools and Families 1066w
Dept for Communities and Local Government 391–2w, 1267w
Dept for Culture, Media and Sport 101w, 670w
Dept for International Development 352w
Dept for Transport 1161w
Dept of Energy and Climate Change 926w
Dept of Health 475w, 1047w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 1031–2w
Government Equalities Office 967w
Government responses 547w, 709w, 788w, 1043w, 1139w, 1239w, 1324–5w, 1394w
Home Office 717–8w
Leader of the House of Commons 980w
Ministry of Defence 367w, 959–60w
Ministry of Justice 794–5w
Northern Ireland Office 661–3w
Office of the Secretary of State for Wales 349w, 1141w
Scotland Office 526–7w, 628–9w
Solicitor-General 1004w
Treasury 405w

Wyatt, Derek
Questions
Broadband 933w, 1361w
Climate change, International cooperation 321–2w
Digital technology, Fees and charges 46w
Government departments, Information and communications technology 132w
Middle East, Armed conflict 357–8w, 576w, 774w, 1227–8w
Palestinians, Overseas aid 576–7w
Palestinians, Politics and government 1230w
Royal Fleet Auxiliary 836w, 1208w

York
Business 1348–9w
Dept for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs 502
Energy 324–6w

York—continued*
Floods 498
Sports 964–5w
Welfare tax credits 1384w

Yorkshire and the Humber
Asylum 1387w
Business 1087–92w
Dialysis machines 1318w
Foreign investment in UK 35
Museums and galleries 194–6w
Schools 1073w
Shared ownership schemes 1305w
Sports 103w
Tourism 104w

Young, Sir George
Chamber Debates
House of Lords, Points of order (10.12.2009) 567
Questions
Business questions 505–7

Young offenders
709–10w, 1083–4w, 1239–40w
Children in care 1043–4w
Foster care 279–80w
GCSE 143–4w
Health 15ws
Sentencing 129w
Social services 1248w
Special educational needs 318–9w, 701w
Training 626w, 803–4w

Young people
Alcoholic drinks 1084w
Antisocial behaviour orders 227w
Asylum 413w
Crime prevention 634
Digital versatile disks 235w
Homelessness 676w, 903w, 991w, 1274–82w
Mental health services 769w
Milton Keynes 516w
Stop and search 570w
Sunbeds 1059w
Tobacco 233–4w
Unemployment 1–4, 9–10, 17–8, 167w, 178w, 346w, 516–20w, 600–1w, 609–10w, 794, 844w, 1008w, 1150w
Video games 235w, 1062–3w

Younger-Ross, Richard
Chamber Debates
Local government finance (08.12.2009) 217, 225, 247
Pre-Budget Report 2009 (09.12.2009) 384

Youth Capital Fund
431w

Youth offending teams
Finance 1248w

Youth Opportunity Fund
431w

Youth services
Greater London 151–2w

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

(HANSARD)

SIXTH SERIES—VOLUME 503 (Part 1)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIFTH SESSION OF THE FIFTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT
OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
FIFTY-EIGHTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SESSION 2009–2010

COMPRISING PERIOD
5 January 2010—14 January 2010

HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

MEMBERS OF THE CABINET

(Formed by the Rt. Hon. Gordon Brown, MP, June 2007)

Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Minister for the Civil Service—The Rt. Hon. Gordon Brown, MP

Leader of the House of Commons, Lord Privy Seal and Minister for Women and Equality—The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, QC, MP

First Secretary of State, Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills and Lord President of the Council—The Rt. Hon. Lord Mandelson

Chancellor of the Exchequer—The Rt. Hon. Alistair Darling, MP

Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—The Rt. Hon. David Miliband, MP

Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor—The Rt. Hon. Jack Straw, MP

Secretary of State for the Home Department—The Rt. Hon. Alan Johnson, MP

Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—The Rt. Hon. Hilary Benn, MP

Secretary of State for International Development—The Rt. Hon. Douglas Alexander, MP

Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government—The Rt. Hon. John Denham, MP

Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families—The Rt. Hon. Ed Balls, MP

Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change—The Rt. Hon. Edward Miliband, MP

Secretary of State for Health—The Rt. Hon. Andy Burnham, MP

Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—The Rt. Hon. Shaun Woodward, MP

Leader of the House of Lords and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—The Rt. Hon. Baroness Royall of Blaisdon

Minister for the Cabinet Office and for the Olympics, and Paymaster General—The Rt. Hon. Tessa Jowell, MP (Minister for London)*

Secretary of State for Scotland—The Rt. Hon. Jim Murphy, MP

Secretary of State for Work and Pensions—The Rt. Hon. Yvette Cooper, MP

Chief Secretary to the Treasury—The Rt. Hon. Liam Byrne, MP

Secretary of State for Wales—The Rt. Hon. Peter Hain, MP

Secretary of State for Defence—The Rt. Hon. Bob Ainsworth, MP

Secretary of State for Transport—The Rt. Hon. Lord Adonis

Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport—The Rt. Hon. Ben Bradshaw, MP

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND MINISTERS

Business, Innovation and Skills—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Lord Mandelson §

Ministers of State—
- Minister for Business, Innovation and Skills—The Rt. Hon. Pat McFadden, MP
- Minister for Science and Innovation—The Rt. Hon. Lord Drayson §
- Minister for Regional Economic Development and Co-ordination—The Rt. Hon. Rosie Winterton, MP (Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber)* §
- Minister for Trade, Investment and Small Business—The Lord Davies of Abersoch, CBE §
- Minister for Higher Education and Intellectual Property—The Rt. Hon. David Lammy, MP
- Minister for Further Education, Skills, Apprenticeships and Consumer Affairs—Kevin Brennan, MP §

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
- The Rt. Hon Stephen Timms, MP §
- The Lord Young of Norwood Green
- Ian Lucas, MP

Cabinet Office—

Minister for the Cabinet Office and for the Olympics, and Paymaster General—The Rt. Hon. Tessa Jowell, MP (Minister for London)*

Minister of State—The Rt. Hon. Angela E Smith, MP

Parliamentary Secretary—Dawn Butler, MP

Children, Schools and Families—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Ed Balls, MP

Ministers of State—
- Minister for Children, Young People and Families—The Rt. Hon. Dawn Primarolo, MP
- Minister for Schools and Learners—Vernon Coaker, MP
- Kevin Brennan, MP §

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
- Iain Wright, MP
- The Baroness Morgan of Drefelin
- Diana R Johnson, MP

Communities and Local Government—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. John Denham, MP

Ministers of State—
Minister for Regional Economic Development and Co-ordination—The Rt. Hon. Rosie Winterton, MP (Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber)* §
Minister for Housing—The Rt. Hon. John Healey, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Barbara Follett, MP (Minister for the East of England)*
Shahid Malik, MP
Ian Austin, MP (Minister for the West Midlands)*
The Lord McKenzie of Luton §

Culture, Media and Sport—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Ben Bradshaw, MP

Minister of State—The Rt. Hon. Margaret Hodge, MBE, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Gerry Sutcliffe, MP
Siôn Simon, MP

Defence—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Bob Ainsworth, MP

Ministers of State—
Minister for the Armed Forces—Bill Rammell, MP
The Rt. Hon. Lord Drayson §

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
The Rt. Hon. Baroness Taylor of Bolton §
Quentin Davies, MP
Kevan Jones, MP

Duchy of Lancaster—

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Leader of the House of Lords—The Rt. Hon. Baroness Royall of Blaisdon

Energy and Climate Change—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Edward Miliband, MP

Ministers of State—
The Rt. Hon. Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, OBE
Joan Ruddock, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State—
David Kidney, MP

Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Hilary Benn, MP

Minister of State—
Jim Fitzpatrick, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Huw Irranca-Davies, MP
Dan Norris, MP
The Rt. Hon. Lord Davies of Oldham §

Foreign and Commonwealth Office—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. David Miliband, MP

Ministers of State—
Minister for Africa and the UN—The Baroness Kinnock of Holyhead
Minister for Trade, Investment and Small Business—The Lord Davies of Abersoch, CBE §
Ivan Lewis, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State—
Minister for Europe—Chris Bryant, MP
The Rt. Hon. Baroness Taylor of Bolton §

Government Equalities Office—

Minister for Women and Equality—The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, QC, MP §

Minister of State—Maria Eagle, MP §

Parliamentary Secretary—Michael Jabez Foster, MP (Hastings and Rye)

Health—

Secretary of State—The Rt. Hon. Andy Burnham, MP

Ministers of State—
The Rt. Hon. Mike O'Brien, QC, MP
Phil Hope, MP (Minister for the East Midlands)*
Gillian Merron, MP

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State—
Ann Keen, MP

Home Office—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Alan Johnson, MP

MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister for Borders and Immigration—Phil Woolas, MP (Minister for the North West)* §
Minister for Policing, Crime and Counter-Terrorism—The Rt. Hon. David Hanson, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Admiral The Lord West of Spithead, GCB DSC
Meg Hillier, MP
Alan Campbell, MP
The Lord Brett §

International Development—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Douglas Alexander, MP

MINISTER OF STATE—Gareth Thomas, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—
Michael Foster, MP (Worcester)

Justice—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Jack Straw, MP

MINISTERS OF STATE—
The Rt. Hon. Michael Wills, MP
Maria Eagle, MP §

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Bridget Prentice, MP
The Lord Bach
Claire Ward, MP

Law Officers' Department—

ATTORNEY-GENERAL—The Rt. Hon. Baroness Scotland of Asthal, QC

SOLICITOR-GENERAL—Vera Baird, QC, MP

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND—The Lord Davidson of Glen Clova, QC

Leader of the House of Commons—

LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, LORD PRIVY SEAL AND MINISTER FOR WOMEN AND EQUALITY—The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, QC, MP §

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY, OFFICE OF THE LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—
Barbara Keeley, MP

Northern Ireland—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Shaun Woodward, MP

MINISTER OF STATE—
The Rt. Hon. Paul Goggins, MP

Privy Council Office—

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL, FIRST SECRETARY OF STATE AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR BUSINESS, INNOVATION AND SKILLS—The Rt. Hon. Lord Mandelson §

Scotland Office—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Jim Murphy, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—
Ann McKechin, MP

Transport—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Lord Adonis

MINISTER OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Sadiq Khan, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Paul Clark, MP
Chris Mole, MP

Treasury—

PRIME MINISTER, FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND MINISTER FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE—The Rt. Hon. Gordon Brown, MP

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—The Rt. Hon. Alistair Darling, MP

CHIEF SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. Liam Byrne, MP

FINANCIAL SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. Stephen Timms, MP §

MINISTER OF STATE—Phil Woolas, MP (Minister for the North West)* §

ECONOMIC SECRETARY—Ian Pearson, MP

EXCHEQUER SECRETARY—Sarah McCarthy-Fry, MP

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Brown, MP (Minister for the North East)*

FINANCIAL SERVICES SECRETARY—The Lord Myners, CBE

LORDS COMMISSIONERS—
Frank Roy, MP
Steve McCabe, MP
Dave Watts, MP
Tony Cunningham, MP
Bob Blizzard, MP

ASSISTANT WHIPS—
Mark Tami, MP
George Mudie, MP
John Heppell, MP
Lyn Brown, MP
Mary Creagh, MP
Sharon Hodgson, MP
Kerry McCarthy, MP
David Wright, MP

Wales Office—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Peter Hain, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—
Wayne David, MP

Work and Pensions—

SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Yvette Cooper, MP

MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform—The Rt. Hon. Jim Knight, MP (Minister for the South West)*
Minister for Pensions and the Ageing Society—Angela Eagle, MP

PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Jonathan Shaw, MP (Minister for the South East)*
Helen Goodman, MP
The Lord McKenzie of Luton §

Her Majesty's Household—

LORD CHAMBERLAIN—The Rt. Hon. Earl Peel, GCVO, DL

LORD STEWARD—The Earl of Dalhousie

MASTER OF THE HORSE—The Rt. Hon. Lord Vestey, KCVO

TREASURER—The Rt. Hon. Thomas McAvoy, MP

COMPTROLLER—The Rt. Hon. John Spellar, MP

VICE-CHAMBERLAIN—Helen Jones, MP

CAPTAIN OF THE HONOURABLE CORPS OF GENTLEMEN-AT-ARMS—The Lord Bassam of Brighton

CAPTAIN OF THE QUEEN'S BODYGUARD OF THE YEOMEN OF THE GUARD—The Rt. Hon. Lord Davies of Oldham §

LORDS IN WAITING—The Lord Tunnicliffe, The Lord Young of Norwood Green, The Lord Brett §, The Lord Faulkner of Worcester

BARONESSES IN WAITING—The Baroness Farrington of Ribbleton, The Baroness Thornton, The Baroness Crawley

§ Members of the Government with responsibilities in more than one area

* Regional Ministers (in addition to other ministerial responsibilities)

Full list:

Ministers for the English Regions—
Ian Austin, MP (Minister for the West Midlands)
The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Brown, MP (Minister for the North East)
Barbara Follett, MP (Minister for the East of England)
Phil Hope, MP (Minister for the East Midlands)
The Rt. Hon. Tessa Jowell, MP (Minister for London)
The Rt. Hon. Jim Knight, MP (Minister for the South West)
Jonathan Shaw, MP (Minister for the South East)
The Rt. Hon. Rosie Winterton, MP (Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber)
Phil Woolas, MP (Minister for the North West)

SECOND CHURCH ESTATES COMMISSIONER, REPRESENTING CHURCH COMMISSIONERS—Sir Stuart Bell, MP

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Speaker—The Rt. Hon. John Bercow, MP

Chairman of Ways and Means—The Rt. Hon. Sir Alan Haselhurst, MP

First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means—Sylvia Heal, MP

Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means—Sir Michael Lord, MP

Chairmen's Panel
Mr. David Amess, MP, Janet Anderson, MP, Mr. Peter Atkinson, MP, Hugh Bayley, MP, Miss Anne Begg, MP, Mr. Joe Benton, MP, Mr. Clive Betts, MP, Mr. Graham Brady, MP, Sir John Butterfill, MP, Mr. Martin Caton, MP, Mr. Christopher Chope, MP, Frank Cook, MP, John Cummings, MP, Mrs. Janet Dean, MP, Mr. Nigel Evans, MP, Christopher Fraser, MP, Mr. Roger Gale, MP, Mr. Mike Hancock, MP, Mr. Jim Hood, MP, The Rt. Hon. George Howarth, MP, Mrs. Joan Humble, MP, Mr. Eric Illsley, MP, Mr. Martyn Jones, MP, Robert Key, MP, Dr. William McCrea, MP, Mr. Eric Martlew, MP, Mr. Edward O'Hara, MP, Mr. Bill Olner, MP, Mr. Greg Pope, MP, Bob Russell, MP, Jim Sheridan, MP, Mr. Gary Streeter, MP, Joan Walley, MP, Mr. Mike Weir, MP, Hywel Williams, MP, Mr. David Wilshire, MP, Ann Winterton, MP, Sir Nicholas Winterton, MP

House of Commons Commission
The Rt. Hon. The Speaker (Chairman), Sir Stuart Bell, MP, The Rt. Hon. Harriet Harman, QC, MP, Nick Harvey, MP, The Rt. Hon. David Maclean, MP, The Rt. Hon. Sir George Young, MP

Secretary of the Commission—Dorian Gerhold

Assistant Secretary—Robert Cope

Administration Estimate Audit Committee
The Rt. Hon. Sir George Young, MP (Chairman), Clive Betts, MP, Nick Harvey, MP, Mark Clarke, Alex Jablonowski, David Taylor

Secretary of the Audit Committee—Hannah White, PhD

Management Board
Malcolm Jack, PhD (Chief Executive), Robert Rogers (Director General, Chamber and Committee Services), John Pullinger (Director General, Information Services), Andrew Walker (Director General, Resources), John Borley, CB (Director General, Facilities), Joan Miller (Director of Parliamentary ICT) (External Member), Alex Jablonowski (External Member)

Secretary of the Management Board—Philippa Helme

Speaker's Secretary—Angus Sinclair

Speaker's Counsel—Michael Carpenter

Speaker's Chaplain—Rev. Canon Robert Wright

Medical Adviser to the Speaker—Dr. Ron Zeegen, OBE, FRCP, MRCS, DObst, RCOG

Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards—John Lyon, CB

Parliamentary Security Co-ordinator—Peter Mason

5 January 2010

THE
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE FIFTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 11 MAY 2005]

FIFTY-EIGHTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 503

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 2009-2010

House of Commons

Tuesday 5 January 2010

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

BUSINESS BEFORE QUESTIONS

DEATH OF A MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to report to the House the death of David Leslie Taylor, Member for North-West Leicestershire. David was a highly assiduous, principled and independent-minded Member who respected the House and was respected by it. Truly, he was a House of Commons man, and I am sure that Members on both sides of the House will join me in mourning the loss of our colleague and in extending our sympathy to his widow Pam, his daughters Rachel, Sarah, Jessica and Catherine, his wider family and his many friends.

Oral Answers to Questions

JUSTICE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Drug Misuse (Prisons)

1. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): What recent steps his Department has taken to reduce the level of drug misuse in prisons. [308920]

15. Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): What steps his Department has taken to reduce the level of drug misuse in prisons. [308934]

16. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What recent steps have been taken by his Department to reduce the availability of illegal drugs in the prison system. [308935]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Maria Eagle): I begin by echoing your views, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the House, and to say how sorry we are not to see David Taylor in his place today. As well as a valued colleague, he was a magistrate and an assiduous attender of Justice questions. I am sure that he will be missed on both sides of the House.

Drug misuse in prisons, as measured by random mandatory drug testing, has fallen by 68 per cent. since 1996-97. A comprehensive framework is in place in prisons both to reduce the supply of drugs and to provide drug treatment. Good progress has been made in implementing the Blakey recommendations to improve measures to reduce the supply of drugs in prisons.

Philip Davies: Our proceedings certainly will not be the same without David Taylor, and he will be missed on both sides of the House.

Given that so many drugs are brought into prison by visitors to prisoners, why do the Government not do more to encourage or make mandatory closed visits behind screens in order to stop drugs being brought into prisons?

Maria Eagle: Visitors are one means by which drugs and other contraband can be brought into prisons. We have a number of ways of making sure that we detect such things—for example, active and passive drugs dogs, random searches and intelligence-based action. We believe that that is the best way of identifying these difficulties. Where there is cause for concern, visits are closed, and they can be restricted in various ways, but it would be difficult, in keeping with our attempts to ensure that prisoners can keep in touch with their families, to impose such restrictions on all prisoners in every circumstance.

Mr. Vara: May I join colleagues who have expressed their sentiments about David Taylor—a true parliamentarian in every sense of the word?

With 20,000 prisoners on long-term methadone prescriptions and only 1,000 on an abstinence programme, have the Government got the balance right in their drugs programme in prisons?

Maria Eagle: It is perfectly legitimate to ask whether the balance is correct between methadone maintenance and other forms of treatment designed to cure drug addiction and get people drug-free. It is not the case, however, that all methadone prescription is about maintenance. The only people who get methadone maintenance treatment in prison are those with short sentences that would not allow a proper length of time for detoxification and removing them from drugs. It is important that we have a balance between different types and lengths of drug treatment, and appropriate treatment for each individual. Individuals can have low and high levels of dependency on drugs and we need treatments that will deal with all.

Ann Winterton: In an official report published last October, was it not a positive disgrace that the drugs trade in Wandsworth prison amounted to £1 million a year? Is it not time that, in a secure environment, this trade was stamped on and, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) suggested, longer-term prisoners are enabled to give up their habit completely?

Maria Eagle: I agree that longer-term prisoners should be detoxified and encouraged to become drug-free for life. That is what our policy is aimed at achieving in prisons. We have increased fifteenfold the funding for treatment to get people off drugs in prison over the past 12 years, so there are substantial improvements. It is always difficult to be precise about the value of an illicit trade, but we are implementing policies to prevent illicit drugs from being taken into prison by whatever method. We use drugs dogs and various technologies, including body orifice scanners, which will detect illicit substances being taken into prison. It is a constant fight, but I believe that we are winning it and we have to continue to do so.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I cannot think of any section of any business anywhere in my area or elsewhere that is as badly managed as the prisons. What is the Minister doing about poor management in prisons, so that the excellent prison officers can be given more support both in improving their morale and in developing the skills required to recognise and deal more effectively with drugs in prison?

Maria Eagle: I pay tribute this afternoon both to prison officers, who do a difficult and dangerous job, and generally do it well, and to prison managers, who do the same. They are all part of the same team, and I cannot accept my hon. Friend's analysis that one element of our staff is brilliant and the other is not. They are all our staff and they all do a brilliant job.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): May I add a word of sorrow about the death of David Taylor? He has left us a legacy, through his independence, courage and hard work, that will act as a model for all future Back Benchers.

My question about prisons relates to the experience of two of my constituents, whom the Prison Service had down as models of behaviour and success. They went in as drug users and emerged clean. Tragically, one of them lived for a week afterwards and the other for just a day. Is not the greatest danger for prisoners the point when they leave prison and go back to their old haunts?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend is correct in the sense that there are obvious dangers. Drug abuse and drug dependency tend to have the capacity to produce chronic and repeated relapsing behaviour among those who become dependent on drugs. There is a danger that having been detoxified, there can then be a difficulty, which is why for short-term prisoners who are in prison for only a few weeks methadone maintenance is appropriate. Such treatment can reduce the risk of infection from blood-borne diseases and prevent accidental overdose on release, as well as reducing reoffending. We need to have a wide range of policies that deal with all those issues and proper through-care, from prisons into the community, to make sure that people who come out of prison continue to have appropriate treatment in the community.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Further to the question raised by my old sparring partner, the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies)—on whose birthday we congratulate him today—may I tell my hon. Friend that in my experience of prisoners nothing is more calculated and structured to encourage one to take drugs than lying around and doing nothing all day? Will she realise that education in prison is often the best cure for the problems that lead to the taking of drugs in the first place?

Maria Eagle: When my hon. Friend said he had a sparring partner on the Opposition Benches I wondered who on earth it might be.

Stephen Pound: All of them.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend is probably right.

I agree with my hon. Friend that participation in education provision is a tremendously important part of reducing drug taking and reducing reoffending when prisoners come out. Almost 40 per cent. of prisoners now participate in offender learning and skills, and 38 per cent. enter employment on release. That indicates a great level of success—greater than ever before in our prison system.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): Have the Government learned anything from their evaluation last year of the integrated drug treatment system? Senior prison staff criticised the Government's obsession with maintaining opiate users. They were

> "specifically concerned about the cocktail of illegal substances which prisoners may have access to during time in custody which may potentially be used combined with a daily dose of prescribed methadone."

Is that not a picture of a Government who have lost control of drugs in prisons, and given up on prisons and prisoners becoming drug-free?

Maria Eagle: No, I do not accept that analysis from the hon. Gentleman. It is fair to say that the drug treatment provided in prisons is clinically led under best practice arranged by the National Treatment Agency. It is the same inside prison as it is outside. It is perfectly legitimate for Members and others to question the balance of available treatment. I do not think there is a perfectly correct answer, so it is a good debate to have, but I do not accept in any way that the Government have lost control of drug treatment in prisons.

Voting (Service Personnel)

3. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What steps he is taking to ensure service personnel are able to vote at the next general election; and if he will make a statement. [308922]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): May I, too, express my sadness at the tragic loss of David Taylor? His integrity and independence will be much missed.

If there are any barriers hindering the participation of service voters in elections, we must remove them. To that end, we are introducing new registration awareness campaigns and targeted registration arrangements. We are exploring using supply flights to support postal voting by personnel in Afghanistan. We have set up a working group consisting of officials from the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Justice and the Electoral Commission, as well as representatives of the armed forces, to explore further improvements.

Michael Fabricant: Does the Minister agree that democracy needs to be exercised with responsibility? Will he therefore join me in condemning the crass and dreadful plans of Islam4UK to demonstrate against the Afghan war in Wootton Bassett, which would give so much grief and despair to the relatives of the fallen?

Mr. Wills: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Anyone who has attended those repatriation ceremonies, as I have done, will have been humbled by the dignity and respect shown by the people of that town to those who have given their lives in the service of this country. Anything that displays anything other than the utmost sensitivity in such circumstances will, I think, be treated with repugnance by every decent person in this country—including, I should say, all those Muslims who serve so gallantly in our armed services.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Like you, Mr. Speaker, I shall miss David Taylor, a fellow Back Bencher of the year.

With reference to service personnel voting, will my right hon. Friend tell me whether any special steps are being taken in relation to the Territorial Army? There are particular issues there, with people being deployed overseas as well these days.

Mr. Wills: I thank my hon. Friend for that. We are looking at all service personnel whose deployment might mean that they are not able to exercise the vote to which they are entitled. It is very important that service personnel are registered and that they can exercise their vote. There are logistical problems in some areas of deployment overseas. We are exploring them vigorously and we have set up the working group. We will take every single measure that we can to make sure that service personnel can vote.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): The Minister always says that he is concerned about this subject. He has set up a working group, but it is too late. The Government changed the rules nine years ago to make it more difficult for service personnel to vote, and at the last general election 40 per cent. of service personnel were unable to vote. Only 60 per cent. of the people fighting for our country were able to express their democratic opinion. It is too late now. The Minister has come forward with kind words, working parties, promises and letters, but the Government have done nothing to make it easier for service personnel to vote. I am sure that at the coming general election, which we all hope will be soon, the situation will not be any better than it was last time, because the Government have taken no action.

Mr. Wills: I would be very happy to answer any question that the hon. Lady might have, but I did not hear one. She is wrong in almost every statement that she made. It is not the case that the Government have done nothing. As she well knows, we have extended the service declaration period from one year to three years, and it is to be extended again to five years. We have taken action already to make sure that our service personnel in Afghanistan are able to have an expedited service of postal voting. The hon. Lady well knows that the proxy vote system is available to every member of the armed services anyway, and we have taken other measures as well. Unlike the Government whom she supported, who for 18 years did nothing whatever to address the issue, we have set up a working group, including representatives of the armed services, to make sure that our armed services are able to vote.

Court Cases

4. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): What percentage of cases brought to court were not pursued for administrative reasons in the latest period for which figures are available. [308923]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Justice (Bridget Prentice): I, too, add my condolences to the family of David Taylor, who was indeed an excellent parliamentarian.

The court has no power to end cases for administrative reasons. From July to September last year, of the 45,500 magistrates court trials, 44 per cent. went ahead as scheduled, 38 per cent. were cracked—in other words, the defendant pleaded guilty on day one—and 18 per cent. did not go forward for a variety of reasons, the most common being that a witness or victim did not turn up.

Mr. Robertson: In expressing my sadness at the death of Mr. David Taylor, I draw the attention of the House to the excellent work that he did on flood prevention, which is a subject very dear to my heart.

I thank the Minister for that response, but does she agree that the figures that she gives are alarming? The 18 per cent. of cases which are dropped for whatever reason must represent a huge cost to the court, clog up the courts system and prevent the most serious cases from being considered in a timely manner.

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point: 18 per cent. is still too high. However, that figure of 18 per cent. is significantly down on the percentage seven or eight years ago. The figures then were 23.7 per cent. in the Crown court, down to 13 per cent. in the latest figures, and 31 per cent. in the magistrates courts, down to 18 per cent., as I have just mentioned. We are absolutely committed to reducing those figures further, and good case management is of course part of that process.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Surely the scandal is not just those criminals who escape justice through bureaucratic incompetence, but the cost to the legal aid budget. How much did aborted cases cost the legal aid budget last year? Has not the time come for the incumbent Director of Public Prosecutions to spend less time going around the country attacking Opposition policies and more time doing his day job organising proper prosecutions?

Bridget Prentice: I do not think that it is for me to comment on what the DPP says going around the country; that is a matter for him. If he has concerns about Opposition policies, perhaps it is right that he raises them so that people can then make a proper judgment. However, I say to the hon. Gentleman, again, that bureaucratic reasons do not stop cases going to trial. In the majority of cases, the reason is the unavailability of evidence, because either the victim or the witness does not turn up. That is regrettable, and if we can persuade people to turn up we will ensure that those who are brought to trial for serious criminal offences are dealt with and dealt with seriously.

Southview Probation Hostel

5. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): How many residents of Southview probation hostel in York have been returned to prison for (a) breaking the hostel's rules and (b) committing further offences in the last 12 months. [308924]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Maria Eagle): In the 12 months up to November 2009, out of the 110 offenders supervised at Southview approved premises, 27 were recalled to prison because their behaviour gave cause for concern and four were convicted of further offences, including one who was convicted of a serious further offence.

Hugh Bayley: It is good to know that hostel residents are returned to prison when they break the rules. My constituents are most concerned about the most dangerous offenders—people such as Richard Graves, who was convicted in November last year for a very serious offence committed while he lived at the hostel. He is now back in prison with an indeterminate sentence. What can the Government do to ensure that the courts make more use of indeterminate sentences so that serial offenders like Mr. Graves are kept in prison rather than in probation hostels?

Maria Eagle: The indeterminate sentence for public protection goes a long way to meeting some of the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised. That particular offender, Richard Graves, was in prison with a determinate sentence under the Criminal Justice Act 1991, and he was released on the last possible day that he could lawfully be held before being sent to approved premises where he was subject to serious licence conditions. He was being very closely supervised at MAPPA level 2, and even so he was able to offend further, as my hon. Friend has said. Mr. Graves will now not be able to leave prison until he can show that he has addressed his offending behaviour, and that is what will improve safety for the public. The fact is that, on his previous offence, he was able to leave prison before he had addressed his offending behaviour.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Does the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) not highlight a very real problem with the MAPPA situation—that no one agency takes overall responsibility, that prisoners are not necessarily going to hostels, and that they are being allowed to reoffend? They should not be eligible for early release in those circumstances.

Maria Eagle: That man was not released early; he was released on the last possible day that it would have been lawful to hold him. The question is not about early release. MAPPA stands for multi-agency public protection arrangements, and the whole idea is that all agencies co-operate properly to ensure that somebody always leads in every individual case. The most recent figures indicate that 0.48 per cent. of people supervised under MAPPA level 2 and level 3 reoffended—they committed a serious further offence. That is a low level of reoffending. Obviously, it is a distressing level for those who are subjected to the extra offences, but it is a low level of reoffending given the very high risk of serious harm which those individuals present.

Land Registry (Croydon)

6. Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): What recent discussions he has had with the senior management of the Land Registry on the closure of its office in Croydon. [308925]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): I have recently met those at the Land Registry several times about their transformation programme, which includes the proposed closure of five of their offices, including in Croydon. This programme is intended to put the Land Registry in the best possible position to deliver its services cost-effectively. The consultation is open until 29 January, and all representations will be considered.

Mr. Pelling: Does the Minister appreciate that 57 per cent. of the employees at the very professional Land Registry office in Croydon are aged over 46, which offers the prospect of the loss of a tremendous amount of experience at a time when the Government are expecting the economy to boom and therefore the need for the Land Registry greatly to increase?

Mr. Wills: I recognise those arguments. However, the hon. Gentleman may be aware that the transformation programme began in 2006. Of course, its impetus has been accelerated by the decline in the property market, which we all expect to pick up at some point—there is no question about that. What is fundamentally driving the transformation programme is a strategic change in the way that the Land Registry delivers its services in future. That is what lies behind it, not the current state of the property market.

Electoral System

7. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): If he will make it his policy to retain the current electoral system for elections to the House of Commons. [308926]

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): David Taylor's death, as has already been indicated, was a profound shock to every Member of this House, to the whole of his constituency and obviously to his family. It is particularly poignant for my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) and for myself, because we often joined David for dinner in the Members' Dining Room, where I, not least, was a recipient of his robust advice on what we had got right, which was usually a brief part of the conversation, and what we needed to do better, which was quite a lengthy part of the conversation. There has been much reference to his being a Back Bencher. He was a Member of this House following in its most honourable tradition of representing fearlessly his constituents. He will be very sorely missed.

The Government have repeatedly made it clear that no change in the electoral system for the House of Commons would be made without a decision of the British people in a referendum. We published a comprehensive review of voting systems in January 2008. In his speech at our party's conference in September last year, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that he believed that there should be a referendum early in the next Parliament on whether to move to the alternative vote system for elections to the Commons, and we are giving consideration to how this can best be put into effect.

Kelvin Hopkins: May I say that I, too, am terribly shocked by my friend David Taylor's death? He was not just a colleague here but also a true socialist, and, I may say, a fellow native of Leicestershire too. I miss him greatly.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that the existing electoral system not only maintains the strongest possible link between individual voters and their Member of Parliament, but makes for the maximum possibility of electors choosing their Government, and not leaving it to post-election dodgy deals between parties?

Mr. Straw: That is one of the many merits of the single-Member constituency majoritarian system, and it is one of the reasons that has always led me wholly to oppose proportional representation, which is essentially a deceit on an electorate because manifestos have no value and the real manifesto is the subject of brokering after any election. That said, my hon. Friend will know that the alternative vote is also a majoritarian system. What we are talking about is a referendum in which there would be a great debate about which of two majoritarian systems would be most appropriate for this century.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): David Taylor was a personal friend, and although he and I differed dramatically in politics, I admired him for his independence and his courage. Is the Secretary of State aware that if we move away from the present system of election to this House, the likes of David Taylor will become fewer and fewer in this House, and that is a reason why we should stick with first past the post?

Mr. Straw: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes about the dangers of proportional systems. However, the Australian federal system uses a system of alternative voting, and there is no evidence that members of the Australian federal Parliament lack independence or readiness to speak their mind.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): May I join everybody else in all parts of the House in expressing sorrow at the passing of David Taylor? He was a good friend and had many warm things to say over the years, and we will miss him.

Regardless of the electoral system, the votes will need to be counted. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best way to count them in this country, as traditionally we always have, is on election night rather than on a subsequent day?

Mr. Straw: Yes. I have made very clear our preference for vote counting to take place on election night, and there has been correspondence between myself and the chairman of the Conservative party on that issue. By law it is a matter for returning officers to decide on, but we believe that there is no good reason in the vast majority of cases why counting cannot take place on election night as it has in the past. The reason-cum-excuse that has been offered is the need to verify postal votes. We all accept that need, but good returning officers are showing that they can do the necessary verification before the close of the count in respect of the vast majority of postal votes, not afterwards.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): May I add my own personal sadness at the death of David Taylor? He was always here, he always had something interesting to say, and he was unfailingly kind and courteous. He will be very greatly missed.

Will the Secretary of State not acknowledge that first past the post has led to a series of Governments with big majorities in this House, but with barely more than a third of the vote? It is entirely possible that we will get another one this year. How does it help to restore public confidence in politics at this time of all times to have, over and over again, a governing party with very little support in the country, with the vast majority of the electorate having rejected that party at the election?

Mr. Straw: It is a feature of majoritarian systems, and always has been, that it is rare for there to be an absolute majority of voters in support of the Government of the day. The difference is that majoritarian systems ensure that the largest minority forms a Government. What the Liberals want is a system in which the smallest minority determines the Government. We know that from other countries, not least Germany, where the third party simply changed the Government of the day without there being an election to secure that change.

David Howarth: The Secretary of State is wrong even about whether the party with the largest number of votes always gets the largest number of seats under the present system. It does not. To call the system majoritarian when the leading party does not have a majority of the votes is rather a strange description. Is not the truth that both in 1997 and again in different words in 2001, the Labour party was happy to give the impression of being a reforming party, but as soon as it won the election under the existing system it reneged on its promises?

Mr. Straw: I remember exactly what we said in 1997, because the responsibility was mine. I never gave the impression of being someone who had suddenly had a Pauline conversion in favour of proportional representation, because I had not and have not. What we said was that we would establish a committee, quite properly, to examine new systems of voting. That committee duly reported under the chairmanship of the late Lord Jenkins, and the truth was that there was not a consensus for change, and had the matter gone to a referendum I think it would have been seen as a waste of public money. We now propose a choice for the British people that preserves the best of our system, and there is an opportunity for a great debate about whether we follow what the Australians have done, which in some respects has added to the robustness of their constituency-based system.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): May I invoke the spirit of David Taylor and offer my right hon. Friend some robust advice? Does he accept that the alternative vote system does not necessarily produce any more proportional an outcome than the first-past-the-post system? The only way in which that can be remedied is through top-up seats, but does he accept that they would inevitably create two classes of Member in this House? Is it not too much of a risk to go ahead with such a system?

Mr. Straw: I accept what my right hon. Friend says—

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): Sit down then.

Mr. Straw: I was going to add a gloss to it. On my right hon. Friend's first point, no one has ever suggested that the alternative vote produces a proportionate result. However, by definition, it requires each individual Member to be elected by at least 50 per cent. of those voting, and many see that as one of its merits. It avoids the problems of so-called AV plus, which would lead to two tiers of Members of Parliament. I think that that would be anathema, and would never gain the support of the British people.

Compulsory Transfer Agreements

8. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): With how many countries the UK has compulsory transfer agreements for the return of foreign national prisoners. [308927]

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): Changes made in the Police and Justice Act 2006 have enabled the United Kingdom to ratify the Council of Europe's additional protocol and to negotiate bilateral agreements to provide for compulsory transfer of prisoners. Arrangements are now in place with 35 countries for transfers without consent. Negotiations with other countries are continuing. Since the change in the law was brought into effect, the starting point for all negotiations of prisoner transfer agreements has been on that basis.

Mr. Hollobone: May I suggest to the Secretary of State that progress has been pathetically slow, given that foreign national prisoners now make up some 13 per cent. of the prison population in England and Wales? Does it not give a hollow sound to the Prime Minister's pledge in July 2007, when he said:

> "If you commit a crime you will be deported from our country. You play by the rules or you face the consequences"?

Mr. Straw: I do not accept either of the hon. Gentleman's points. First, the proportion of foreign national prisoners in United Kingdom jails—he cites 13 per cent.—is much lower than that in the vast majority of European countries. For example, in France the figure is 19 per cent., in Germany 26 per cent., and in Greece and Austria 43 per cent. We are far better than most European countries at managing our foreign national prisoner population.

There are two aspects to the hon. Gentleman's question. One is about prisoners who are serving their sentences: we wish them to be compulsorily transferred out to serve their sentence abroad. The second is about deportations of so-called time-expired foreign national prisoners, whom the conventions do not affect. We have significantly increased the number of time-expired prisoners who are deported.

Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his reply, but even though few bilateral transfer agreements have materialised so far, are they not, in many cases, an example of shutting the stable door after the horse has bolted? How many foreign national prisoners who could or should be deported should not have been in the UK in the first place, but were here illegally, as a result of the Government's dysfunctional border policy?

Mr. Straw: I am happy to seek to provide the hon. Gentleman with an answer and lay it before the House. However, let me emphasise that we have greatly reduced the number of asylum seekers who come to this country—it is now around a third of the number with which I was faced when I became Home Secretary 12 and a half years ago. We have significantly tightened border controls—often with not much help from the Opposition on the practical policies that are required. We are also increasing year by year the numbers deported.

Voting Age

9. Mr. William Bain (Glasgow, North-East) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the merits of lowering the voting age to 16 years. [308928]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): The Youth Citizenship Commission's report noted that opinions were divided on lowering the voting age to 16. The Government are now considering the report and how to make progress on it.

Mr. Bain: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he accept that, 41 years after the previous lowering of the voting age, there are powerful arguments for considering a further reduction to give the vote to 16 and 17-year-olds? Under the current system, some young people have to wait almost until their 23rd birthday to vote in a UK general election. Surely someone who is old enough to pay tax in this country, and old enough to join the armed forces, is old enough to exercise the democratic right to vote.

Mr. Wills: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Of course he is right to say that there are arguments in favour of lowering the voting age, which is precisely why we asked the Youth Citizenship Commission to look at the issue. However, it found that opinion is divided, even among 16 to 18-year-olds. We have to proceed carefully. The only way that we can make radical changes in the voting age, as with anything else to do with the electoral system, is—as far as we possibly can—on the basis of consensus.

Departmental Staff Internet Usage

10. Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): What his Department's policy is on the private use of e-mail and the internet by its staff during working hours. [308929]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Justice (Claire Ward): May I add to the comments made by my colleagues, and offer my condolences to the family of David Taylor?

Private use of the Ministry's e-mail and internet systems during working hours happens only with the permission of line management. Such usage must be reasonable, and there is strict monitoring by Ministry of Justice IT services. Any use must not interfere with the performance of official duties. Staff are not permitted to access social networking sites for personal reasons; they may access such sites only for professional reasons, if they can provide a strong business case that shows they need to use those media to perform their roles—such as when somebody was impersonating my right hon. Friend the Justice Secretary on Facebook. It was important for MOJ staff to be able to monitor what he was allegedly saying.

Mr. Goodwill: It has been estimated that surfing the web in work time costs private business in the region of £624 million per year, and I suspect that that problem permeates most Government Departments and their agencies, too. May I commend to the Minister one possible solution to the problem, which has been adopted by Pindar, in Scarborough? That firm provides a separate work station, away from the rest of the work stations in the open-plan office, for private use—and that is the only place where private use can be made of the internet in work time.

Claire Ward: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting suggestion. Actually, the MOJ controls very strongly, and monitors, the access that staff have to browse or surf the web. Within the central area of the MOJ headquarters there are some computers that have much freer access, and those are available for staff to use in their private time, such as lunchtime and before or after work. However, I will certainly make sure that the MOJ IT services find out about the company to which he refers.

Prison Population

11. Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): What recent representations he has received on reducing the prison population. [308930]

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): My Ministry regularly receives many representations on prison matters. The Government have undertaken the fastest ever prison building programme, increasing capacity by over 25,000 places since 1997—around 3,500 are planned for delivery this year—during a period in which crime has fallen by a third.

Overwhelmingly, the increase in the prison population has been of adult male prisoners. Since the publication of the Corston review, the number of women in prison has decreased by more than 4 per cent. We are also endeavouring to increase the transfer of prisoners with serious mental health problems to the NHS secure estate.

Mrs. Moon: May I too add my comments on the very sad loss of David Taylor? I was a new member in 2005, and he was unstinting in his support, and in giving advice, support and a friendly smile as we moved around this place throughout the years.

Ninety per cent. of our prison population have a mental health problem, 70 per cent. have two or more mental problems, and 16 per cent. have up to four or five different mental health problems. A young lady in my constituency has been in and out of prison following offences occasioned by her mental health problems. What steps can we take to work with those mental health charities that are urging us to look at how we improve services—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am extremely grateful to the hon. Lady, but we must make some progress.

Mr. Straw: About two years ago I established the Bradley review, which produced a series of important recommendations that we are now actively seeking to implement. My hon. Friend is right to say that a high proportion of offenders have mental health problems in one form or another. With the best will in the world, only those with the most serious mental health problems will be capable of transfer to the NHS secure estate, but we are now seeing, and have seen, much better collaboration between the prison medical services, which are now part of the NHS—that was a major reform that I introduced a dozen years ago—and the NHS outside, so that with luck, we can ensure that those with mental health problems do not fall into offending, and that if they do, they are better treated.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): On behalf of the Opposition Front Bench, may I join the Secretary of State in his expressions of condolence on the death of David Taylor?

The Justice Secretary was asked about reducing the prison population, but is not the principal tool that he has used one that has seen 70,000 criminals released early from prison under his watch? In the last three years, 40 convicted criminals avoided jail each week despite being assessed as at a high risk of causing serious harm to others. Is it negligence, incompetence or a concerted Government policy that is putting the public at risk?

Mr. Straw: None of those. I regret the fact that we had to introduce the early release scheme, but overall we have been far better at managing the prison estate and the prison population than ever happened in 18 years of Conservative Government: 3,500 prisoners were released in one go—I was in the House when it happened—in July 1997, conveniently just after a general election. There were also more escapes from close prisons per week in the early 1990s than there were last year in the whole 12-month period.

I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will tell us more about his plan to halve the number of prison places—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the Secretary of State that the hon. and learned Gentleman is under no obligation to do that?

Mr. Grieve: The Secretary of State engages in classic displacement activity. The figures that I gave him are his figures, and they happened on his watch—6,000 offenders who were assessed as being at high or very high risk of causing serious harm avoided jail. He says that there is no deliberate policy, but it cannot be sheer incompetence. Some 10,000 prisoners have absconded from prison under this Government, he has pressured the judges not to give prison sentences because he failed to provide the capacity, and now he is offering foreign prisoners up to £5,000 to leave Britain. Will he confirm that that is his policy and his creation, and that his Department will not tell us the total cost of that because it has called in the auditors?

Mr. Straw: I have never pressured the judges one way or the other on their sentencing. Indeed, we now have a transparent system of sentencing guidelines. The fact that the prison population has increased so much—by 40 per cent. since 1997—is a testament both to the fact that this House has toughened up prison sentences, at our instigation and with the Opposition voting against, and to the judiciary, magistrates and judges alike, speaking for the British public. That is a sensible policy, as opposed to a policy of seeking to halve the prison population, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has promised to do.

Topical Questions

T1. [308945] Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): If he will make a statement on his departmental responsibilities.

The Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor (Mr. Jack Straw): As the Under-Secretary of State for Justice, my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice) announced in a written ministerial statement today, we have just published a consultation paper to require mortgage lenders to obtain a court order or the consent of the borrower before repossessing and selling residential owner-occupied homes. That would remove the so-called Horsham loophole. The latest figures show that more than 30,000 people across England were helped between October 2008 and September 2009 under court duty schemes. On average last year, four out of five people had the immediate threat of repossession halted following help from Government-funded court desks.

Bob Spink: Mr. Speaker, David Taylor was a personal friend. His hard work, his independence and his respect for this Parliament will be greatly missed.

Will the Secretary of State boost public confidence in the prison service by making prison regimes tougher, with more education and fewer drugs, and early release contingent on the prisoner's behaviour and the likelihood of reoffending? That would boost public confidence.

Mr. Straw: What we want to see is prison made effective. It is tough, and those who recognise the reality of prison would not want to spend a day inside. We have dramatically increased the resources available for education and, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Justice, the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) has said, we have significantly increased the resources for drug treatment. Prisoners on longer-term sentences have to prove, by their good behaviour, that they are ready for parole. Those on indeterminate sentences cannot be—and are not—released unless the parole board judges that it is safe for that to happen.

T2. [308947] Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): A Wales Audit Office report has concluded that specialist services such as in-patient and forensic mental health services have been poorly managed and controlled in Wales. What steps can we take to ensure that mental health services provided in Welsh prisons for young people and children are vastly improved?

Mr. Straw: We can do a good deal. As I have mentioned already to my hon. Friend, we are implementing the Bradley report. Dealing with prisoners who have mental health problems is very challenging for all concerned, but we are in no doubt about the priority that we attach, and which has to be attached by all prison establishments, to doing it.

T3. [308948] Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): Wolstenholmes, a law firm first established in 1818 and based in my Cheadle constituency, was closed down last week by the Solicitors Regulation Authority. There is now an ongoing investigation into claims of dishonesty and account irregularities. Not surprisingly, many residents have contacted me, extremely concerned about documents and moneys held by the firm. Can the Secretary of State reassure my constituents that their documents and money will be safe, that they will be fully compensated as appropriate, and that there will be a full investigation into the circumstances?

Mr. Straw: I am happy to arrange to meet the hon. Gentleman. I understand the anxiety that will obviously be caused to former clients of Wolstenholmes in that situation. I am also happy to go through with him what we, and the Solicitors Regulation Authority, can do.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): May I refer the Minister of State back to his earlier reply about the reduction of the voting age to 16? I suggest that he look at earlier attempts to extend the franchise—for example, to non-property-owning men, and to women—and consider whether it might not be better to rely on democratic principles, rather than simply on a referendum among those who already have the vote.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Mr. Michael Wills): Of course I am happy to take the historical reference, but I think that my hon. Friend will be aware that all the data show that, even among 16 to 18-year-olds, there is a profound division of opinion about whether the voting age should be lowered.

T4. [308949] Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): With the ever-growing tempo of operations, more and more veterans might find themselves in custody. Her Majesty's Prison Lancaster Castle has, under its own steam, started an initiative for supporting veterans in custody, through which it tries, across the north-west, to link veterans with agencies. The Minister with responsibility for veterans, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), has been very supportive, but at the end of the day the money required comes from the Ministry of Justice. Will the Secretary of State agree to consider its proposal and see whether the small amount of funding required for the pilot scheme could be within his gift?

The Minister of State, Ministry of Justice (Maria Eagle): I am very happy to look into what the hon. Gentleman says about Lancaster. Like many of us throughout the House, he is concerned about veterans of our armed forces ending up in custody. We have just completed a joint data-matching exercise with the MOD to identify the number of veterans in custody. The results show that 3 per cent. of the prison population have served in the armed forces. That will inform our policy development and enable us to provide greater support. We are providing new training for prison staff covering best practice, advice and support for veterans, and information on accessing specialist health treatments. However, I am more than happy to look into the particular instance that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): As the assistant to the Minister for the East Midlands, I add to those of others my condolences to the family of David Taylor.

The Secretary of State will recall visiting Buxton magistrates court in September 2008, when he saw the terrible conditions under which magistrates, staff and others had to work. He will be pleased to know that the refurbished court reopened last week and that magistrates have expressed their satisfaction with it. However, we still need, at some point, a purpose-built court to serve the whole of High Peak. I would be grateful if he could tell me that this aspiration is still at least on the table.

Mr. Straw: I do indeed remember visiting my hon. Friend's constituency, not least the magistrates court, which was in a poor condition. I am glad that, as a result of the representations I received then from him and those in the Court Service, we were able to do something about it. The proposals for new court buildings, which include some in my own constituency, are on the table, but some have had to be deferred because of the tight financial situation, which affects my Department.

T5. [308950] Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): There is a widespread and growing perception that community punishments are a soft touch, which is reinforced by the number of miscreants who simply absent themselves, apparently with impunity. What are Ministers going to do to ensure that community "punishments" are exactly that?

Mr. Straw: Community punishments used to be a soft touch. When I became Home Secretary some years ago, it was almost voluntary as to whether offenders—or perhaps I should say miscreants—turned up for their punishment. One of the other reasons why there has been such a large increase in the prison population is that we have toughened up the breach arrangements, so that if offenders fail to turn up for their appointments with the probation service, or for unpaid work, they can be, and are, sent to jail. I am glad that that is happening. We have also toughened up the perception of community punishments, not least by requiring that offenders on unpaid work wear high-visibility jackets, and by asking the public what kind of work they wish those offenders to undertake.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I gently say to the House that what should not be voluntary is the requirement for short questions and short answers, if we are to maximise the progress down the Order Paper?

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): May I ask the Justice Secretary what advice he has offered the Prime Minister on the issue of pleural plaques?

Mr. Straw: A good deal. This is a difficult issue and involves potential expenditure by a number of Departments, but consideration by Ministers continues.

T6. [308951] Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree with Sir Hugh Orde that his recent remarks about lazy police officers were not constructive and do not reflect the hard work and dangers that many police officers face? Has he not added insult to injury, having already cut police pay?

Mr. Straw: What I was seeking to do—I will send the hon. Gentleman a signed copy of the transcript of my interview—was to say what I hope every Member of the House understands, which is that for a given level of resources, some parts of the same public service do very much better than others. That is true for the health service, the courts and the prisons, and it is also true for the police service. I know that from my long experience—and interestingly, much of what I said was endorsed by a number of police officers, who understood what I was saying. I am a 100 per cent. supporter of the police and what they have done to reduce crime. That cannot, however, prevent us from saying, "This service is doing well; that one's doing less well. Why is there a difference?"

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): May I just say how very much I appreciated David Taylor's presence in this House, including in the Dining Room? We will all miss him a great deal.

Has the Justice Department examined the comparative costs and reoffending rates between keeping drug addicts in prison and providing residential accommodation with detoxification and rehabilitation facilities?

Maria Eagle: Over the past few years we have tried to ensure that drug treatment is available at the same level inside and outside prison, so that individuals can get the treatment suitable for their particular addiction problem, whether they are inside prison or out in the community. We have made great strides in ensuring that that is now possible.

T7. [308952] Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): In the light of the protests and the revelations by the National Association of Probation Officers, will Ministers now instruct their civil servants not to interfere in the drawing up of reports before sentence by probation officers—and in particular, not to ask people to exclude perfectly proper mitigating factors, such as the reason for the protest or the activity?

Maria Eagle: There have always been guidelines about how best to produce reports for the courts to ensure that the correct information is there. I am willing to consider any instance that the hon. Gentleman wants to draw to my attention, but it is certainly not the practice of the National Offender Management Service or of Ministers to interfere with precisely what should go into a particular report for the courts.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd): The Minister will be aware that under the Electoral Administration Act 2006, £17 million was allocated by his Department to the Department for Communities and Local Government to improve registration. That money was unhypothecated. Can he guarantee that the money that was sent for registration was spent on registration?

Mr. Wills: My hon. Friend will be aware that there are considerable variations in practice between electoral registration officers. Sadly, it appears that not all the money that should be spent on electoral registration is being spent on it. We have put measures in place to deal with that. My hon. Friend will be aware that we are determined to end the scandal of the 3.5 million people in this country who are eligible to vote but cannot do so because they are not registered—and we will.

T8. [308953] Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): In the past few days there has been yet another suicide at Lewes prison. There have been far too many such cases in the past 10 years, and this seems to suggest a failure of duty of care at the prison, and a failure to deliver justice for the inmates through the courts. Will the Justice Secretary examine the circumstances of this particular suicide, and try to find out whether there are sufficient prison officers to handle the size of the population at that prison—and will he let me know the outcome of the investigation?

Maria Eagle: Each death in custody is examined carefully and closely by the prisons and probation ombudsman, and there will be the usual investigation in respect of this case. If the hon. Gentleman has particular points to make that he believes are of concern regarding the prison in his constituency, I would be more than happy to hear the details from him, and to take a close look myself.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough) (Lab): I represent a constituency in which, two years ago, there was ballot stuffing—roll stuffing—by a Conservative local government candidate. Will the Ministry consider making resources available, on the basis of risk, to local authorities in which there might be a risk of ballot stuffing, in order to ensure that that does not occur in the forthcoming general election?

Mr. Wills: Of course we are always happy to look at any measures to deal with fraud. It is absolutely disgraceful when events such as those in my hon. Friend's constituency happen. Of course we will look at any concrete proposals. I want to reassure her that we are doing everything we can to combat fraud in our elections.

Sir Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Given that the Information Commissioner has today laid before Parliament a report criticising the Secretary of State's blanket veto on the release of Cabinet Committee minutes from 1997 relating to devolution, will the Secretary of State explain why those particular minutes were, in his opinion, an exceptional case, and why there were particularly pressing reasons to block their disclosure?

Mr. Straw: I set out the detailed reasons in a written ministerial statement, with appendices, which I laid before the House as I undertook to do. I am happy to provide the right hon. Gentleman with a copy. The fact is that section 53 of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 is a fundamental part of the scheme of the Act; it was on that basis that the Bill was agreed. The legislation provides for an appointed person to exercise a veto either after a commissioner's decision or after a tribunal. There is, however, no requirement in the law to wait for a tribunal decision.

T9. [308954] Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The Justice Secretary is aware of my concern about the growing incidence of shop theft. Will he therefore deplore the remarks made by the vicar in York in the build-up to Christmas condoning shop theft, as such remarks are contrary not only to Government policy but to the Bible?

Mr. Straw: They are also contrary to the ten commandments, as I recall—[HON. MEMBERS: "Those are in the Bible, too."] Indeed. I missed the hon. Lady's last point, because one of my hon. Friends was trying to offer me some gratuitous advice. Anyway, I agree with her in every particular.

Yemen

3.34 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): (Urgent Question): To ask the Foreign Secretary if he will make a statement on the situation in Yemen, including the closure of the British embassy and the position of British citizens in Yemen.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (David Miliband): My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will address all the security issues arising from the Christmas incident immediately after this. I will now address the broader picture. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) knows, the Government have been increasingly concerned about the situation in Yemen and about the number and scale of the challenges faced by the Yemeni Government and people. We believe that the increasing insecurity and instability in Yemen pose a threat to the Gulf region, to the wider middle east and to the UK.

Over the past 18 months, the situation has been a growing concern in the region and to Her Majesty's Government. Our cross-Whitehall discussions and close working with international partners led, in September 2009, to the development of a renewed UK country strategy for Yemen. This strategy is currently being implemented by Government Departments across Whitehall, including the Foreign Office, the Department for International Development and the Ministry of Defence. It covers four areas. The first is support for democratic political structures; the second addresses the causes of the conflict—so-called counter-radicalisation; the third relates to building the Yemeni capacity to tackle security and terrorism issues; and the fourth is directed at helping the Yemeni Government to deliver the functions of the state, onshore and offshore.

To strengthen further the international community's support for the Government of Yemen in meeting those challenges, the Prime Minister announced on 1 January that the UK would host a high-level meeting on Yemen later this month, and that will indeed take place. The meeting will focus on galvanising international support for Yemen's fight against terrorism and co-ordinating assistance to address the longer-term economic and social factors underlying radicalisation and extremism.

As a symbol of the Government's long-term commitment to Yemen, DFID signed a 10-year development partnership arrangement with the Government of Yemen in August 2007. The UK development spend is fully aligned to our Yemen strategy and to the priorities of the Yemeni Government's national reform agenda. We will spend about £25 million in fiscal year 2009-10; £35 million to £40 million in fiscal year 2010-11; and, dependent on progress on reform of state structures in Yemen, up to £50 million in 2011-12.

The Government of Yemen are embattled on four different but related fronts: first, the tribal rebellion in the north; secondly, separatism and separatist movements in the south; economic decline across the country, which is particularly important in the context of a near doubling of the population of Yemen that is foreseen in the relatively near future; and also the growing threat from Islamist terrorism in the form of Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, which finds safe haven in Yemen. Urgent economic and political reforms are the only long-term solution to Yemen's problems, but continued instability distracts from the Government's short-term efforts to address these priorities.

As a result of ongoing security concerns, the British embassy closed earlier this week on a precautionary basis for two days. The embassy is now open and staff are back at work. Currently, however, the public services sections of the embassy—the visa and consular sections—are closed. This is under regular review and I discussed the issue with our ambassador in a video conference yesterday morning.

I should point out that it is not unusual for embassies to close during times of heightened tension. During 2009, the British embassy in Sana'a closed on more than a dozen occasions. We have different procedures from other nations for assessing the safety and security of our staff. It would not be right to comment on the specifics of this closure, but I assure the House that it is kept under regular review to ensure that services are maintained. The embassy in Sana'a maintains regular contact with the British community through our wardens network and by regular factual messages to the British nationals who have registered with the embassy.

Finally, the overall threat level in Yemen has not changed. As we make clear in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office travel advice, the threat from terrorism in Yemen is high and remains of concern. We continue to recommend against all non-essential travel to the country.

Keith Vaz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing the question. I refer the House to the Register of Members' Financial Interests and to my personal interest, as I was born in Yemen and lived there for nine years of my life.

In welcoming the London conference, will the Foreign Secretary state precisely what additional support has been given to Yemen as a result of this recent initiative? Will he also confirm that all the money pledged to Yemen in London in November 2006 has been paid over? Can we stop referring to Yemen as a failed state? It has the capacity to fail if Britain, America and the nearby Arab states do not support it. Can we also make sure that the Foreign Secretary visits the country as soon as possible?

David Miliband: There are three parts to my right hon. Friend's question. First, the London meeting will not be a pledging conference, and I do not think that that is what is needed. However, as my right hon. Friend intimated in the second part of his question, some £5 billion was pledged at the London conference in 2006. A small proportion of it has been disbursed, in part because of concerns about how the money would be spent, but there are other issues. I understand that about 40 per cent. of it has been signed and 81 per cent. allocated to different programmes, although only a very small percentage has actually been spent.

In terms of my right hon. Friend's attempt to send me to Yemen, I cannot quite promise him that just at the moment, but the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), will be on a recce to Yemen next month. That will allow us to take forward the conclusions of the London meeting in an appropriate way.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): On behalf of the Opposition, I welcome the calling of a conference on Yemen in London on 28 January. I agree that Yemen is a fragile state—I think we should call it that, rather than a failed state—and that that matters to British security.

I want to ask three brief sets of questions. First, in view of the closure of our embassy, is the Foreign Secretary confident that the right level of consular support can be given to British citizens and officials in Yemen in the event of further closures of the embassy, and that plans are in place to offer them protection?

Secondly, following the announcement of additional US-UK support for a special counter-terrorist police unit and for the Yemeni coastguard operation, may we express the hope that those arrangements will be conducted better than Downing street has conducted US-UK co-operation on related matters in the last 24 hours? Specifically, will the support be purely financial, or will it involve actual assistance on the ground in the form of training? What is the time scale for its delivery, and when is the new unit expected to be up and running? Is this an exclusively US-UK initiative, or does it involve other countries and partners, such as Gulf nations, that may be prepared to work with us?

Thirdly, it should be recognised that Yemen cannot be viewed solely through the prism of an al-Qaeda problem. The Foreign Secretary rightly referred to a mixture of issues. Yemen's internal conflicts are fuelled by political grievances, poverty, corruption and competition over depleted natural resources, issues that require political leadership from the Yemeni Government as well as assistance from the international community. Can the Foreign Secretary assure us that all those issues will be addressed at the conference in January, and will continue to be treated as a priority by his colleagues in DFID? Will he do his utmost to ensure that there is a focus on the Yemeni Government's responsibility to work towards a political settlement in the country, and that we look to the longer term as well as to the immediate problems?

David Miliband: I am confident that the right procedures are being followed in terms of consular support for British nationals. As the right hon. Gentleman will know, there is a relatively small number of them, although the Yemeni diaspora in Britain is of long standing. There is a proud set of Yemeni communities, including, in South Shields, the oldest in Britain. There is obviously some need for consular support, but the ambassador has assured me that that is being dealt with in an appropriate way. The network of wardens that operates in many countries is there to alert us to any problems, but has not yet been notified of any.

The work that is taking place with the Yemeni authorities is more than paying out. The money includes finance for training, which has been an important part of the co-operation that is taking place. We will be discussing with a range of those attending the London meeting whether there is a way in which they could support the UK-US effort, and we will seek appropriate ways in which to use the skills and expertise that other countries can provide.

I was glad to hear what the right hon. Gentleman said about the breadth of the British programme in Yemen and the need to maintain it. The short term, the medium term and the long term are related. Most of the grievances that exist in Yemen are local rather than being related to the global jihad, and although al-Qaeda can try to find roots there, the vast bulk of the issues motivating Yemenis are what we would call bread-and-butter issues that a Government should be seeking to address. Certainly it is the prime responsibility of the Government of Yemen to do so.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Of course the actions of the Foreign Office in Yemen in closing the embassy and working with our allies in Yemen and the United States enjoy support across the House, but will the Foreign Secretary reassure us that, in supporting action against al-Qaeda in Yemen and elsewhere in the region, we are ensuring that local people are not inadvertently alienated by our actions and those of our allies? In giving military support and aid to the Yemenis, and in developing the cross-departmental strategy to which the Foreign Secretary referred, are we impressing on the Yemeni Government the importance of avoiding civilian deaths and of building a sustainable coalition against al-Qaeda across the whole country?

David Miliband: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good and important point, which is highly relevant, and let me say two things on that. First, there has been a very wide welcome across the Gulf, as well as within Yemen, for the fact that the London meeting will not be focused simply on counter-terrorism, because that might play into the sort of dangers to which he rightly refers. The incubus that is Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula must not become a rallying point for the people of Yemen, because they become the unwitting or unwilling victims of attempts to tackle the AQAP presence there.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman is also absolutely right to insist that the economic, social and political issues at the heart of Yemen's development need to be addressed. I think that I am right to say that Yemen's oil wealth is likely to run out in 2015, and the dangers of water scarcity are very real. Those issues evidently are not amenable to a counter-terrorist solution, and require a much more deep-seated and effective role for government, supported by the international community. That is why the fourth priority that we mentioned—the functioning of the state—is so important to addressing those issues.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): The Foreign Secretary mentioned radicalisation; will he undertake also to have close talks with the Saudi Government? They have some programmes that may seem unorthodox to some western eyes, but that nevertheless seem to be working in the Saudi and Arab context. I think that we should learn from that.

David Miliband: My hon. Friend makes an important point. As it happens, the Saudi programme that was featured on this morning's edition of the "Today" programme is one that I visited last year in Saudi Arabia. It is a counter-radicalisation programme, rather than a radicalisation programme—that is an important point to make—and is extremely innovative. I met a failed suicide bomber—

Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): By definition—

David Miliband: Hence failed, but it is not a laughing matter, as he killed a lot of people in a market by blowing up a bomb in a truck that he was driving. He said that he did not know what its contents were and that he had been inveigled into driving the truck. He and a number of other people were going through that programme, which involved taking a comprehensive look at their lives, including in relation to religious instruction. A large number of innovative products are also available in terms of people's return to normal life after the programme. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to this matter, and I congratulate the Saudi Government on how they are going about dealing with it. It is certainly something that we work closely with them on.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): May I also declare an interest as an officer of the all-party group that visited Yemen a couple of years ago? I found some very impressive Anglophile Ministers there, who think that Britain has a key role to play in that country and who want us to play a key role. I also found that the electoral gains made there by radical Islamists were in the areas of greatest poverty. We clearly need to do more to eradicate the terrorists, but can we also do much more to eradicate and rehabilitate their breeding grounds?

David Miliband: I am sorry to sound like a stuck record, but the hon. Gentleman also makes an important point. I hope that the House can be united in making the point that those who allege in today's newspapers that we are wasting our money by spending development funding on anti-poverty measures in Yemen are wrong. The figures that I have read out are substantial by any stretch of the imagination, but the fact that they enjoy cross-party support is positive. He is right that if Yemen is to be prevented from becoming a more dangerous breeding ground for terrorism, it needs to develop the sort of life chances for people that he and I may take for granted.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): At an enormous cost in loss of British human lives, we joined America in its invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan. Before we commit even more human lives to another nightmare, should not we consider the possibility of having an independent British foreign policy?

David Miliband: We should certainly have a foreign policy that is decided independently by the Government and people of this country, but we should not have an isolated foreign policy that attempts to work on its own. I am proud that we are very close partners of the United States, European Union countries and a large number of countries in the Gulf, which are very concerned about the situation. The attention that we have been paying to Yemen in the past 18 months is in significant part a product of the growing concern, from 2008, of countries in the Gulf that wanted British help regarding their concerns about the situation in Yemen. We are not unwelcome helpers in Yemen, and we certainly are not trying to recolonise it. That is an important point to emphasise.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Although I welcome this short discussion about Yemen, we are only having it because of al-Qaeda. Would it not be instructive if the Government were to produce a document about the international strategy against al-Qaeda, or hold a conference in London at which international partners could be invited to talk about that? That would be better than waiting for statements about other countries in which al-Qaeda is operating that may not be in the news at the moment.

David Miliband: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, although I think that he would be one of the first to recognise that it is wrong to talk simply about al-Qaeda and not to distinguish between its senior leadership based in Afghanistan and Pakistan and Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula or in the Maghreb. There are distinctive issues related to al-Qaeda's senior leadership on the one hand and its so-called franchises on the other. They are certainly worthy of study and debate, and the more the better, as far as I am concerned. However, the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) made the good point that there was a meeting with parliamentarians on the situation in Yemen before the Christmas incident. The fact that there is a thriving all-party parliamentary group, chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East, speaks for the close links that exist between Britain and Yemen, and long may they continue.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Given that a significant proportion of terror offenders turn out to have been radicalised towards extremism here in Britain rather than in Yemen or elsewhere, should not the Prime Minister also consider calling a summit on the radicalisation towards extremism and terror that takes place here?

David Miliband: That is exactly what the Prevent strategy has been founded on over a number of years. A large number of meetings—I do not know whether they qualify as "summits"—have been held within Government and around the country to address precisely this issue.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I agree with the Foreign Secretary about the importance of aid in removing what I call the "scourge" of the spots where terrorism can spring up, but my right hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary described the Government of Yemen as fragile. Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House just how widely supported the Government of Yemen are among all the people, bearing in mind the tribal conflicts in the north and the separatist movement in the south?

David Miliband: Far be it from me to be a lawyer for the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), but in his defence—or at least in explanation of his position—I think that he said that Yemen was fragile, and not its Government. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) will know that President Saleh is in his second term of office, and that the constitution prohibits him from running for a third term. Parliamentary elections in Yemen are due in 2011, and they will clearly be a massive challenge. One issue that will need to be addressed is precisely those democratic elections and people's ability to express their opinions in them. However, the number of Yemenis who are committed to violence—whether through the Houthi movement in the north or the secessionist movement in the south, and still less through links to al-Qaeda—are a very small minority.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): All over the world—in Afghanistan and Pakistan and next door in Somalia, for example—our armed forces and aid budgets are stretched. Why has Britain, or perhaps the Prime Minister, chosen to take a lead in Yemen, when our resources are so stretched? Might it not be time to let the US or our other allies take a lead with regard to Yemen? Is it perhaps not a country too far?

David Miliband: So much for an independent foreign policy. First of all, this country has a long-standing history with Yemen, and I think that that gives us an important role there. Secondly, we are in a group of pre-eminent donors that includes the United States, the Germans, the Dutch and the Saudis, and indeed I spoke to the German Foreign Minister today. In terms of the stretch, we have been careful to make sure that, in our funding in Yemen, we spend only what we know that we are able to spend properly there. The hon. Gentleman is right that there is a range of other problems. In my view, the situation in Somalia is best addressed through the security work of AMISOM—the African Union mission in Somalia—but, on a political level, through the UN Security Council. The meeting that has been called and the other forms of co-ordination that are being established befit the situation in the Yemen rather better. History in Somalia is rather different.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The increase in international aid funding that Her Majesty's Government have promised pales into insignificance against what the oil-rich Arab countries on the peninsula could and should provide. Should not Her Majesty's Government make it clear to the countries on the Arabian peninsula that their priority should be dealing with potential problems from the Yemen, rather than spending millions of pounds on half-mile-high skyscrapers?

David Miliband: I am not sure whether it is the Government who are spending the money on the skyscrapers to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but he makes an important point. Some of the largest pledges at the 2006 conference were from Gulf countries, not western countries. It is important that those pledges are fulfilled. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East raised the question of which of those pledges had been paid, and that is a pertinent point.

The point of mentioning our aid programmes is not some vainglorious attempt to say that we have the biggest programme but to explain that there is a British commitment and it is proportionate to the sort of responsibility that we should bear. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that this is an issue that needs to be raised by countries of the region. I am pleased to say that in the past 18 months they have been doing so, and they have put us on alert about their needs.

Aviation and Border Security

3.55 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Alan Johnson): With permission, Mr Speaker, I would like to make a statement on the failed attempt to destroy a passenger plane at Detroit airport on Christmas day and its implications for national security. My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will make this statement in the other place.

On 24 December, Umah Farouk Abdulmutallab, a Nigerian citizen, travelled from Lagos to Amsterdam, where he boarded Northwestern Airlines flight 253 to Detroit. As the flight was approaching Detroit on Christmas day, he detonated a device that was strapped to his upper thigh and groin area which resulted in a fire and a small explosion. He was restrained and subdued by passengers and flight crew and he remains in custody in the US.

Authorities in the US, the UK, the Netherlands, Nigeria and Yemen are now doing everything they can to piece together Abdulmutallab's movements shortly before this attack, and are considering what urgent steps need to be taken to prevent further attacks of this nature.

It is an issue of grave concern that the explosive device was not detected by airport security in either Lagos or Amsterdam. As has been widely reported, Abdulmutallab attended University college London between 2005 and 2008, where he completed a degree in engineering. During this time he was known to the Security Service but not as somebody engaged in violent extremism. His family and friends have stated their belief that he turned to this during his time in Yemen.

From the information we have currently, it is not possible to chart with absolute certainty Abdulmutallab's exact movements after he left the UK in 2008. He is known to have spent several months studying international business at a university in Dubai and in August 2009 he travelled to Yemen, where he is thought to have stayed until December before returning to west Africa. He came to the attention of UK authorities again on 28 April 2009 when he applied for a multi-entry student visitor visa to attend an eight-day course provided by Discovery Life Coaching based in east London. The UK Border Agency refused his visa application because Discovery did not hold a valid accreditation with a UKBA-approved body and was not eligible to sponsor international students.

Since March 2009, only institutions which are either tier 4 sponsors or hold valid accreditation are permitted to bring in short-term foreign students from outside the European economic area. Universities and colleges must be able to demonstrate that they are offering genuine courses that will benefit students seeking to study in the UK. This new regime has reduced the number of institutions able to bring students to the UK from over 4,000 to approximately 2,000. Following the refusal of his application, Abdulmutallab's name was added to the UKBA watch list.

In the light of the serious questions that this incident has raised, I want to set out today, first, the immediate steps that we are taking to tighten aviation security, secondly, what measures we are taking to prevent radicalisation in our universities, and thirdly the actions we are taking to disrupt al-Qaeda in countries where it is known to be active, in order to prevent future terrorist attacks, and to improve co-operation with our international partners.

It is of great concern that Abdulmutallab was able to penetrate airport security at Amsterdam. The device he used had clearly been constructed with the precise aim of making detection by existing screening methods extremely difficult.

Abdulmutallab underwent a security check at Schipol airport in Amsterdam, as do all passengers transferring from Nigeria to another flight. Although Schipol airport is trialling body scanners, they were not in use for that flight. He passed through a metal detection gate, which would have detected objects such as explosive devices with metallic components, and knives and firearms. However, certain types of explosive, without metallic parts and which can also concealed next to the body, cannot be detected by that technology, which is the reason why airports also search passengers at random.

To defeat the terrorist threat requires constant vigilance and adaptability. A great deal of progress has been made in enhancing aviation and border security since 9/11; but terrorists are inventive, the scale and nature of the threat changes, and new technology needs to be harnessed to meet new threats, while minimising inconvenience to passengers.

Last year, we issued new public guidance to the industry on our technical requirements for screening and the detection of improvised explosive devices. The Prime Minister instigated an urgent review of airport security following the incident in Detroit. My noble friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I have been intensively engaged in the review, and we are today setting out our initial steps.

It is clear that no one measure will be enough to defeat inventive and determined terrorists, and there is no single technology that we can guarantee will be 100 per cent. effective against such attacks. Airport security is multifaceted and needs to adapt constantly to evolving threats. We therefore intend to make changes to our aviation security regime.

Air passengers are already used to being searched by hand, and having their baggage tested for traces of explosives. The Government will direct airports to increase the proportion of passengers searched in that way. There may be some additional delays as airports adapt, but I am sure the travelling public will appreciate the reasons behind this.

The Transport Secretary has brought into force new restrictions that tighten up security screening for transit passengers, and is reviewing the support we provide for security standards in airports operating direct flights to the UK. Passengers will see an increased presence of detection or sniffer dogs at airports to add to our explosives detection capability.

We also intend to introduce more body scanners. The first scanners will be deployed in around three weeks at Heathrow. Over time, they will be introduced more widely, and we will be requiring all UK airports to introduce explosive trace detection equipment by the end of the year. We are discussing urgently with the airport industry the best way of doing all this, which will include a code of practice dealing with the operational and privacy issues involved.

BAA has started training airport security staff in behavioural analysis techniques, which will help them to spot passengers acting unusually and target them for additional search. Beyond that, we are examining carefully whether additional targeted passenger profiling might help to enhance airport security. We will be considering all the issues involved, mindful of civil liberties concerns, aware that identity-based profiling has its limitations, but conscious of our overriding obligations to protect people's life and liberty.

These measures build on the substantial progress we have made in recent years to strengthen our borders. The roll-out of e-Borders, which will check passengers, including those in transit, against the watch list, will be 95 per cent. complete by the end of this year, and makes us one of only a handful of countries to have the technology that can carry out advanced passenger data checks against our watch list before people travel to the UK. Those who apply for a visa—whether they do so from Bangkok, Lahore or Pretoria—have to provide fingerprints and their records are checked against our watch list, which holds over a million records of known criminals, terrorists, people who have tried to enter the country illegally or been deported, and those who agencies consider a threat to our security.

Through the e-Borders programme and through screening passengers against the watch list, we have since 2005 made 4,900 arrests for crimes including murder, rape and assault. In addition, UK Border Agency staff based overseas working with airlines, prevented more than 65,000 inadequately documented passengers from travelling to the UK during 2009.

Abdulmutallab's failed attack highlights the importance of information sharing between the various agencies about people who pose a threat to our security. The UK watch list is managed by the UK Border Agency and incorporates intelligence from the law enforcement and the security and intelligence agencies into a single index. Nevertheless, although the integrated approach works very well, we want to see if we can further strengthen it. The Home Office will therefore be conducting an urgent review of the robustness of our watch list. The review will report to me in two weeks and, subject to security restrictions, I will report the findings to Parliament.

The House will no doubt be concerned about the possibility that Abdulmutallab's radicalisation may have begun or been fuelled during his time studying at University college London. It is important to remember that the values of openness, intellectual scrutiny and the freedom of debate and tolerance promoted in higher education are one of the most effective ways of challenging views which we may find abhorrent but that remain within the law.

However, we know that a small minority of people supporting violent extremism have actively sought to influence and recruit people through targeting learners in colleges and universities, and we must offer universities the best advice and guidance to help prevent extremism. As part of a measured and effective response to the threat, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills has published guidance on managing the risk of violent extremism in universities, and is working closely with universities in priority areas to provide targeted support.

Alongside this, each university has a designated police security contact with which university management can discuss concerns. The Prevent strand of Contest, our counter-terrorism strategy, works closely with the higher and further education sectors and funds a full-time Prevent officer at the National Union of Students. As I have said, Abdulmutallab's family believe he turned to violent extremism after leaving the UK, but we need to ensure that this close co-operation continues in our efforts to stop radicalisation of young people in our colleges and universities.

[Alan Johnson]

Finally, I want to say something about our work internationally and the steps that the Government are taking abroad to disrupt al-Qaeda wherever they are active. Our success in tackling the international terror threat depends on strong relationships with our international partnerships. In our efforts to thwart al-Qaeda, we have a long-standing, productive partnership with the US.

I am not prepared to go into detail on this particular case about what was shared with the US and when. It is an established and accepted principle that we do not routinely comment on intelligence matters. Moreover, some of these issues are still current and are highly sensitive. However, I would like to clarify that although we did, in line with standard working procedures, provide information to the US linked to the wider aspects of this case, none of the information that we held or shared indicated that Abdulmutallab was about to attempt a terrorist attack against the US.

This morning, I met Jane Lute, the US Deputy Secretary for Homeland Security. We discussed how over the coming months, in the light of this failed attack, we will work together with other international partners to maintain public confidence in aviation security and deepen our partnership to disrupt al-Qaeda's activities overseas. Pushed out of Afghanistan and under increasing pressure in the border areas of Pakistan, affiliates and allies of al-Qaeda—such as Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula, the group claiming responsibility for the Detroit bombing—have raised their profile. With the failed Detroit attack they have again demonstrated their intent to attack innocent people across the world.

The aim of our counter-terrorism strategy is not just to reduce our own vulnerability, but to dismantle those terrorist organisations which pose a threat to the UK, whether at home or abroad.

Al-Qaeda will take any opportunity to exploit ungoverned space and instability. Whether the threat is in the Sahel, Somalia, Yemen, Pakistan, Iraq or Afghanistan, we must support Governments and work with partners to address both the threat of attack and the underlying causes of extremism and instability. We have been working with the Yemeni Government, as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary just said, for a number of years, helping to improve their law-enforcement, intelligence and security apparatus, and to disrupt al-Qaeda and deny them a safe haven in Yemen for the future. We are also one of the leading donors on development in the country—our current commitment standing at £100 million by 2011.

We recognise the need to strengthen further our partnership with countries in the region and beyond so that we can co-ordinate our efforts against al-Qaeda more effectively and provide greater support for the Yemeni people to reject violent extremism. International co-operation is critical to meeting what is a global threat, and the coming together of the international community in London later this month to discuss Yemen will be an important step towards security in Yemen and across the globe.

It is important to reiterate that the incident was a failed attack on the US by a Nigerian national—someone who was refused entry to the UK and who, it seems, was radicalised after he left this country. However, there are lessons to be learned by the international community, and the measures that I have outlined will provide the UK with greater protection from terrorist attack. Along with our work overseas and with our international partners, enhanced airport security and more thorough collation of intelligence, we will be able to strengthen our efforts to tackle the root cause of violent extremism and reduce the threat of future attack.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for providing me with an advance copy of his statement. I shall start with airport security.

We all accept that as we learn the lessons from the recent plot, happily an unsuccessful one, additional security measures will have to be taken. The use of more sophisticated scanning technologies is inevitable, although we will have to make sure that sensible measures are taken to protect privacy. However, the Home Secretary's statement is ambiguous about scanners, so will he clarify whether he plans to make full-body scanners compulsory at all UK airports? He talked about e-Borders, so will he also clarify the situation with the European Union over the use of the e-Borders project? Will there be European legal restrictions on the use of the e-Borders database?

We believe that it is necessary to take a more intelligence-led approach to airport security, as well as to watch carefully for suspicious behaviour by passengers, so the Government will have our support in taking prudent measures to protect passengers. Those matters of judgment must be kept under constant review, even if there is public attention only when the security measures are challenged.

However, the person who should be before the House explaining himself this afternoon is not the Home Secretary but the Prime Minister. Twice in three days the Prime Minister has been caught out making false claims about the contacts that have taken place between Britain and the United States over the airline bomb plot and the security threat to our airports. On Sunday he admitted to the BBC that supposed discussions between himself and President Obama about the bomb plot and the situation in Yemen had not actually taken place. Then, yesterday, he claimed that Britain had supplied to the United States in 2008 intelligence about the bomb suspect and his links to extremists—a claim that Downing Street now admits was untrue. This Government, the House will remember, have systematically misused intelligence data over the years, most notably in relation to the so-called dodgy dossier. Does the Home Secretary agree that it is absolutely unacceptable for the Prime Minister—the man who leads our Government—to exaggerate, mislead on or spin intelligence information, particularly when it relates to a terrorist threat?

The Home Secretary told the House this afternoon: "It is an established and accepted principle that we do not routinely comment on intelligence matters." Why did the Prime Minister and Downing street break that principle this week? Does the Home Secretary agree also that it is damaging to our most important intelligence relationship, with the United States, for Downing street to disseminate information in such an inaccurate and cavalier way?

The entire House will be relieved that on this occasion the bomb plot was unsuccessful. It will serve as a strong reminder to Governments across the world of the ever-present terrorist threat and the fact that we all need to remain vigilant about that threat as well as united in a determination to defeat it.

It is also worth saying that the threat from a small group of Islamic extremists in no way represents the views and beliefs of the vast majority of decent, law-abiding Muslim people in this country and around the world. People of all faiths have been victims of terrorists over the past decade, and we must all stand together against that threat. However, that task has not been helped by the actions of Downing street in recent days.

Alan Johnson: I regret the fact that the hon. Gentleman uses this very tense time to score cheap party political points. I saw lots of faces among those on the Conservative Benches looking appalled that this situation should be used to make a personal attack on the Prime Minister.

The hon. Gentleman made only three points that I believe are relevant to this issue. First, on the number of full-body scanners, we now need to work with the airline industry to decide how many of these scanners we can have and where we can locate them. As I said, we will have the first ready at Heathrow within three weeks. Thereafter, they will become much more widely available in terms of the capacity to manufacture them and put them in place and the need to get from the various airline companies their authority, agreement and input.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the EU situation. That was clarified just before Christmas when, thankfully, the Commission agreed that there were no Community issues about the transfer of information. That obviously still requires the countries transferring the information to agree their data-processing techniques, but there is no EU issue; that is what the Commission was originally looking at.

The third point was about our use of intelligence and our co-operation with the United States. As I said, the Prime Minister was absolutely right that we did share information with the US. We do not routinely comment on the nature of such information or the information itself. None of that information suggested that Abdulmutallab was planning a terrorist plot. Incidentally, as I mentioned, I met Jane Lute, the Deputy Secretary for Homeland Security, this morning, and she did not mention this matter at all. We spoke about the productive way we can work together to deal with these issues. There is absolutely no relationship in the world stronger than the relationship between the UK and the US, particularly on counter-terrorism, where we work closely together and will continue to do so in the light of this latest threat.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): I, too, thank the Home Secretary for early sight of his statement.

The Home Secretary's announcement that scanners are to be rolled out quickly at British airports is certainly welcome. However, his statement raises several questions. First, can he confirm that such scanners would have been effective in detecting the substances carried by Umah Farouk Abdulmutallab? Secondly, why has it taken him so long to act, given that these scanners have already been trialled and that four are reported to be in storage at Heathrow? Thirdly, will he respect those who may have a deep-felt objection to the scanners by allowing them to opt instead for a body-pat search, for example as part of his code of conduct? What assurance will he give that images of children and others will not be stored?

The Home Secretary opens the door to profiling, but what does this mean? If he means additional searches for those with suspicious travel patterns, then I am sure that I speak for everybody in this House when I ask who could object? But if he means stopping everyone who looks Asian, then I fear that he will alienate exactly those communities whose co-operation we need in the fight against terrorism. Which is it?

Then there is information sharing, which the Home Secretary really cannot dismiss by saying that the Government do not comment on intelligence matters, particularly in the light of recent events in Downing street. Can he confirm the account of a Downing street spokesman that Britain told US intelligence more than a year ago that the Detroit bomber had links to extremists? Can he confirm—this is not an intelligence matter—that the US was informed after that person was placed on a UK watch list? In the light of those contradictions and the open spat with our closest ally, what measures are the Government taking to improve liaison with the United States, or possibly with the Prime Minister's press operation?

Given that the Detroit bomber transited through Schiphol, were the Dutch authorities notified bilaterally of our concerns at any point? Had we shared our information with our European partners through either Europol or other routes, and what mechanism is there for one EU country to become aware of such intelligence on a suspected radical held or collected by another EU country? Do we routinely share information about our watch lists with our European counterparts even for passengers who are only in transit? In the light of the attempted attack, do those systems need to be improved?

Alan Johnson: On whether scanners would have been effective in relation to Abdulmutallab, the indications are that given where the PETN was placed, there would have been a 50 to 60 per cent. chance of its being detected. That is the view of most people who operate the scanners, so the scanners themselves are not the magic bullet. A British company, Smiths Industries, is developing the technology all the time, and we need the next wave of technology with explosive detection as well as body imaging to move ahead very quickly.

I do not accept that we took a long time to act. This happened on Christmas day, and over the Christmas period my colleague the Secretary of State for Transport has been discussing with the airlines the availability of equipment. There was one body scanner at Manchester and a number have been mothballed in Heathrow on a trial basis, but whether they are serviceable or need to be updated has been the subject of the conversation. Today's announcement is the earliest possible time to get moving.

[Alan Johnson]

The issue of privacy will be important, but all the images are destroyed immediately and the person responsible for the scanning is in a completely separate room, as anybody who has seen the system in Manchester or the version in Glasgow operating will know, so there is no immediate contact between the person doing the imaging and the person being imaged. Privacy considerations are important, but I believe that we can ensure that those who have concerns can be satisfied. I do not foresee a situation in which people can simply object to a body scan. We need to use the scanners perhaps not as the first line of our defence but as the second line, on a random basis.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the important issue of profiling. I said in my statement that I recognised the sensitivities of that matter. Anyone can examine the case of Anne Mary Murphy in 1986, who was a pregnant woman inveigled by her Syrian boyfriend to carry a bomb on to a flight to London. She would not have matched any profile, and in the case of someone like Richard Reid the name would not have alerted anyone. Nevertheless, whether we can deal with sensitivity issues must be part of our consideration of any defence that we can find to address the gap in our defences that Abdulmutallab found, although he was thankfully unsuccessful. We need to consider profiling while recognising the concerns and civil rights issues involved.

We share information all the time on a routine basis, and the US shares information with us. We did not inform the US that Abdulmutallab was on our watch list having been refused a student visa, because the case was not conducted with any concern that he was coming over to commit a terrorism incident. It was an immigration issue, and we would not share such information routinely with the US. We share other information with the US, and we share it routinely with our European partners, although if there were concerns about terrorism we would not wait for a watch list and for the plane to be taking off. It is outside Europe that we have the problem; as the hon. Gentleman well knows, we have a close relationship within the EU, which means that we deal with such security issues straight away. We do not wait for people to come to an airport and try to get on a plane to another country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. No fewer than 16 hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. As always, I should like to accommodate everybody, and the numbers should be perfectly manageable. I simply remind the House that there are two further statements to follow, and I reiterate my usual appeal for each hon. Member to ask a single, short supplementary question and, of course, for the Home Secretary to provide us with an economical reply.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): The Home Affairs Committee recently visited both Heathrow and Schiphol, and the Home Secretary is right to consult the airlines and be measured in his response. Of course, in principle, we should have the body scanners, but international co-operation is the most important aspect. I accept what he says about sharing information, but are there any more lessons to be learned about how we can improve the situation?

Alan Johnson: Doubtless there are. I recognise my right hon. Friend's expertise in the matter. In some countries, there are separate watch lists for security, for policing and crime, for people who have lost their passports and for immigration issues, but an integrated watch list serves us well. With e-Borders continually coming on stream, we can deal with the matter before the person has taken off. That is important, given that Abdulmutallab was not trying to enter a country, but to blow himself up before he landed. Whether he was in transit or his destination was this country did not therefore matter. We need to ensure the tightest possible control. Although it all worked well, I would be the last person to appear complacent. As the Prime Minister said, the incident is a wake-up call—every failed terrorist attempt must be picked to pieces so that we find anything that we can use to strengthen our defences. We intend to do that.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): Terrorists watch very carefully the technology that we deploy. Does the Home Secretary realise that the term "scanners" covers a wide range of things? Some use millimetre technology; others use terahertz; some require one to go through a box, and others can scan remotely in airport lounges or railway stations. Will the Government please institute a research programme? Several British companies are involved in such research, but the Government never pull through new technologies. We need to stay ahead of the terrorists, not deploy after an incident.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point. I do not accept that we have been slow in dealing with this. We are due to meet Smiths Industries shortly, and the document that Lord West, our security Minister, produced in August 2009 was specifically aimed at the scientific community and innovators to get things moving and find new ways to deal with such matters. It is important to stress that there is a great deal of British technology that we can exploit. We need to ensure that we get the right body scanners—that is one reason for talking to the airlines. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is a variety of scanners, and we need to use the most effective.

John Reid (Airdrie and Shotts) (Lab): I refer the House to my interests in the Register of Members' Financial Interests. I welcome in particular the way in which the Home Secretary emphasised that there is no magic bullet for solving the problems. I say that in the light of recent media comments, particularly about full body scanners, which still require standardised procedures, are still in trials and so on. A range of search procedures and technologies is required. Above all, as the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) said, constant innovation in our thinking must be embedded in everything that we do. Will the Home Secretary therefore build on Lord West's good work and ensure that a partnership of the Government, academia and private industry is given more resources so that we can we stay ahead of the curve and the terrorists' thinking in introducing new ways of terror?

Alan Johnson: My right hon. Friend largely makes the same point as the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor). I agree with it. It is perhaps another reason for redoubling our efforts to stay ahead of the terrorists. We will not deal with the matter through body scanners alone. Every day, sniffer dogs come into the Chamber, looking for PETN. Behavioural detection is another method, but even with all the techniques we can use, we can never guarantee 100 per cent. safety—there is no magic bullet. However, a lot of people out there are willing to innovate, work and provide equipment and the technological capacity that can move us to the next level. That is the main lesson of Detroit on 25 December.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): The Home Secretary is the lead on homeland security, but will he acknowledge the debt we owe to the Ministry of Defence personnel and the scientific civil servants working at defence science and technology laboratories at Porton Down in my constituency, and particularly at the Counter Terrorism Science and Technology Centre, who are responsible for the day-by-day innovation that goes on in science and technology? Will he talk to the Ministry of Defence, which has tremendous budget problems, to ensure not only that there is no cut in the defence budget as it affects Porton Down, but that quite the reverse happens? Porton Down should have all the resources it needs to counter terrorism.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman is a great advocate for Porton Down. I am talking to the Defence Secretary. This is a cross-Government initiative. All the relevant Departments are working together on this, using all the agencies at their disposal, Porton Down being one of them.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Aviation is international. What new steps are being taken to link intelligence information with the best attainable system of security at individual airports?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is the Chairman of the Transport Committee, and I know that she has taken a great interest in this issue. I talked to Jane Lute this morning—she is the US Deputy Secretary for Homeland Security—about the best way to have an international gathering to discuss the lessons emerging from this and we are still talking things through. There was a view that we should perhaps get a gathering of Ministers together next week in Brussels. Actually, the opportunity under the Spanish presidency, which is very interested in this matter, comes up in a few weeks' time. More and more we are centring on that as the opportunity to get Transport Ministers, homeland security Ministers and perhaps Defence Ministers together to talk about an integrated programme as to how we can act internationally.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right: this will not be solved by us nationally, by its very definition—a Nigerian coming from Nigeria through Holland to bomb Detroit has ramifications for a much wider set of countries. We need to deal with this matter internationally, which is what we intend to do.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Who authorised the Downing street spokesman to brief so emphatically that information about the Detroit bomber had been passed to the Americans before the bombing?

Alan Johnson: I am not getting into who authorised whom to say what. What the Prime Minister said about us exchanging information with the US was absolutely right. As I said in my statement, none of that information remotely suggested that Abdulmutallab was planning an attack on Detroit.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): One resource we could use better is the eyes and ears of the travelling public. Will my right hon. Friend consider creating a central reporting point for members of the public who spot lapses in security in airports from which they are travelling to the UK?

Alan Johnson: I will consider my hon. Friend's suggestion. Of course, there are plenty of opportunities for people to report such things. There was a programme over Christmas about the 999 emergency service being used spuriously, but certainly for anyone who has the slightest fear that there is a security problem, that is one course of action, and there are others. He makes a good point, and we will look at whether we can make it easier for the travelling public to report any suspicions they have.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): As the Home Secretary is no doubt aware, the only UK airport to be subject to terrorist attack is in Scotland—Glasgow airport. Can Scottish airports therefore expect to be among the first in line for full-body scanners? Will he assure me that he will be working hand in glove with the Scottish Government to ensure that Scottish airports are as safe as possible?

Alan Johnson: I can assure the hon. Gentleman on both those points. We need to talk to the airlines about which airports are first. I believe that Heathrow will feature, given the huge amount of transit—we are talking about transit passengers as well because, as we should remember, Abdulmutallab was a transit passenger in Holland and was not searched properly—but other airports, including Glasgow, will be very much part of the discussion. Indeed, I believe discussions with the Scottish Government have already started.

Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston) (Lab/Co-op): We are obviously concerned today with the immediate threats, but may I pass on a warning to the Home Secretary from constituents of mine who have worked their whole lives in Heathrow airport, and the Unite union, that there has been talk of introducing competition between terminals? Will he ensure that security always comes before competition?

Alan Johnson: I can give that assurance, although I am not sure what my hon. Friend means about competition. Security, whether at terminal 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5, is the absolute priority, not competition between terminals.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): In the wake of the failed bombing, many in the intelligence community have expressed concerns about the activities of schools—or karatus—in northern Nigeria and the role that they play in radicalising young men and preparing them for jihad. In the international strand of the Home Secretary's work, which he mentioned in his statement, can he confirm that those schools will be swept up in that and that he has had discussions with his counterparts in the Foreign Office to ensure that those schools are properly addressed?

[Hugh Robertson]

Alan Johnson: Again, the hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Of course, Abdulmutallab himself went to a British school, but it is an important issue that I need to discuss with the Foreign Secretary to ensure that we are doing everything that we can, not just on airport security, but—as I said in my statement—to prevent radicalisation taking place in the first instance, whether in this country or abroad.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough) (Lab): There have been some interesting proposals about investing in research on the technology required to detect terror. Although the Home Secretary acknowledged in his statement the risks of identity-based profiling, I am concerned that we will not have sufficiently robust research into the effects of such profiling on young Asian or Muslim men who think that they are expected to behave in a certain way and therefore think, "Why don't I?" Can he assure the House that robust research will be done on the potential consequences of identity-based profiling before any such proposal is introduced?

Alan Johnson: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance, but behavioural detection is different from profiling. Behavioural detection is used by British Transport police, who are trained in it, to observe individuals and how they act around uniformed officers as a preliminary to a possible search or questioning. On profiling, I recognise not only the sensitivities and civil liberties issues that were raised by the Liberal Democrat spokesman, but the possibility that the terrorists—who, as we have said, are one step ahead—will use our main weapon against them to their advantage by using people who do not fit the profile, such as pregnant women or old gentlemen like me. That is the other danger of profiling, and we need to be very careful. I am acutely aware of that, but it would be strange if, in response to Detroit, we did not thoroughly explore all the different elements and options—some of which may be discarded.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): This is a bit rich from this Government who year on year have cut the research budget that allowed our law enforcement agencies to stay at least one step ahead of the terrorists. When I developed the millimetre wave with the team at QinetiQ, before I came into this House, we had to go to the Americans to get the funding because the Government cut it. What concrete extra resources will the Home Secretary put into the further development of technologies and manning at airports to ensure that our borders are more secure?

Alan Johnson: I know that the hon. Gentleman has some experience in this field, but I just do not understand the criticism of this Government for what we have invested in science. The hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) is no longer in his place, but he has continually praised the Government for the 10-year science and innovation project and the fact that, when I was Secretary of State at the old Department of Trade and Industry, more than half of my budget was for science. It was also ring-fenced, which was frustrating at times because I could not touch it for other things. Criticise this Government for many things, but do not criticise us for our investment in science.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): How will my right hon. Friend consult on and communicate any changes that are made in profiling? It is very difficult, because changes need to be made in a way that does not trigger people's knowledge that we are doing such things, but it is also important to avoid unnecessary community tensions.

Alan Johnson: I take my hon. Friend's point. There would be no benefit in even studying the use of profiling if we were not talking to groups representing different ethnic minorities in this country. We have to take them along with us on this. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) actually supports the use of profiling, and there will be different views in different communities and ethnic minorities. All I am saying is that it would be irresponsible not to look at whether profiling can play a part in strengthening our defences.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): If we are to search people more thoroughly and introduce body scanners, we will need far more space and personnel at our airports. Given that most of our airports seem to be crammed full of duty-free boutiques, will the Home Secretary make it clear to airport operators that security matters have to come first?

Alan Johnson: I see an advantage for our alcohol policy coming up here. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is inviting me to change the use of space at airports. This is one of the important discussions that we have to have with airport authorities and airlines: physically how we can do this properly with the minimum of inconvenience to the public and ensure that people can go about their daily business. That is an important part of these discussions.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): May we have stronger action to deport immediately those people in this country suspected of promoting extremism and of becoming radicalised? May we include in that list those who would hold offensive marches?

Alan Johnson: We always keep such issues under review. As I said in my statement, it is important that we do not take action simply because people have views that we find abhorrent but which are not illegal. We are a democracy, and there needs to be proper debate on our university campuses. It would be totally counter-productive for us to be heavy-handed in that respect. Through the Prevent strategy we are strengthening institutions, helping individuals and providing information, facts and advice to those who want to counter some of these radical views. As part of that, of course, we deport, and seek to deport, lots of people; many are queuing up for deportation at the moment. However, in a democracy, they have their right to judicial review and to go to the European Court. All of that, of course, is important, but at the end of the day they will be deported, providing we have done our job properly.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): Given the strong links that Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab had with Britain, can the Home Secretary tell us whether, in due course, the British police will have an opportunity to question him, particularly with a view to ascertaining any continuing links that he might have with Britons and what those links are all about?

Alan Johnson: All I can say at this stage is that two Metropolitan police officers are working with the FBI in America on the case. As the hon. Gentleman will have seen on his television screen over Christmas, the police took immediate action in this country. We do not comment on current police operations, and we will have to wait for them to come to a conclusion. That might well involve the British police wishing to ask questions, but we will have to see how the operation goes.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): I have had e-mails from constituents expressing concern about health risks and dignity as a result of the use of the scanners. Can the Home Secretary say anything on the public record to reassure people about such matters?

Alan Johnson: My understanding is that there is less radiation from a body scanner than from the flight itself. On privacy, as I have mentioned, we can probably think and do more, but at the moment all the images are destroyed immediately and the person operating the machine is remote from the person being scanned, which means that there is no face-to-face contact—they are anonymous while being scanned. However, it is difficult to get around the privacy issues, given where Abdulmutallab was trying to hide his explosives. If that is how terrorists seek to get around such issues, obviously we might have to be a little less delicate about privacy if we are to counter the threat effectively.

4

Copenhagen Climate Change Conference

4.44 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy and [illegible]mate Change (Edward Miliband): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement about December's Copenhagen climate change conference, at which I represented the United Kingdom alongside my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Today I want to report back to the House and set out where we go next in the global battle against climate change.

Let me say at the outset that the outcome of Copenhagen was disappointing in a number of respects. We are disappointed that Copenhagen did not establish a clear timetable for a legal treaty and that we do not yet have the commitments to cuts in emissions that we were looking for. However, I also want to report to the House the significant progress that the accord agreed at Copenhagen marks and explain how we can build on the progress that was made.

The Copenhagen accord, which is available in the Library, was agreed by a group representing 49 developed and developing countries that together account for more than 80 per cent. of global emissions. The key points of the accord are as follows. It endorses the limit of 2° C in warming as the benchmark for global progress on climate change. Unlike with every previous agreement, not just developed, but all leading developing countries have agreed to make specific commitments to tackling emissions, to be lodged in the agreement by 31 January.

Also for the first time, so that we can be assured that countries are acting as they say they will act, all countries have signed up to the comprehensive measurement, reporting and verification of progress. On finance, significant commitments have been made by the rich world to developing countries. They include fast-start finance worth $10 billion a year by 2012, with a total of up to $2.4 billion from the UK, and specific support to tackle deforestation. In the longer term, the accord supported the goal, first set by the Prime Minister, of $100 billion a year of public and private finance for developing countries by 2020.

By any measure, those are important steps forward, but we know that the world needs to go much further. We need more certainty and a greater scale of ambition. So the urgent task ahead is to broaden, deepen and strengthen the commitments that were made in Copenhagen, drawing on the large coalition of countries that wanted more from the agreement. Broadening the commitments is vital. Forty-nine countries signing up to the agreement is not enough. To tackle the global problem, we need a wider group. The United Nations is seeking to persuade all countries to sign up to the accord, and the UK is determined to play its part in making that happen.

In addition, we must act to deepen the commitments on emissions made by countries across the world. Lord Stern has shown that if nations make the biggest emissions cuts in the range that they have put forward, we can be within striking distance of the two-degree pathway that we need, including with the peaking of global emissions by 2020. We know that that is in our economic as well as our environmental interests. Greater certainty about emissions is necessary to provide the strongest incentive to business, including through the carbon price. So we will work to persuade other countries that we all need to show the highest levels of ambition on emissions as part of the commitments that we make. For Europe, provided that there is high ambition from others, that means carrying forward our commitment to moving from 20 to 30 per cent. reductions by 2020 compared with 1990. We must also act to strengthen the accord, including by continuing our efforts to secure a legally binding framework. In taking on clear commitments and actions, we should recognise how far major developing countries have come in the past year. However, we must also seek to allay their concern that they will be constrained from growth and development by the demands of a legal treaty.

[Edward Miliband]

We must draw on the coalition between some of the world's richest developed countries and some of the world's poorest and most vulnerable developing countries, such as Ethiopia and the Maldives, all of which want a legally binding structure. Strengthening the accord also means that richer countries must make good on the promises made on fast-start finance and show that we can fully fund the longer-term goal of $100 billion, one of the tasks for the high-level panel on sources of revenue that was agreed in the accord.

Those efforts to make progress on substance must, in our view, be accompanied by reform of the process of decision making. The conference was held up by disagreements over procedure: which text negotiators should look at and whether, as in Kyoto, a representative group of countries could be formed to avoid having to discuss everything in a plenary of 192 nations. Those disputes about process meant that it was not until 3 am on Friday, the last day of a two-week conference, that substantive negotiations began on what became the Copenhagen accord. By then there was simply too little time to bridge some of the differences that existed. We need to find better ways of running the process of negotiation, so I welcome the UN Secretary-General's decision to look again at those issues.

We also welcome the decision by Chancellor Merkel to host a conference as part of the mid-year negotiations in Bonn, and we will work with the incoming Mexican presidency, which will be hosting the next conference in November. But dialogue and negotiations need to restart before June—something I made clear to Yvo de Boer, the executive secretary of the convention on climate change when I met him in London just before Christmas.

In looking back at Copenhagen, we must bear in mind that reaching agreement would inevitably be tough because we were seeking consensus among 192 countries. Like most ambitious efforts, it was always going to be difficult to succeed the first time round. However, we should not let frustration with the two weeks at Copenhagen—albeit justified—obscure the historic shift that this past year has marked.

I want to pay tribute in particular to the enormous effort of those in the UK, from the scientific community, civil society, British business and the general public, who have mobilised on climate change. Their ideas and energy helped to drive us forward over the past 12 months and during the Copenhagen conference itself. Let me assure them and the House that we are determined to strengthen and sustain the momentum behind the low-carbon transition in the UK. Building on our low-carbon transition plan, our world-leading policy on coal and our plans for nuclear, we will be making further announcements in the coming weeks and months on energy generation, household energy efficiency and transport. Following Copenhagen, as part of the work already ongoing on the road map to 2050, we are looking at whether further action is necessary to meet our low-carbon obligations, and we will report back by the time of the Budget. This will include looking at the advice of the Committee on Climate Change published last autumn.

Internationally, thanks in large part to the deadline of Copenhagen and the mobilisation behind it, every major economy of the world now has domestic policy goals and commitments to limit its greenhouse gas emissions, including the United States, China, Japan, Russia, Brazil, India, Indonesia, South Korea, Mexico, South Africa and, of course, the EU. Throughout the world, policy is now set to improve energy efficiency, to increase investment in low-carbon power, to develop hybrid and electric vehicles and smart grids, and to reduce deforestation.

So although Copenhagen did not meet our expectations, 2009 did see the start of a new chapter in tackling climate change across the world. This global shift might not yet have found international legal form, but scientific evidence, public opinion and business opportunity have made it irreversible. In 2010 and in the years ahead, this Government—and, I am sure, the vast majority in this House—are determined to ensure that we redouble our efforts to complete the unfinished business of Copenhagen.

Climate change remains the biggest global challenge to humankind, and it requires a global solution. We owe it to our children, their children and the generations to come to find it. The work has started, it will continue this year, and I believe that it will succeed. The fight against climate change will be won. I commend this statement to the House.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for giving me advance sight of his statement, and for the briefing that he kindly gave me in advance of the Copenhagen summit. It is disappointing that the Prime Minister is not making this statement, however. He missed questions in the House in order to go to Copenhagen early, and it is surprising that he has chosen not to report to the House on what he accomplished there. The Secretary of State and I share the view that we need to see global action on climate change. If Copenhagen showed one thing, it was that the discussions should not end there, and that they must continue.

Before Copenhagen, we said that a rigorous deal should achieve three things. The first was a commitment to limiting warming to 2° C. The second was a clear focus on adapting to climate change and on finding a dependable mechanism to finance that. The third was urgent action to preserve the rain forests. On the first, the 2° C proposal was noted, as the Secretary of State said, but the accord is completely unclear about when emissions should be cut, and by how much. On the second, it is welcome that adaptation was so prominent in the discussions, but there is no clarity on the sources of finance. On the rain forests, there was once again discussion of the issue, but nothing that could be meaningfully described as a political deal, let alone a legal framework. By any objective assessment, therefore, Copenhagen was a flop.

The question is: how do we move on from here? I wonder whether the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, in this statement today and their remarks before Christmas, have reflected deeply enough on the implications of the outcome of Copenhagen. The Prime Minister has volunteered to lead a global campaign to make the Copenhagen accord legally binding, but what precisely is it that he would make legally binding? The accord is essentially an agreement to disagree, defined chiefly by what is absent from it. It contains nothing to indicate the scale or the timing of the carbon reductions required of the world, or indeed of any particular country. Is it still the Prime Minister's intention to lead such a global campaign for ratification?

In the days after the conference, the Prime Minister said that the negotiations had been held to ransom by only a handful of countries, and that that must never be allowed to happen again. The Secretary of State clarified that this included China, but has he not missed a big point here? Does he not see that Copenhagen requires us to face up to what I think is an uncomfortable reality, so to blame China, India and other countries for wrecking a deal is futile because no meaningful global deal can be done without them? Do we not need to understand why these nations considered a real deal to be against the interests of their own people? This view is reflected in their insistence on including in the final text the declaration that > "social and economic development and poverty eradication are the first and over-riding priorities of developing countries".

In other words, the implication is that attacking climate change ranks, for them, below these priorities.

This revealed preference on the part of India, China and other parts of the developing world cannot simply be overlooked or assumed away. The People's Daily reported that the Chinese Government would treat talks in 2010 on a binding global deal as a struggle over "the right to develop". Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with me that the central issue is now how cutting current and future emissions can be shown to be compatible with development? Does he agree that for developed and developing countries alike, becoming less dependent on fossil fuels, using energy more productively and damaging the environment less is a pathway that can enhance the prospects for economic development, for prosperity through trade and for the reduction of poverty? If he does, will he accept that we now urgently need a new politics of climate change—one that can convince both around the negotiating table, as it failed to do in Copenhagen, and in the court of public opinion that the action we must take to guarantee the stability of the climate in the long term is also in the interests of both rich and poor in the short term?

Does the Secretary of State agree that three shifts from how Copenhagen was conducted are required—first, the case for action should always be based on practical rather than ideological grounds; secondly, action must not be presented in sacrificial terms, but as a set of economic and wider opportunities; and, thirdly, leaders and Ministers must see it as their mission to persuade and to unify rather than to denounce and divide?

Edward Miliband: I slightly regret the tone of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I welcomed the cross-party support for the Government's work at Copenhagen, from the hon. Gentleman himself and from those on the Liberal Democrat Benches—and, indeed, from the Leader of the Opposition and from the leader of the Liberal Democrat party. All of us who went to Copenhagen sought to get the best agreement we could and I believe that we can build on the accord that was reached. Petty and partisan remarks about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others, however, really do not become the hon. Gentleman.

Let me deal now with the hon. Gentleman's specific points. On the question of the accord and whether there should be a global campaign for it, I believe it is necessary to seek to encourage more countries to sign up to it. It is not just me that thinks that, as the President of the Maldives, Prime Minister Meles of Ethiopia and a coalition of developing and developed countries signed up to the accord. It is not an agreement to disagree. I said clearly in my remarks that it is a matter of regret that the emissions reductions were not lodged at the time of the agreement, but they will be lodged by 31 January, and I hope that those will be targets. I mentioned all the countries that have targets and we can build on that, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not understand that these will be lodged as part of the agreement by the end of January. As I say, it is something on which we can build. That is my first point to the hon. Gentleman.

On the second point, of course developing countries emphasise the overriding importance of development. Indeed, the words that the hon. Gentleman cited were taken either from the Kyoto treaty or the Rio convention, which both emphasised the overriding priority of development for developing countries. I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's characterisation of how we talked about Copenhagen. When he or I talked about Copenhagen, we did not talk about it simply in sacrificial terms; we talked about it as being good for our economies. We did not talk about it simply in ideological terms either; we talked about what countries could gain from it and we talked about how it could unite rich and poor nations alike.

I am all for slogans about the need for a new politics of climate change and all that, although I will have to talk to the hon. Gentleman at some point about what that means. I think it best to build on the progress made at Copenhagen—although it was disappointing—and, more important, the progress made over the last year, and to use the opportunities that we shall have in the coming year to secure the agreement that we did not secure at Copenhagen.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East) (Lab): I attended the Copenhagen conference in my capacity as the Council of Europe's rapporteur on climate change. May I offer my congratulations to my right hon. Friend and the Prime Minister—as did many people at Copenhagen—on the leading role that they played in bringing about the Copenhagen accord? The Opposition clearly do not understand that, as at Kyoto, an agreement was reached in principle and the details will come later during years of negotiations. That is called the process of the United Nations. We did not secure a legal UN agreement because—as the House knows, and as I have constantly said—it was never possible to secure a legally binding agreement at Copenhagen. The matter will be decided in the negotiations.

May I ask my right hon. Friend, who will be involved in those negotiations, to take into account, as one of the criteria relating to burden-sharing, the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities? May I also ask him to recognise pollution as measured per tonne? In America it is 20 tonnes per person; in Europe it is 10; in China it is 5; and in India it is 2. If we take those issues into consideration, we shall be able to combine social justice, the eradication of poverty, and growth and prosperity, along with a greater chance of agreement.

[Mr. John Prescott]

Edward Miliband: I congratulate my right hon. Friend the former Deputy Prime Minister on the role that he played at Copenhagen through the Council of Europe, and, of course, on the role that he played at Kyoto. He speaks with great wisdom on these questions. Just as it would be wrong for Government not to admit the disappointment that was part of Copenhagen, it would be ridiculous for anyone in the House to deny that any achievement has been made in the last year. That, I am afraid, was the problem with what was said by the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark).

I agree with what my right hon. Friend said about burden-sharing and common but differentiated responsibilities. Many of us believed that we had already incorporated that principle, and indeed it is incorporated in the Copenhagen accord. I remind the House of the commitments that must be registered. In the case of developed countries, the commitment is to cuts in emissions; in the case of developing countries, including China and India—as is clear from the annexes to the agreement—it relates to actions that they are taking. However, my right hon. Friend is correct to say that common but differentiated responsibilities must be at the heart of both this accord and any future agreement.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement, and commend his efforts and those of the Prime Minister before and during the Copenhagen conference. However, is not the honest truth that many of the efforts made at Copenhagen were too little too late, and that the Copenhagen agreement will probably go down in history as one of the only occasions on which so many world leaders came together in one place to discuss one of the most important issues and came away with so little to show for it?

Do the Government not accept that there is no excuse for not having sorted out the procedural issues beforehand, and that there clearly was not enough political leadership during the months preceding the fortnight in Copenhagen? To ensure that there will be no more disappointing conferences and no more setbacks like that of last month, will the Secretary of State commit himself to ensuring that political leaders here and in the European Union will be engaged in all the steps of the process—all the interim meetings—rather than just leaving it to a glamorous, or in this case rather unglamorous, summit? If the United Nations Security Council can sit in permanent session, why cannot a United Nations climate council do so as well? If this is indeed the biggest crisis, there really ought to be a mechanism for dealing with it.

As a supporter of the EU, I am sad to have to ask why it appeared to be so ineffectual on this occasion. Why did it not play the card that it had promised, and say that it would raise its target to 30 per cent. at Copenhagen? That might have triggered a much better response elsewhere. Given that it did not do that, is there not now an opportunity for the United Kingdom to propose—and for Baroness Ashton, in her new role, to propose—that the EU set a 30 per cent. target for the new decade this month? That proposal could either be contained in the accord annexe submissions that must be in by the end of January, or be submitted at the first EU summit this year.

Why did the Commonwealth not play a more significant role? I am a huge supporter of the Commonwealth, whose fantastic diversity—ranging from the Maldives and Tuvalu to Canada, Australia and other countries—surely presents a great opportunity for countries to share their experience and be a real force for influence in the world. I hope that the Secretary of State will undertake to ensure that it plays a much bigger role in future.

What about the US and China? How are we going to get them to sign on a dotted line and be more ambitious?

Lastly, rather than what has been suggested in some of the post-Copenhagen comments in the British press—that measures on climate change response and emissions targets will make us uncompetitive in a competitive world—will the Government make it clear, as I know that the Secretary of State is committed to doing, that unless we get an agreement that binds everybody, we will miss the chance to have a sustainable future for all countries, not just ours? We will also miss the chance to have the sustainable jobs and sustainable, safe and secure energy on which the security of the world depends.

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman asks serious questions that deserve serious answers. Let me go through them. On his question about process and why we got to the stage that we did, the mess of process partly represented big disagreements about substance, because there was concern among a number of developing countries about the notion of Denmark tabling its own text. Why did it take until 3 am on the Friday for the leaders' representatives from a group of 27 countries—representing 49 countries if the EU is included—to get together in a room? It was because the Danes were systematically prevented from tabling a text, because people kept saying, "We are not ready yet to go into a smaller room." The same thing happened at Bali and Kyoto. That was one reason why we did not bridge some of the divides—because by 3 am on the Friday there were less than 24 hours of the conference to go.

The hon. Gentleman's other points about procedure are important and correct. The notion that negotiators should be left to negotiate, even though they take instructions from Ministers, is insufficient. His notion that there should be some kind of permanent session is also an option that should be considered. It is very important that we do not leave it until June and the mid-year negotiations in Bonn to restart the whole process. The EU needs to use its commitment to going to 30 per cent. with comparable action from others. We need to build more of a consensus than we have in the EU at the moment to move to 30 per cent., but I think that the process of 31 January commitments is an initial stage in which the EU should seek to push others to higher levels of ambition, and should itself seek to be as ambitious as possible.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman slightly about the Commonwealth, because it issued and pushed an important set of demands and requests regarding finance, some of which came through in the final agreement.

On the US and China, we want the deepest cuts from all countries, including the United States, but that is dependent on its legislation. It was willing to make an initial offer before making legislation, but the legislation that went through the House of Representatives was more ambitious than the offer that was made, so there is some hope there.

On the legal treaty and the attitude of certain developing countries, a process of persuasion is partly needed. They need to be persuaded that they have nothing to fear from the legal assurance that is, in my view, necessary. That argument has not yet been won, but there is a broad coalition of developing and developed countries that want the legal framework. That coalition is important and could help us in the months and year ahead.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I, too, was in Copenhagen, and it seemed to me that one issue behind the problems that emerged from the conference was the concern about where the relevant finance should come from and go to. The Government have rightly said that not more than 10 per cent. of our official development assistance budgets would be spent on climate change finance, but may I press my right hon. Friend to go further? Will he make a commitment that that 10 per cent. will not make up the whole of our climate change finance? Perhaps it should not, at any point, make up more than 10 per cent. of our total climate change finance. The people of Bangladesh want to know that we are not simply robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend speaks with great authority on these issues. He is completely right to say that we have made an important commitment to ensuring that the finance that we give will be no more than 10 per cent. of official development assistance, especially after 2013, and that there will also be additional sources of funds. He is also right to imply that we need to find revenue sources to meet our commitments. We know that promises have been made in the past: although the British Government have a good record of keeping promises, it is also necessary to find the revenue sources that can provide the flow of finance, and this is where the high-level panel that I said was being set up by Ban Ki-moon is important. In particular, we need to ensure that the $100 billion goal is not just set out but is actually met. We want the panel to report back by the time of the Mexico meeting, but we hope that it will do so earlier, for example by the middle of this year.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): The Secretary of State was right to say that the meeting was disappointing, and that is fundamentally because we do not have the confident arrangements in the world that would enable business, countries and companies to make decisions to promote mechanisms to reduce emissions. Britain's leadership in the industrial revolution means that we are responsible for a good deal of the climate change that is happening at the moment, so does the right hon. Gentleman accept that this is the moment for us to firm up on the commitments that we have made to green technology and a green future? Europe is also very responsible for today's problems, so should not Britain take the lead in ensuring that Europe firms up on its 30 per cent. pledge? More than that, should we not seek to create, as far as possible, the most encouraging atmosphere for business to do what it has to do? The leadership of business is crucial in this matter.

Lastly, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that winning people's hearts and minds means that we have to be very clear about the advantages of doing what is being proposed, and that we should not talk in puritanical terms about sackcloth and ashes? Only by showing people that this is a remarkable opportunity for this country, Europe and the world will they come and support us.

Edward Miliband: Let me take this opportunity to say that I know that the right hon. Gentleman has announced that he is leaving this House. We will miss his expertise and passion on these issues of climate change, and we wish him well in what he does next.

The right hon. Gentleman asked several specific questions, and I agree that the argument that we need to make is that there is much to gain from the transition to low carbon. We have made that argument already but we can do so more often, because the benefits include the jobs for people in this country and the new industries that will be created. That is true of what we in this country are doing with carbon capture and storage, and it is true in the renewables sector and across the board.

I also agree that Europe must demonstrate its leadership role by pushing others to do more. Part of the task that we face in the accord's pledging process is to ratchet up the commitments that people make. That is something that we will be working on intensively, including in Europe this month.

Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I commend my right hon. Friend for the very critical role that he played in the wee small hours, when the world's media had largely gone to bed, in ensuring that we came away from Copenhagen with something rather than nothing. Does he agree that one of the key areas in which progress can be made over the next 12 months is at national Government level? Should we not aim to align national Government policy and legislation with the GLOBE legislators forum principles set out in Copenhagen in November, before the main conference?

Edward Miliband: I agree with my hon. Friend, and thank him for his remarks about the role that I played in this difficult process. I think that GLOBE has played a very important role over the past 12 months, and that it will do so again in the future. Moreover, he draws attention to the fact that many of the targets that countries will enter into the accord will be domestically binding. Those targets will have gone through national Parliaments, and the new Indian Environment Minister has said that he wants to take legislation on India's so-called six national missions through his House. That is a big step forward, and it is important to emphasise the crucial role of legislators in this process.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Why are we in the northern hemisphere having such a very cold winter this year? Which climate model predicted that?

Edward Miliband: I can hardly believe that question, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The weather fluctuates, as anyone knows, and the notion that a cold spell in Britain disproves the science of climate change is something that I believe not even the right hon. Gentleman believes.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): Was the delegate from Sudan right when comparing the failure at Copenhagen to a holocaust? Will not many millions be killed in this century as a result of higher temperatures and increased natural disasters including flooding and, indeed, in wars? Although the United States, China and, in my opinion, the developing world were at fault in not getting an agreement, why did the EU not put its best position on the table? What is that best position? Why is the money commitment to get the developing world on board so soft and unreliable? What are the Government going to do to strengthen that arrangement?

Edward Miliband: The remarks of the Sudanese delegate were reprehensible, as I said at the time. As I said in an earlier answer, there was not yet consensus in Europe that the commitments made by others were sufficient for Europe to move to 30 per cent. We think that Europe does need to move to 30 per cent. in the context of proper commitments from others. The process of people putting their targets on the table by 31 January is part of the process of Europe moving up.

My hon. Friend is right to refer to the commitments on finance. I would not quite describe them as soft because they are clear commitments from leaders in the accord, but we need to have extra confidence in them by establishing the vital revenue sources. That is why the high-level panel set up by the Secretary-General is so important.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): May I ask the Secretary of State a question as a vice-chairman of the all-party group on China? It was disappointing that China sought to strip out any language that would have led to Copenhagen being a treaty and to strip out any figures at all. How do the Secretary of State and colleagues in the Foreign Office see us now engaging China constructively in such a way that next time we come to this issue China engages in it rather more constructively and ambitiously?

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman speaks with authority on these issues. China has moved some distance in the past two years on climate change. The very notion of a target—it set out a target of 40 to 45 per cent. reductions in carbon intensity—is important. We look forward to seeing what it lodges as part of the agreement on 31 January. We face a continuing effort, and we are determined to continue with it, to persuade China that a legal undertaking should give it confidence about others meeting their commitments, and that it will not face the constraints on growth and development that it fears. That is part of the persuasion that we need.

The new coalition that was evident at Copenhagen between the developing countries that are particularly vulnerable to climate change—I mentioned Ethiopia and the Maldives, but there were others including other small island states and African countries—is important. That coalition wants a legal agreement. We need to find ways in which that voice can be heard and to persuade others who are more reluctant that it is the right way to go.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that we are trying to establish what will probably be the largest carbon capture and storage project in Hatfield colliery in Doncaster in his constituency by 2015. How important is the achievement of that goal to the future economy of Yorkshire and to meeting our obligations under the climate change agenda?

Edward Miliband: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. It is very important that we make progress on carbon capture and storage, including in Yorkshire, where there are exciting plans to move forward on that process. It is also worth saying that internationally many countries are moving towards carbon capture and storage. Again, that is a change we have seen over the past couple of years; countries understand the importance CCS will play and the importance of making coal a clean fuel of the future.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I am very pleased that the Secretary-General of the UN recognised that there are procedural problems and I sympathise—even empathise—with the right hon. Gentleman in his task of a few weeks ago. Clearly a standing council would be one idea worthy of note, but in the meantime is the Secretary of State aware of the fact that some officials from developed countries are talking about pressing ahead with a smaller group of 20—a coalition of the willing for the climate? If that is so, should the UK not be taking part as well?

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting question. My immediate response is no, in the following sense: we should stick with the UN framework, because the truth is that although it has its frustrations—not least the need to operate by consensus, and indeed, in some sense, unanimity—unless we get all countries bound in, we will have less chance of tackling the problem in the way we need to do. Our instinct, which I think is right, is to stick with the UN process and find ways of improving it, but not to go off in smaller groups, as that will not give people the assurance they need and it will not give us the environmental integrity we need.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Like my right hon. Friend, I believe that the challenge that faces mankind is climate change, and I commend him for his work in Copenhagen. There is an enormous distance in moving from an accord to a legally binding agreement. How does my right hon. Friend see the development of steps towards that legally binding agreement? Although the UN is involved in a very positive way, there is still a need to keep that momentum. What steps does he see being taken to keep up the momentum towards a legally binding agreement?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend asks the most difficult question of all about how we proceed. It is important to restart the negotiations, because as I said earlier, if we leave it until June we shall find the same problem of being timed out as we found at the end of the conference. Two tracks are still operating under the UN framework—the Kyoto track negotiated among the Kyoto parties and the other track on long-term co-operative action. Those two tracks could still form the basis of a legal treaty, incorporating many points from the accord. The task for us is to restart the negotiations and find a way—it really comes down to persuasion—of reassuring the relatively small number of countries worried about a legal treaty that they can actually gain from one and that they have nothing to fear from it.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): No one set out for Copenhagen looking for an accord between 40-odd countries, so it is more than disappointment—Copenhagen is a failure, and the Secretary of State should not understate that. Does he agree that the opprobrium visited on China in the negotiations may be unfair and that the United States remains, if anything, the primary barrier to a global deal? What steps does he think can be taken to engage the United States more effectively if we are to see a global agreement?

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman and I have talked about Copenhagen in the past. In a way I think he undersells the efforts, not necessarily of the Government but of himself and legislators all round the world. To say that an agreement that for the first time captures targets not just from developed countries but from developing countries is no step forward and represents no gain is wrong and undersells the efforts of legislators and people who have campaigned for a positive outcome.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about the United States, all countries face difficulties in getting to the kind of ambition we need. There are two separate questions. One is about the level of ambition in any agreement—we want the maximum ambition, including from the US. The second is about the form of the agreement. My understanding of the United States position is that it is content to see movement to a legal treaty. There are others we need to persuade that a legal treaty is in their interests.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that without Copenhagen there is a danger of a lack of focus for campaigners and others, to target their attention and pressurise their Governments to come to a legal agreement? What specific measures does he propose to put forward to the high-level panel? Although fantastic figures of $100 billion are mentioned, those of us who campaign on international development issues know, following Gleneagles, that very little of the money flows to where it is required. What lessons learned from past agreements can we deploy to ensure that $100 billion flows by 2020?

Edward Miliband: Those are two important questions. I am glad that my hon. Friend asked the first one; I should have mentioned it. It is very important that the campaign carries on—that is the lesson of Make Poverty History. We made the progress that we did, not just because Governments wanted it to happen but because people made it happen. That is why it is so important that we send an honest message about what happened at Copenhagen, but not a defeatist message that it was all in vain. I do not believe that it was all in vain.

On my hon. Friend's second question, there is a range of options for the high-level panel to look at. People have put forward proposals on bunker fuels and on funding for some of the multilateral development banks. There is a range of options for the panel to consider, many of which were raised in the months leading up to Copenhagen.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Despite the Secretary of State's best efforts, the failure of Copenhagen surely increases the risk that an international legally binding agreement to prevent climate change may never happen. Given that risk, at what point do the Government reprioritise efforts to adapt to climate change, rather than trying to prevent it?

Edward Miliband: It would be defeatist to say, "Let's give up on this." I am not saying that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we give up now, but the lesson of the past year is not that the problem is insoluble. The world has come a long distance. In a way, part of the optics of Copenhagen and some of the things that we failed to get mean that it was a disappointment, but to interpret the past year as suggesting that we are not going to tackle the problem is defeatist. The past 12 months have proved that progress can be made and that further progress can be made in the years ahead.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): Although I recognise that it may have been overly ambitious ever to expect a legally binding agreement from Copenhagen, the fact remains that manufacturing industry needs certainty, as my right hon. Friend said in his statement, and international uniformity if we are not to lose manufacturing to non-compliant areas. Will he undertake to have a close dialogue with manufacturing industry in the UK in order to do our best to ensure that our manufacturers do not lose out as a result of the failure to get a legally binding agreement in Copenhagen?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend is right. There is the protection that we need to give to higher carbon manufacturers, which is partly to do with the provisions under the new emissions trading scheme for free allowances, for example. With reference to the comments of the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and others in the House, there is also the assurance that we need to give to the low carbon manufacturers of the future that a clear signal has been sent by the world on low carbon, and we want to strengthen that signal. Both of those are important, and I absolutely undertake to do what my hon. Friend asks.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): I congratulate the Government on their efforts so far and, in particular, on their commitment to carbon capture and storage for power stations. However, will they redouble their efforts? The time scale for introducing large-scale carbon capture and storage demonstration plants is not ambitious enough, and we need to do more on that.

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman is right that we need to be as ambitious as we can be. That is why we are bringing forward a carbon capture and storage levy as part of our Energy Bill. We hope that all parts of the House will support it and pass it as soon as possible so that we can start to fund carbon capture and storage projects.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): As part of a cross-party delegation I recently visited some of those islands in the Pacific and saw at first hand the difficulties faced by many of the poorest and most vulnerable communities in the world. Following the Copenhagen discussions, can my right hon. Friend offer any hope or support to those poor communities to stop them sinking even further into the sea?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend speaks very eloquently about his experiences, and I knew that he had taken that trip. He is absolutely right to say that one of the most important voices at the Copenhagen summit and, indeed, in the months before was that of the small island states. They are the most vulnerable, and all of us will remember the Maldives cabinet meeting that took place underwater to signal the dangers that they face. The finance part of the accord is important, providing immediate resources—I hope—for adaptation and mitigation, and the longer-term finance is important, too. However, the world must also take action on emissions, because in the end that as well as adaptation is what will save those small islands. That is why we need to redouble our efforts on cutting emissions.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): The Secretary of State has credited the House with a forensic analysis of the difficulties that led to the disappointment at Copenhagen, but is there perhaps someone to blame? Was it a lack of political will on the part of politicians; was it China; was it the strength of the American Congress; or was it, as he suggests, just a problem of process?

Edward Miliband: No, I do not think that I should give the impression that it was a problem of process. At a meeting early on in the negotiations, I said that every country faced compelling constraints that inhibited action on climate change. If there is a reason why we did not reach the agreement that we wanted, it is that every country faced those compelling constraints and we could not overcome them sufficiently. It was not an accident and there was no question, simply, of a badly organised meeting. There are difficult issues, but I come back to this point: the past year has shown that such compelling constraints can be overcome, and we need to spend the months and years ahead overcoming the other constraints that countries faced at Copenhagen.

Queen's Diamond Jubilee

5.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills (Ian Lucas): With permission, I shall repeat a brief but important statement that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills made about the Government's plans to mark Her Majesty the Queen's diamond jubilee in 2012. It will be a landmark year for Her Majesty, Britain and the Commonwealth. Queen Victoria is the only British monarch previously to have celebrated a diamond jubilee. However modestly our present Queen might approach the celebration, I know that people throughout the country will want the chance to recognise this remarkable achievement by paying tribute to Her Majesty and by celebrating with great pride and affection Her Majesty's 60 years on the throne.

It will also be an opportunity for us as a country to reflect on the incredible changes that have taken place both here and throughout the world over the past six decades. We want there to be a nationwide celebration, and working with colleagues in Buckingham palace and the devolved Administrations we are planning a series of fitting events to enable communities all over the country to mark the diamond jubilee.

Alth[illegible]e are still in the early stages of organisation, I can[illegible]n to the House that the celebrations will take place around the first week of June 2012. In honour of Her Majesty, we will create a special diamond jubilee weekend, moving the late May bank holiday to Monday 4 June and adding an extra bank holiday on Tuesday 5 June. In Scotland, national holidays are a devolved matter. We will work closely with the Scottish Government to help to ensure that people across the United Kingdom can celebrate the jubilee together.

In keeping with previous jubilees, we plan to issue a diamond jubilee medal. Over the next few months, we will be considering that in more detail, including who should be eligible to receive it. In addition, we will be holding national competitions, to be launched later this year, for city status, a lord mayoralty and a lord provostship. Further details of those and other Government plans for the diamond jubilee are available from the Printed Paper Office—and the Vote Office—and online via the Department for Culture, Media and Sport website.

Finally, I can confirm that Her Majesty has agreed, as a mark of royal favour, to confer royal borough status on the London borough of Greenwich. This rare honour is to be bestowed in recognition of the historically close links forged between Greenwich and our royal family from the middle ages to the present day, and of the borough's global significance as the home of the prime meridian, Greenwich mean time and a UNESCO world heritage site.

Further announcements will follow as our plans for the diamond jubilee are confirmed, but I know that voluntary and local organisations will benefit from early notice of these dates.

This will be a truly historic occasion—a testament to the hard work and dedication of Her Majesty the Queen to this country and to her people. We are committed to ensuring that celebrations take place of which we can all be proud.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for advance sight of his statement, which was delivered earlier by the Business Secretary in another place.

This afternoon the House has heard two serious and sobering statements on terrorism and climate change, so we warmly welcome the good news in today's announcement that Her Majesty's diamond jubilee will be recognised by an extra bank holiday. Conservative Members give our full support to this proposal, as indeed we did to my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell), who put forward the idea in a ten-minute Bill that had all-party support and was given its First Reading last November.

I join the Minister in paying tribute to the very remarkable achievements of Her Majesty during her extraordinary reign: extraordinary not just because of its length—she will be the second longest reigning monarch in British history—but because of the integrity and commitment she has brought to that role and the popular esteem in which she is held across the UK and beyond. No country could wish for a better Head of State.

The House will remember the mood that was expressed powerfully during the celebrations for the golden jubilee in 2002. Despite being told that it was to be a low-key affair, more than 1 million people flooded to the Mall to celebrate—a clear indication of the strength of the relationship between the monarch and her people. I also remember, as will many colleagues, the celebrations in 1977 for the silver jubilee and the way in which the nation united and rejoiced at that time.

The Minister made passing reference to the Commonwealth. Can he inform the House about exactly what arrangements have been made to ensure that the Commonwealth nations are properly represented during the celebrations? This is particularly relevant given the special importance that Her Majesty has placed on the Commonwealth and the great success that she has had in helping to build strong relations with Commonwealth Heads of State during her reign.

May we ask for more detail on some of the Government's other plans? In particular, can the Minister confirm that his Department is considering a new youth volunteer scheme, as has been suggested in some press reports? Can he confirm that any organised celebrations will include an important role for young people?

Will the Minister clarify whether arrangements have been made for acknowledging the Olympics during this event? The Government initially indicated that they wanted to link those two events in a single celebration. Can he now confirm, as we hope, that that idea has been permanently shelved?

May I add my congratulations to the London borough of Greenwich on its new auspicious status? It holds a special place in our nation's history, and it is right for it to be honoured in this way. We also welcome the creation of a new medal of service.

Finally, can we ensure that the House of Commons is part of the celebrations? I am sure that all Members across the House will wish to mark this important occasion, and I think that all colleagues would agree that it is right that the House should show its respect for Her Majesty and, indeed, for Prince Philip, and the tireless public service that they have offered this country for 60 years.

Ian Lucas: I am very grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's characteristically kind and good-humoured response, and of course for the full support that he has offered for the announcement today. I am sure that we will carry forward that support in preparing for the celebrations ahead.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Commonwealth, as I did in my statement. Of course, Her Majesty has been very successful in developing the strong bonds between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth throughout her reign. It is important that we take into account the full views of the Commonwealth, and as we prepare we will have the opportunity to involve the Commonwealth in the year as a whole and in the celebrations on the bank holiday.

Another important group that should definitely be involved is young people, as the right hon. Gentleman said. I cannot confirm the press reports relating to the new youth volunteer scheme. We are in the process of discussions at the present time, and of course we will keep the House fully informed.

It is very important that the diamond jubilee celebration is seen as a distinct, almost unique celebration in British history and the history of the Commonwealth, because there has been only one diamond jubilee celebration before. I therefore agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it should be seen as distinct from the Olympics, which of course happen to be in the same year but are not linked to it. The diamond jubilee is to celebrate the commitment and work that Her Majesty has given the nation over 60 years.

It is of course important that the House of Commons be involved, and I am sure that all Members will ensure that that happens when the time comes.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for his statement and wholeheartedly endorse his remarks and those of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) about the appropriateness of celebrations to commemorate Her Majesty's remarkable 60 years' service to this country, of which we are all deeply proud.

I particularly welcome my hon. Friend's announcement about the significant honour bestowed on the borough of Greenwich, which will be very warmly welcomed throughout my constituency. In his statement, he acknowledged the significant achievements in the area. In view of his business promotion responsibilities, does he agree that 2012, which will be not just the jubilee but the year of the Olympics, in which Greenwich will host many of the most significant events, provides a golden opportunity to promote the area's already successful but further developing industries in the field of leisure, cultural activities, tourism and hospitality?

Ian Lucas: I had a feeling that my right hon. Friend would be here today. He is in the fortunate position of representing the royal borough of Greenwich, as we have said it will be in future. It is an extraordinary constituency and an extraordinary place, and it has strong historic links with the royal family, which is one reason for the announcement today. The year 2012 will be very special, and I urge anyone from across the UK who has not visited Greenwich so to do. It is one of my favourite parts of the UK, and the announcement is richly deserved.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): I thank the Minister for previous sight of the statement.

In 2012, our Queen will have served her people for a whole 60 years, which is a long working life in anybody's book and deserves to be commemorated. That will be done in a lot of imaginative ways, and we look forward to hearing more suggestions for celebrations. We hope that they will be truly inclusive, and I am sure that they will.

It is welcome that all the Queen's subjects can join in the celebrations on her official birthday, but a bank holiday attracts a cost to industry. The CBI estimates that every bank holiday costs £6 billion, and the Federation of Small Businesses applauds the sentiment but notes the cost, especially to small businesses. However, we welcome this day of celebration for the only monarch who has reigned for so long, with the exception of Queen Victoria, and for someone who has served her subjects so well. We welcome the bank holiday and the celebration, because you're worth it, Ma'am.

Ian Lucas: I am very pleased that the hon. Lady welcomes the celebration.

Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): I commend the Minister and the Government for the splendid announcement—it will be welcomed by people the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. We look forward to a magnificent celebration of the Queen's diamond jubilee in 2012.

Will the Minister please bear in mind the importance of involving Her Majesty's subjects in the other 15 realms, particularly Australia, New Zealand and Canada and, of course, in the 21 Crown dependencies and overseas territories? They are all Her Majesty's subjects and it is important that they, too, are included in the celebrations. I remember the silver jubilee of 1977, when the Royal Canadian mounted police were here for the parade in London. Will he consider issuing invitations throughout the Commonwealth to make it a truly magnificent celebration for Her Majesty?

Ian Lucas: I will of course consider all the hon. Gentleman's suggestions. I was present to listen to his introducing his ten-minute Bill, and we have responded to that as part of the consultation and discussions that have already taken place. As I have said, it is important that the Commonwealth, the Crown dependencies and all subjects are involved in the celebrations. We want to try to ensure that.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): In 2002, a golden jubilee medal was struck for the armed forces and other uniformed services. The qualification period for it was five years before 2002. If similar criteria were used for the diamond jubilee medal, those serving between 2002 and 2007 would be disfranchised. Paradoxically, that is a period in which our armed forces have been engaged in two major theatres of war. In setting his criteria—a difficult task—will the Minister bear those people in mind to ensure that their contribution and service to Her Majesty the Queen are properly recognised?

Ian Lucas: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. The criteria for the diamond jubilee medal have not yet been established. We are still in the process of taking into account issues such as those that he raises. We will of course consider them closely.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I was in the Mall with my son for the golden jubilee celebrations, which were terrific. For the diamond jubilee, will the Minister consider an even more enhanced role for our armed services? There is a particular bond between the Queen and the armed services, and we are now dependent on them and in their debt more than at any other point during her reign. If all the regiments could be recognised—and perhaps an invitation issued to all those who marched in her coronation parade or their successor organisations—it would be great. A particular focus on the armed forces for the diamond jubilee would be very welcome.

Ian Lucas: We are, of course, all very much aware of our debt to the armed services, particularly at this time. The hon. Gentleman's positive suggestions will be taken into account.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The announcement will be welcomed by the Scout and Guide movements in particular, as well as by calendar manufacturers—such as Rose printers of Colchester—which have to work two years in advance, so I appreciate notice of the bank holiday.

Will the Minister elaborate on his reference to national competitions for city status? I recall that, for the golden jubilee, England was disproportionately discriminated against. I therefore urge the Government to ensure that towns in England are treated more favourably than they were for the golden jubilee.

Ian Lucas: There will be a further announcement on the city status competition, which will set out the criteria in detail. I am aware of the strength of feeling in English towns. There is also strong feeling in my town of Wrexham—we believe that our town should have city status, too. Like the hon. Gentleman, I may be able to issue a press release after the statement.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The present Banbury cross was built following public subscription to celebrate the wedding of Princess Victoria, Queen Victoria's eldest daughter. I am sure that the people of a borough such as Banbury will want to mark the Queen's diamond jubilee by some similar but modern, 21st-century memorial and tribute. Will the Minister discuss with his colleague the Lord President of the Council whether he could approach the appropriate officials at the palace to ensure that we have a suitable fundraising logo that could be used locally by the authorities in the respective counties and by the respective lord lieutenants? In that way, there will be some focus in each county that the lord lieutenant could oversee, and it would ensure that fundraising can be organised in a structured way for local tributes for the Queen's diamond jubilee.

Ian Lucas: It would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman wrote to me with the details of his suggestion, and I will undertake to try to take it forward on his behalf.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Up and down the country, there are jubilee halls, bridges, parks, gardens and other local memorials. What steps will the Department for Culture, Media and Sport take to encourage such local celebration of the diamond jubilee in 2012?

Ian Lucas: It is for the DCMS to set out the steps that it will take, but I will be happy to liaise with it on any proposals that need to be taken forward regarding the issues the hon. Gentleman raises.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): As a citizen who has always preferred the idea of a monarchy to a republic, I welcome the opportunity to celebrate this wonderful forthcoming jubilee. Will the Government consider a fund from the public purse to ensure that local authorities and local communities can truly celebrate the monarchy that we love, and to which all of us are loyal—I hope—on that very important day?

Ian Lucas: With the Chancellor of the Exchequer sitting to my left, I am very reluctant to make any financial commitments at this juncture, but I am sure that there will be engagement right across the United Kingdom on the jubilee, that people will be determined to carry forward celebrations, and that they will be committed to fundraising in order so to do.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): Queen Victoria's glorious diamond jubilee was also held in June. It is an historic part of her reign that is very much remembered. The Minister talked about the importance of this jubilee being an historic occasion, but how can the Government assist in ensuring that it is?

Ian Lucas: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct—this has happened only once before in British history, so it is a genuinely historic and virtually unique occasion. We need to think carefully about it, and to hear from hon. Members and the general public, because we want to make the jubilee something that is remembered for generations to come.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): Does the Minister agree that the Queen should try to visit each of the Olympic sites? May I invite her to Hadleigh which, with Hadleigh castle, has very strong historical royal connections? She would receive an extremely warm welcome there.

Ian Lucas: I am sure that Her Majesty has heard that kind invitation and that the palace will consider it carefully.

Point of Order

5.53 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We had a statement today on climate change. It was circulated in the House of Commons in very large type, suitable for reading by the Government spokesman, and the backs of the pieces of paper were uncovered. If we are going to do something about climate change, could we start in this House of Commons, and ensure that statements are first of all written in print that is not so big, so that we use less paper, and secondly that they are printed on both sides of the paper? After all, equipment for doing that has been available for a very long time and we might do our little bit towards climate change.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman is well aware that those are not matters over which I have a great deal of jurisdiction, but I am sure that the whole House has noted his points, and perhaps they will be taken into consideration when statements are produced in future.

Fiscal Responsibility Bill

Second Reading

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): May I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition?

5.54 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

We are debating the pre-Budget report more fully on Thursday, so this evening I will confine my remarks to the Bill. Every country in the world has been hit by a severe financial crisis, resulting in the worst global economic recession for decades. Inevitably, borrowing and debt levels have risen as revenues have fallen. We are affected by that; so is every other major economy in the world. Like other countries, we are now taking steps as we emerge from the recession to secure growth while reducing the deficit, but as I have said on a number of occasions, we have got to do that in a way that does not risk wrecking the recovery and damaging the economy, and our ability to secure growth over the medium and long term.

The deficit reduction plan to halve the deficit over a four-year period is a very important part of that strategy. The Bill will set out obligations to cut the deficit at an appropriate and sensible pace, and it will allow us to protect the economy and maintain public services, upon which growth and members of the public depend. That is an important part of what we are trying to do.

Whatever the economic circumstances under whatever Government, we need rules and objectives to govern fiscal policy. Between 1979 and 1997 during the previous Conservative Government, there were many different targets. Between 1980 and 1997, monetary policy targets changed 14 times and there were at least five different fiscal policy objectives. In fact, I believe that there was no clear and consistent objective of fiscal policy. The result was the lack of a clear objective and overall coherence, which meant, among other things, that we had interest rates peaking at 15 per cent. in 1990, instead of half of that, recorded over the 12 years since 1997.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): In 2015 and 2016 under the Bill, if national income rises, the Government can put borrowing up and still meet the requirements. However, if national income fell, they would have to cut. Is not that the very opposite of the natural stabilisers the Chancellor normally recommends?

Mr. Darling: No. It is important that the right hon. Gentleman recognises that the Bill requires the Government, in line with the proposals I set out in the Budget and the pre-Budget report, to halve our borrowing over a four-year period, which I believe is absolutely essential. The measures I have set out will enable us to do that, but it is important that we do it in a way that supports and does not damage the economy. Indeed, this is one of the differences between the Government and the Opposition. One reason why we should not go further at the moment is that going further and faster, and bringing forward that deficit reduction, would be damaging to the economy. We are supporting the economy now because we are not yet out of recession. We need to ensure that we have the support of public expenditure, which is keeping the economy going, and supporting the public, businesses and families.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way, but I shall first finish dealing with the point made by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). It is important that we have that discipline. As I was saying, every Government must have a discipline in relation to their fiscal policy and the discipline I set out is important.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): Will the Chancellor confirm what he just said—that we are not yet out of recession at the beginning of January 2010?

Mr. Darling: I have said so—we have not yet had the figures for the fourth quarter of last year. I have said before on many occasions that I believe we will come out of recession at the turn of the year, but we will not have those figures until later this month. Had I said otherwise, the hon. Gentleman would be the first to jump up and say that we do not have the figures, which we do not.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): As the Chancellor knows, I have raised the question of the true state of the debt on many occasions. I have never had a straight answer, so I would be grateful if I could have one now. When one aggregates the amount, including public pensions, private finance initiatives, Network Rail and bank bail-outs, one reaches the figure of £2.220 billion, which is 158.8 per cent. of gross domestic product. Is that the case? The figures are from the Office for National Statistics. Will the Chancellor also tell my why, in relation to Royal Bank of Scotland and Lloyds, the £62 billion that he announced before the rise of the House for Christmas, was not disclosed to either the Public Accounts Committee or the ONS? Is it the case that Sir Martin Scholar is taking that matter up with him right now?

Mr. Darling: I think that the hon. Gentleman means Sir Michael Scholar, who is the chairman of the ONS. I have explained that point before to the House. This was money that was made available by the Bank of England as emergency support to ensure that RBS and the then HBOS could get through the crisis that we faced in October 2008. I have been asked about that and explained the position before. As I have told the Chairmen of the two relevant Select Committees, I am reflecting on how we deal with such matters in the future.

With regard to the other question, the hon. Gentleman is adding together all sorts of things, including future pension liabilities. The correct thing to do is to look at our position in relation to our debt and compare that with other countries. Even though our debt is going up, by 2014 it will still be below the G7 average.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): While the Chancellor's intention to reduce the public debt significantly through specific targets is unquestionably laudable, my concern is that if he—or someone else, if a different party has taken the reins of Government—misses the target, what is to prevent him from introducing an amendment to the Bill to alter the target? This is a policy statement rather than a binding objective, because it could be changed by statute in the future.

Mr. Darling: I shall come on to that point, but as I was saying before I gave way, all Governments have rules and objectives. Up until 1997, those were simply statements made by the Chancellor in a Budget or at some other fiscal event. Since 1998, we have had the code for fiscal stability and two rules that have guided fiscal policy for the past 10 years. The hon. Gentleman is right: it is open to any Government and Chancellor to say that circumstances have changed and so we need to change policy. I have been a Minister for the past 12 years and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the discipline created by rules, so the Chancellor can tell Departments that they cannot have any more funds because it would breach a particular rule, is important. I daresay that that was also important for previous Governments. Today we are legislating to put on the statute book a requirement to reduce the deficit by half. Of course, it will not be a question of going to jail if we do not do it, but having to come back to the House to seek further legislation will be a discipline for future Governments. It is not uncommon for Governments in other parts of the world to have similar strictures on them.

The two rules that the Government operated between 1997 and 2007, before the current financial crisis hit us and hit other countries, were to balance the budget, excluding public investment, over the economic cycle and to keep Government debt at a prudent level. Those two rules were appropriate to the challenges of the time. We wanted to increase public investment, and at the time there was a consensus in this House—certainly in the latter part of the 1990s and the early part of the last decade—that our public services did need more money spent on them, including the health service and schools. Those rules were designed to enable us to do that. Over that 10-year economic cycle, which ended in 2007, we were able to balance the budget and borrow to invest, which is something that previous Governments of both political colours had not been able to do previously. We were able to increase significantly investment in public services, tripling it from 0.6 per cent. of GDP in 1996-97 to 2 per cent. in 2006-07, its highest level since 1979. We also saw a continuous expansion in the economy, while reducing Government debt as a share of GDP, from 42.5 per cent. in 1996-97 to 36 per cent. in 2006-07.

Those rules stood our economy and the country in good stead during that period, but events towards the end of 2007 and in 2008 fundamentally changed the economic situation for the entire global economy, because we experienced the worst economic conditions seen in more than 60 years. We were operating in a completely different environment, and policy, here and in other countries, needed to adapt to reflect that. No one could have foreseen the sheer scale and spread of the global financial recession that hit economies all over the world in 2007 and at the beginning of 2008. The result is that borrowing and debt have risen in most countries, ours included.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): In his opening remarks, the Chancellor made much of the need not to reduce the deficit too fast. However, his written statement to the House on 2 December reported on ECOFIN—I presume that either he or the Chief Secretary attended and agreed with the recommendations—which called on the UK to reduce its budget deficit below 3 per cent. of GDP, or half the level in this Bill, by the 2014-15 financial year. He suggests that the approach in the Bill is prudent, but in another context he suggests that we go twice as fast. Can he account for that disparity?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman refers to the Finance Ministers' meeting in Brussels at the beginning of December, which I most certainly attended, and the rules that pertain to countries in general. The Commission can make recommendations, but as we are not in the euro, we are not obliged to follow them. We have no plans to change our current policy on that issue. The measures that I have announced in the pre-Budget report and before are sensible and, at this stage and when there is still so much uncertainty as countries emerge from the global recession, it is sensible to reduce the deficit in a way that does not damage our economy.

The recession has had a substantial impact on the public finances, here and in every country. With economies weakening, tax revenues have fallen. In this country, we have seen falls in corporation tax, especially from the financial services industry, but also in income tax. Higher unemployment inevitably and rightly means that more has to be spent supporting people and families. There has also been a cost to continuing to maintain and support the economy and stabilising the banking system. However, both sides of the House agree that stabilising the banking system was necessary. It was not an optional extra, because it would have been calamitous not to have done so. But there is a difference in our policies on support for the economy. Had we not maintained spending to support the economy, the pain and cost of the recession would have been far greater. I do not accept the argument of those who claim that we should have started to cut back on expenditure two years ago. That would have been extremely damaging to the economy and would have made it even more difficult for people.

As we emerge from this global downturn, we need to cut our borrowing, as other countries are doing. To try to meet the fiscal rules put in place for the previous economic cycle would be perverse. Not to allow borrowing and the deficit to rise to help people and businesses would have meant greater pain and more job losses, as we saw in the recessions of the 1980s and 1990s, and would have meant increased costs in both human and economic terms.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): Before the Chancellor moves too far from the banking system, would he agree that in order to build public confidence it might be worth considering linking Ministers' pay to performance? If the Government failed to meet the target, Ministers' pay could be cut.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): Or increased.

Mr. Darling: I think that the latter proposition is probably a remote possibility in the current climate, but the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) makes an interesting proposition.

The vital point—one to which I shall return later—is that it is important that Ministers and Governments are accountable to the House, which they are of course. Each and every one of us who are privileged enough to be Ministers of the Crown are answerable to the House.

[Mr. Darling]

and if we do not come up to the mark, one way or another it is open to the House to do something about it. That remains the case, and it is perhaps a more draconian system than simply modifying that week's pay packet.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has emphasised the importance of trying at least to moderate, if not reduce, borrowing. However, would not the most sensible course of action be to maximise the tax take by minimising tax avoidance and evasion and ensuring that the tax gap is closed?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. I, too, want to reduce borrowing. We have to do more than moderate it—it has to come down. He is right also that part of what we must first do is close the tax gap and ensure that HMRC does everything possible to ensure that it collects every penny due to it. That is not always possible—people go bankrupt and so on—but we must do that. It is also necessary for us to be vigilant about closing tax loopholes when they emerge. One of the successes of the G20 meeting last year was at long last to get international agreement to begin to open the doors on some of the tax havens, such as Lichtenstein for example, so that we can get access to the records of people who live and do business in this country but avoid paying tax here. That is grossly unfair and inefficient. I agree with him on that.

We have a duty to support the economy during the downturn, and that has resulted in higher borrowing, and indeed such measures are still supporting the economy. Not to have put in place the discretionary measures that we have introduced since the end of 2007 would have had disastrous consequences for the economy—I accept that is a minority view, although held by those on one side of the House—because failure to support the economy would have meant higher, not lower, debt and higher, not lower, long-term borrowing.

I have always made it clear that support for the economy during the downturn goes hand in hand with steps to rebuild our fiscal strength once recovery is established. That is necessary to get the growth that we need. However, it is also imperative that we get our borrowing down in a way that supports growth, because growth itself will help us to reduce our borrowing and debt. The alternative is to consign ourselves to a decade of austerity, low growth and low employment, which I do not think would be the right thing for this country.

As I said, in the past, there have been many and varied fiscal objectives under successive Governments. Since 1997, however, our fiscal objectives have remained in the medium term, to ensure sound public finances so that spending and taxation impacts fairly between generations, and in the short term, to support monetary policy and to help to smooth the path of the economy. Despite the disruptions of the past couple of years, those objectives remain important, and to get back on that course we need to get borrowing down on a reasonable time scale.

The Bill requires the Government to set out a fiscal plan for delivering sound public finances, which must be approved by Parliament, and places a duty on the Government to meet that plan. As I said earlier, it gives Parliament a clear role in setting and monitoring the Government's medium-term fiscal plans. Parliament must approve those plans before they become law, so this Bill gives the House a new opportunity to scrutinise the Government's plans. Over the past few months, there has been an understandable desire to reassert the authority, in particular, of the House, and I believe that the Bill is one way in which we can do that. It represents a substantial strengthening of the fiscal policy framework in response to the challenges we face while enabling the House to exercise greater scrutiny, not just through Select Committees, but through the House sitting in this Chamber.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Does the Chancellor believe that, had the Bill been in force earlier in his term of office, or during the Prime Minister's term of office as Chancellor, the public finances would be in a less ruinous state and that we would not be the only economy in Europe still in recession?

Mr. Darling: No, I do not accept that. As I said earlier—the hon. Gentleman might not have been here—prior to 2007, when this crisis began, our debt levels came down to the second lowest in the G7. We have been reducing debt while spending more on infrastructure. The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) mentioned the railways. I know, having been Transport Secretary for four years, what happens when a Government inherit a transport system starved of investment, as it had been in the 1990s—literally, things come off the rails. That is why I make no apology for the fact that the Government spend more on the railways and infrastructure. Our transport system needed the investment.

We have spent more on schools and hospitals too. We owe a great deal to the Victorians, but I do not think that they expected us to be relying on their hospitals at the back end of the 20th century. We spent that money while reducing borrowing. Now let us consider what happened to us in 2007-08—this has a bearing on the point made by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) about the recession. We have a very large financial services sector—I think that we are, in most people's view, the main financial services sector in the world—so the recession has had a far greater effect on us than on others.

I would like to ensure that we have a major financial centre here in the future. That is why we have to toughen up regulation and work with the industry to ensure that we achieve that. However, the idea that when we entered the downturn, we had not been running the economy efficiently and effectively is nonsense. Yes, we were spending more money on public services, but not a day or week went by when people on the Conservative Benches did not ask for even more money—not less—for schools and hospitals. On some days, they even outdid the Liberal Democrats in calling for more expenditure on services, so for them to say now that they did not want that spending is nonsense.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Chancellor appears to be rewriting history as he goes along. He is trying to give the impression to the House that the Government were repaying debt until the economic crisis hit, but that is clearly not true. The Government were borrowing money each year in many years before the crisis hit. Is it not a fact that, unlike the impression that he is trying to give, my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) is right that the Chancellor was not fixing roof when the sun was shining?

Mr. Darling: When the hon. Gentleman has a chance to think about these things, he might realise that Governments borrow money. There was a time, early in the last decade, when Government borrowing was going down, but then we started to hear concerns from the pensions industry that the Government were not borrowing enough—the pensions industry actually requires borrowing.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): So it's their fault now?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely flippant remark.

From time to time, Governments need to borrow money to ensure, for example, that we have infrastructure, schools and hospitals. At times like these, were a Government to shut down spending and so put even more people out of work, or were they to get into the absurd situation, like the Government in the early 1930s, of trying to cut benefits and spending, they would make a difficult situation even worse. So I do not accept the point made by the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies).

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Darling: No. I want to make some progress. Perhaps I will give way later.

Clause 1 of the Bill imposes three duties on the Treasury: first, to ensure that Government borrowing as a share of GDP falls in every year to 2015-16; secondly, to ensure that Government borrowing is at least halved as a share of GDP over a four-year period to 2013-14; and thirdly to ensure that Government debt as a share of GDP is falling by 2015-16. The latest forecasts for the public finances, which I set out at the pre-Budget report last month, are consistent with these duties: in the next financial year, 2010-11, Government borrowing will start to fall and continue to do so each and every year after that; borrowing will reach 5.5 per cent of GDP by 2013-14, so that we will more than halve the 12.6 per cent. of GDP reached this year; and with further consolidation thereafter, debt as a share of GDP is projected to fall in 2015-16. I have announced measures that will allow us to more than halve the deficit as a share of GDP over four years—from 12.6 to 5.5 per cent. That is the sharpest reduction in the budget deficit for any G7 country.

In relation to the points raised by some hon. Members earlier, there are no powers to amend those duties. They can be changed only through new primary legislation. In other words, the Government would have to return to the House were they not meeting the obligations.

Mr. Pelling: Can the Chancellor give a judgment on just how deflationary those changes in public spending could be? Is there not a danger from the straitjacket that is being introduced through this legislation?

Mr. Darling: I believe that the changes are manageable, and they are the right thing to do. The hon. Gentleman might want to make his point to those on the Conservative Front Bench, who as I understand it want to go further and faster. There is a risk of damaging the economy if that happens. Inevitably, these are matters of judgment, but I am very happy to justify why we have had to borrow so much at the present time. However, if we are going to get sustainable growth in future, it is important that we get that borrowing down. To halve it over a four-year period is a reasonable thing to do and a reasonable rate at which to do it. To go further than that—and to make that judgment at the present time, when there is so much uncertainty—would be hugely damaging to the economy and would present a terrible risk, especially when the Opposition are contemplating spending even more money on top of that.

Dr. Pugh: Following on from a previous question about what would happen if the legislation had been in place earlier, if it had been in place, would the Chancellor have been free, as he was free, to bail out the banks as promptly as he did? Is he not hampering the range of movement of a subsequent Chancellor?

Mr. Darling: No, because the Chancellor would quite obviously have to come back to the House if circumstances were as severe as those that pertained a couple of years ago. I do not think that anybody would argue for getting ourselves into a position through legislation where the Government were completely hamstrung and could not effectively govern the country. That would be nonsense. However, it is important that there should be a discipline and a clear sense of direction on reducing the deficit.

Clause 2 sets out a duty that the Government must continue to have a fiscal plan after 2016. That will be done by order, so the Government can decide what is appropriate. Again, the matter has to come back to the House. There is also a provision in clause 2 to give the Treasury the power to add further duties to the Government's fiscal plan. We have illustrated how we do that. For example, a draft order was published on the day of the pre-Budget report requiring the Government to ensure that borrowing as a share of GDP came down to 5.5 per cent., which is more than halving the deficit. As we look to the future, if we can get growth that is more robust than in my forecast, borrowing will naturally fall faster. It would then be possible to reduce that borrowing further in the medium term. However, at this stage, I believe that the course that I have set out is the right one.

Clause 3 sets out various reporting requirements, so that the House has an opportunity to see what progress is being made. The Treasury must report on whether it has succeeded in fulfilling the duty that is imposed upon it—that is, on whether borrowing as a share of GDP is lower—and also ensure that debt is falling. If the targets are not met, the Treasury has to explain to Parliament why that is not the case. Again, that is subject to scrutiny by Parliament. There will be a revised code for fiscal stability, which I shall make available before Committee, so that there can proper scrutiny of it.

Clause 4 makes it clear that it is to Parliament that the Government are accountable for approval of, progress towards and compliance with their fiscal plans. I see that the reasoned amendment calls for the creation of a new independent body to monitor and demand fiscal action, but I believe that Parliament should hold the Government to account for their fiscal policy, not a quango, an external body or, indeed, the courts. The Government are accountable to Parliament and, through Parliament, to the people.

[Mr. Darling]

Mr. George Osborne rose—

Mr. Darling: I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman and I both agree that the Government are accountable to Parliament and, through Parliament, to the people.

Mr. Osborne: When the Prime Minister was shadow Chancellor and originally set out his plans for fiscal rules, he said that they should be monitored independently by an independent office. Does the Chancellor know when the Prime Minister changed his mind?

Mr. Darling: My recollection was that when the then shadow Chancellor set out his plans, he set out proposals that we subsequently enacted. The hon. Gentleman asked about independent verification. Again, my recollection is that we said that we thought that there should be a role for the National Audit Office, and there was indeed a role for the NAO, which is independent of the Government.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I agree entirely with the Chancellor that Parliament should hold the Government to account, on this and many other matters. So why have we not had a comprehensive spending review, so that we can understand precisely what the impact of the cuts will be and hold the Government to account on the plans that they are already putting forward?

Mr. Darling: For the reason stated in the pre-Budget report. I said that there was still a lot of uncertainty about. We still do not know what unemployment will be this coming year. We had some good news just after the PBR, in that employment rose and unemployment fell, but we still think that unemployment will rise during the course of this year, so there is a lot of uncertainty about, and we still have the current spending plans, which run through until April 2011. That is why we have not done a spending review just now, and that remains the case.

There is no doubt that we face a huge challenge as a country. There will be difficult judgments over the next few years. I have said before that some tough decisions will have to be taken, but the real judgment is this: we should recognise that what the Government do and what they spend can make a difference to the future rate of growth, and they can certainly make a difference to the quality and availability of public services, upon which many people who send us here rely. However, what the Government do and what they spend will also set the direction of this country for the next 10 or 20 years. That is why it is important that we get it right. I believe that my judgment of bringing borrowing down in a way that is manageable and deliverable and, at the same time, does not damage the social and economic fabric of this country is the right one. This Bill will help us to achieve that. I commend it to the House.

6.26 pm

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): I beg to move an amendment, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and add:

> "this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Fiscal Responsibility Bill because it does not establish an independent mechanism for ensuring the publication of credible fiscal forecasts and assessing the effectiveness of Government fiscal policies in achieving stated fiscal objectives; because the duties imposed by the Bill are not accompanied by any corresponding sanctions; because in the absence of spending plans which set out a credible means by which public sector net borrowing is to be reduced, legislating to secure sound public finances is irrelevant and a distraction; and, consequently, considers that the Bill is inadequate in achieving the objective of securing sound public finances."

Although this piece of legislation consists of only six short clauses, it must be the biggest load of nonsense that this Government have had the audacity to present to Parliament in this Session. Quite frankly, I do not think the Bill is the idea of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any of his Treasury Ministers, or indeed of any official in the Treasury. It was dreamt up by the Schools Secretary and the Prime Minister when they were trying to think of something to say on the "Andrew Marr Show" on the eve of the Labour conference, so now we all have to go through the rigmarole of debating it in Parliament. The Bill was a completely feeble stunt, a fact that is revealed when we look at the clauses.

Let us remember what one of the economists whom the Prime Minister himself appointed to the Monetary Policy Committee has said about the Bill. Willem Buiter has said:

> "Fiscal responsibility acts are instruments of the fiscally irresponsible to con the public."

That was the man whose economic judgment the Prime Minister trusted so much that he put him on the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England, but no one is conned. If the Bill was supposed to reassure the markets, it has failed. This is what one of the City's leading economists, Michael Saunders of Citibank, says:

> "the government's plans for legislation to cut the deficit are not convincing and are probably just camouflage—a sort of 'fiscal figleaf'—for the lack of genuine action".

If the Bill was supposed to con the business community, it has completely failed in that task too. Richard Lambert, the head of the CBI, was on the radio just two or three days ago saying:

> "I'm certainly not satisfied with the government's plans. It's going to be publishing in the next few days legislation which says it is going to halve the deficit within the next four years, but it's a bit like me saying I'm going to join the gym and that means I'm fit already."

The Bill was also supposed to convince the independent economic commentators, but this is what the Institute for Fiscal Studies says about the legislation that the Chancellor has brought to the House today:

> "it is far from clear why investors and voters should be any more impressed by this"—

the Bill—

> "than they were by the Code for Fiscal Stability, which was enshrined in statute with much fanfare in 1998."

The Bill has failed to con even the Labour party. This is what the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) says—[Interruption.] The Chief Secretary to the Treasury laughs, but I seem to remember that the right hon. Gentleman is the former Home Secretary—not the former Home Secretary who says that the Labour party has a big charisma problem; I am talking about the other former Home Secretary, who says that this piece of legislation is "vacuous and irrelevant". As with so much that the right hon. Gentleman says about the leadership of the Labour party at the moment, he is absolutely right, because when we go through the Bill clause by clause, we see what complete nonsense it is.

Let us start with clause 1, which deals with the duties on the Treasury. Here we read:

> "The Treasury must ensure that…public sector net borrowing expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product is less than it was for the preceding…year."

We are also told that the law will require net debt to be falling by the end of five years. Saying these things, and putting them into statute, will not actually make them happen, however. Every Budget and pre-Budget report produced by this Chancellor and his predecessor since 2003 has promised falling net debt at the end of a five-year horizon, and every one of those borrowing forecasts has been wrong, in times of boom and of bust.

The present Chancellor has got his total borrowing forecasts wrong to the tune of £560 billion since he entered No. 11. It is now four times higher than when he announced his forecasts for the PBR in 2007, after the credit crunch had begun. So why would anyone believe his latest forecast, just because he writes it into the clause of a Bill instead of publishing it in the Budget Red Book? Does the fact that it is printed on green paper, given a solemn title and passed through Parliament after being looked at by a Committee of the House make it any more likely to happen, or any more real, than when he stood at the Dispatch Box on Budget day and told us that these things were going to happen?

Clause 2 relates to "Further duties for securing sound public finances". In it, we find a stunning extension of state power. We discover that

> "The Treasury may make an order imposing…a duty or duties" and that these duties are

> "imposed for the purpose of securing sound public finances."

We also find that these duties

> "must be consistent with the key principles as applied by the code for fiscal stability."

This is the same code for fiscal stability, by the way, that allowed the Prime Minister to run massive deficits in the middle of a boom, but never mind that. We shall have an order that will impose a duty to secure sound public finances, and it will have to be laid before Parliament and approved by resolution of the House of Commons.

Who is to be on the receiving end of this great order that will descend from on high, from Her Majesty's Treasury, to use the full authority of Parliament to impose a duty to secure sound public finances? Which public body will be quivering in fear, wondering whether it is to be the Treasury's chosen victim? Well, it turns out that that public body is the Treasury itself. Under clause 2, the Treasury will have the power to make an order that imposes a duty on the Treasury. That will make it sit up and take notice, will it not?

Mr. Cash: On the question of duties, does my hon. Friend agree that the point he is making could equally be applied to the Government Departments on which Parliament has imposed a series of duties that drive levels of public expenditure ever upwards? Does he not agree that, to get the whole question of public expenditure right, we would have to amend or repeal many of the duties imposed on public bodies in order to reduce the overall level of public expenditure?

Mr. Osborne: I take the point that my hon. Friend is making.

The Chancellor said in his speech that the great sanction would be that, if the existing code or Act were broken, the Chancellor would face the humiliation and embarrassment of coming to Parliament to introduce a new piece of legislation. I guess that he is in a position to know what that feels like. From what I can see of his behaviour today, however, that is not a huge sanction.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that legislation without sanctions is not worth the paper it is written on?

Mr. Osborne: I agree with my—I was about to say "my hon. Friend", but that would be to get ahead of ourselves, would it not? We are all being very nice to the Liberal Democrats these days. I agree with the hon. Lady. I take it from what she said that she will be joining us in the Division Lobby tonight; I certainly hope she will.

Hon. Members might be hoping to find something a bit more impressive in clause 3, but in it we discover that the Treasury will be required to tell us whether it has met its borrowing forecasts. The last time I checked, I found that that happens in every single Budget statement and pre-Budget report. However, we now need legislation to turn what has been the standard practice of Chancellors, at least since the second world war, into the law of the land. And when will the Treasury be required by law to tell us whether it has succeeded in performing its duty to secure sound public finances? According to clause 3(5), this will have to happen

> "during the financial year ending with 31 March 2016."

We shall not have long to wait, then, for the Government's assessment of how well they are doing. They cannot get their borrowing forecasts right from one month to another, yet they now expect us to believe a commitment written in statute relating to 2016. They are living in a completely parallel universe.

Let us look at clause 4, which relates to accountability. Let us see what terrible fate will await the Treasury if it fails to comply with the order imposed on it by the Treasury. Will the Chancellor be hauled off to the Tower? Will he be forced to hand in the great seals of his office? Will his pay be docked for poor performance? Will he at least have to apologise? No. Clause 4 states that the fact that any duty imposed as a result of the Bill

> "has not been, or will or may not be, complied with does not affect the lawfulness of anything done, or omitted to be done, by any person."

This is an absolutely ridiculous clause. There are no penalties. This must be the first law introduced in Parliament that contains absolutely no legal sanction whatever for those who break it.

We have only two more clauses to consider. Clause 5 is about interpretation, and states that the Treasury will be required to "explain the meaning" of such terms as "public sector net borrowing" and "public sector net debt". It is a shame that the meaning of those terms was not explained to the previous Chancellor when he was in office. As far as I can see, the clause does not require a proper explanation of the state of the national accounts that takes into account the private finance initiative liabilities that are kept off-balance sheet, and public sector pension liabilities.

[Mr. George Osborne]

Finally, clause 6 deals with the short title of the Bill, and tells us that the legislation will be known as the Fiscal Responsibility Act 2010. We will have to see whether it ever becomes an Act. This clause confirms a time-honoured principle in this place: the greater the claims that are made by a Bill's title, the less substance it usually contains.

Of course we have to debate this vacuous and irrelevant legislation, but why did the Chancellor feel the compelling need to introduce it? Why is he the first Chancellor in history to feel that he needs an Act of Parliament on top of a Budget statement? There can be only two explanations: either he does not trust himself to secure sound public finances, or he knows that the public do not trust him to secure them. Neither is exactly a ringing endorsement; both are a reflection of the catastrophic, disastrous state to which this Government have reduced the finances of this country.

I have searched far and wide to find another country that has introduced a fiscal responsibility Act, and I have found one. It is that shining example of fiscal rectitude, Nigeria. That is where the Chancellor appears to have got his inspiration from. It was no doubt sent to him in one of those e-mails that we all get from Nigeria. Perhaps it said, "Dear honoured sir, I am a former finance Minister of this country, and I have a plan to reduce your debts. Please send me your bank account details and I will forward the money by return." [Laughter.] Of course this would be funny, if this were not such a fundamentally dishonest piece of legislation, and if this were not such a fundamentally serious time, in which the credibility of our nation and its ability to pay its way in the world are being questioned by markets, investors and credit rating agencies around the world.

A poll in yesterday's Financial Times found that a fiscal crisis was the biggest single risk facing the British economy at the moment. The managing director of Moody's Global Sovereign Risk group is now warning of the danger of "an abrupt increase in long term interest rates"

in the UK. The former Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, Sir Howard Davies, whom the Prime Minister appointed to be the first head of the FSA, said this week that

"the major risk" to the British economy

"is the loss of confidence in the government's ability to get the public finances back under control".

And today we hear that the world's biggest bond investor, PIMCO, has announced that it will be selling off UK Government bonds this year. It says that this is a "significant policy statement" prompted by concerns about rising borrowing levels in this country. It has just issued a statement saying that the question is when, not if, Britain's credit rating will be downgraded.

Mr. Redwood: Has my hon. Friend noticed that during the period in which the Bank of England has been buying a quarter of the total Government debt in issue to try to keep the price up, the price has been falling so the long-term rate of interest has been rising? That has happened even though the Bank is buying a quarter of the issue, so what is going to happen when it stops buying?

Mr. Osborne: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely telling point, and I am going to come on exactly to the threat to interest rates posed by the Government's policy. Before I move on from Pimco, I cannot help noticing that the head of the European arm of PIMCO, one Mr. Andrew Balls, is the brother of the Schools Secretary. Clearly, the Balls family's confidence in the Chancellor's ability to do his job runs across the brothers.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) makes a very important point about gilts and the fact that we are now in a period when the Bank of England is pursuing a policy of quantitative easing, but with £200 billion of gilts to get away next year, we need buyers, not sellers of those gilts. Here, however, we have the world's largest bond investor saying that it is going to be selling gilts next year. Of course gilt yields are rising—up 1 per cent. last year and up 0.5 per cent. in the last month, which is twice the rate of increase in countries like Germany.

Rising gilt yields, of course, mean in the end rising interest rates, so a central objective of policy for recovery must be to allow the Bank of England to keep interest rates as low as possible for as long as possible, which requires a credible fiscal plan. The absence of such a plan from the Labour Government is pushing up the yields that will push up the interest rates and the mortgage rates, causing businesses to fail and jobs to be lost. The Chancellor, however, remains paralysed by inaction. He seems to see the storm clouds gathering, but he is doing nothing. We know the reason why. The Prime Minister and Schools Secretary—the man whom the Prime Minister wanted to be the Chancellor—will not let him. The disagreements between them are now an open secret. They are on the front page of The Financial Times and are being read across Europe. The Chancellor is at least vaguely aware, I think, of the seriousness of the debt crisis this country faces, but the Prime Minister is in complete denial. The Chancellor at least uses the word "cuts", but the Prime Minister could not bring himself to use that word in the first big interview he gave in the new year.

I believe that the Chancellor wanted to accelerate the reduction in the deficit and he wanted to do so in the pre-Budget report, but he was overruled by the Prime Minister who accelerated the spending instead. That is the problem—the Chancellor keeps losing this argument in Downing street and the result is that Britain's credibility in the world markets is further undermined. Britain's credit rating is for the first time in our history at serious risk and British interest rates are set to rise in a recovery.

The answer surely is to deal more decisively with the deficit. As the Chancellor well knows, that is the view of British business and the CBI. The Labour party used to parade the CBI as one of its great supporters, and I believe that in 1997 the CBI was invited into Downing street before the trade unions were. Now the Labour party dismisses the views of the organisation that speaks for many British businesses, but this is what Richard Lambert, the man who was also appointed to the Monetary Policy Committee by the Prime Minister, says:

"History tell us that these are really difficult nettles to grasp but if you grasp them in a clear and bold way, then the pain lasts for a shorter period than if you just limply grab and hold of > them… Our strong instincts are that the risks of going too soon are less than the risks of waiting too long… Two full parliaments of chancellors being responsible just seems too much to expect."

Here is the view of the OECD expressed in the last few days:

> "Major fiscal consolidation is needed"

in the UK

> "and more concrete plans should be developed and communicated as early as possible."

That is the OECD's view expressed after the pre-Budget report.

Here, now, is the view of the international markets. BNP Paribas says:

> "The UK's public finances are in such a poor state that delay could lead to a loss of confidence, a downgrade of the UK credit rating and a crisis in the public finances."

Sir John Gieve, another former deputy governor of the Bank of England appointed by the Prime Minister, stated that the Government's plan

> "will be hard to sustain politically and eliminating the structural deficit more quickly in 2011 and 2012 looks a better course."

Mr. Darling: I have said that we should halve the deficit over a four-year period, but the hon. Gentleman clearly thinks that we should go further and faster. How much faster and how much further?

Mr. Osborne: I am just coming on to my view, which is exactly the same as that of the Governor of the Bank of England, the person who is in charge of monetary policy. The Chancellor is in charge of fiscal policy in this country; the Governor of the Bank of England is in charge of monetary policy. It is the view of the Governor that we should eliminate a large part of the structural deficit in the next Parliament and that is precisely my view as well.

Mr. Darling: That is what we are proposing to do, but in addition, the Governor of the Bank of England said in the same interview in response to a series of questions that he recognised the difficulties that could arise from going too fast and too much further. Let me ask the shadow Chancellor again: if he thinks we should go further and faster, will he tell the House how much further and how much faster? Especially in the light of what has happened in the last 24 hours, some further detail would be very welcome.

Mr. Osborne: The Chancellor says that he has the same view as the Governor of the Bank of England—he has just said that—but when asked by the Treasury Committee what he thought about the risk of a credit downgrade to the UK, the Governor said that we needed "a credible plan", which by implication does not currently exist, and that such a plan should consist of the elimination of a large part of the structural deficit in the next Parliament. That is a view I share with the Governor of the Bank of England and it is clearly not the view that the same Governor believes is being pursued currently—or else he would not have referred to the need for a credible plan.

Mr. Darling: Let me ask the hon. Gentleman a last time, as it does not seem that I am going to get an answer. If he read the whole of the Governor's reply, the hon. Gentleman would know that he was talking about countries across the world, not just this country. But why will the hon. Gentleman not answer the question? He quite clearly hints that he would like to go further and faster, so why will he not tell us exactly how much? Does he want to reduce the deficit a year earlier than we do? If so, how does he intend to do it? If he does do that, it might mean taking another £26 billion or so out of the economy. Is that his intention?

Mr. Osborne: This is what the Governor of the Bank of England said when asked—[Interruption.] I know that it comes as a complete surprise to Labour Members that the Conservative party agrees with the Governor of the Bank of England and the Chancellor of the day does not seem to agree with him. When asked to comment on the plan that the Chancellor had set out, the Governor said this, and I have it before me:

> "I think" the plan

> "has to be something where a really significant reduction in the deficit, the elimination of a large part of the structural deficit, takes place over the lifetime of a parliament, which is the period for which a government is elected. Beyond that"

commenting on the Chancellor's plan—> is a statement of intent and hope rather than a plan for which someone can be held accountable."

That is what he said in evidence to the Treasury Committee on 24 November 2009. I agree with the Governor of the Bank of England and that is our policy.

It is increasingly clear, by the way, that virtually every independent and respected opinion in this country agrees with us rather than with the Government of the day. Such opinion is also in agreement with our approach towards creating a fiscal framework in which we can be held accountable. What we are going to do if we are elected to power in the next few months is create a proper and independent office for budget responsibility. Indeed, we publish today draft legislation—[Interruption.] Well, I am not sure what Liberal Democrat policy is on independent fiscal accountability—although, of course, I must be careful.

Let me explain the very significant difference between what we are proposing and will implement and what the Government are presenting to Parliament today. The first striking difference is that while this Bill leaves the Treasury in charge of forecasts and gives the Chancellor the room to fix the forecasts in order to fit the Budget policy—as we know, a practice that has developed in recent years—our Bill would for the first time ever put the forecasts of the nation's finances in independent hands. In other words, it would not be the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day who published the borrowing and debt forecasts; it would be an independent office for budget responsibility, properly resourced and accountable to Parliament.

Secondly, while this Bill leaves the Chancellor as judge and jury on whether he is sticking to his fiscal strategy, our Bill would subject the Chancellor to the independent verdict of an independent panel of experts in the office for budget responsibility. While this Bill tells us nothing about the true state of the nation's finances, our Bill would give the country a statutory independent audit of the true cost of public sector pension liabilities and the dodgy off-sheet accounting of PFI contracts, and give us a proper national audit of the nation's finances.

[Mr. George Osborne]

Mr. Pelling: Might not the arrangement be strengthened further if the body sat in Parliament, mimicking the Congressional Budget Office in some respects? I know the Opposition feel strongly that it is important to enhance the effectiveness of Parliament, and I may have misunderstood what the hon. Gentleman is proposing. Perhaps he intends the body to sit in Parliament.

Mr. Osborne: It would be rather like the Monetary Policy Committee. It would be independent, but accountable to Parliament. Its members would, I assume, appear before the Treasury Committee, and it would be asked to make a technical judgment in publishing the nation's borrowing and debt forecasts.

Instead of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Budget day or pre-Budget report day, standing up and saying "We predict that the country will borrow X, Y and Z over the coming years", this independent body, accountable to Parliament, would make the judgment. It is a technical judgment, and we do not need an elected politician to make it. We need elected politicians to be informed by a proper, independent judgment of the nation's finances; then we shall all be able to make the decisions on tax and spending for which we are held democratically accountable. It is clear from what has happened over the last few years how misled Parliament has been by the borrowing forecasts announced by the present Chancellor and his predecessor, which have turned out to be completely wrong and have led to decisions that were not in the interests of the country.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): The shadow Chancellor is rightly puzzled about the issue of sanctions that the Treasury might be able to impose on itself, but can he explain what sanctions the new independent body would be empowered to impose on the Treasury if the targets set by the body were not met?

Mr. Osborne: At or around the time of the Budget, and the pre-Budget report, the body will publish not just the forecasts but its view on whether the Government are on course to fulfil the mandate set by the Chancellor—in other words, the elimination of a large part of the structural deficit over the Parliament—and an independent report. Obviously, if the Government were shown to be off course, that would be hugely embarrassing for the Chancellor of the day.

I do not think that a Chancellor who regularly disagreed with the independent body could survive for long, so it would pose a challenge to him. This would constitute a proper, serious sanction. In extremis, the Chancellor of the day can overrule the Monetary Policy Committee or the independence of the Bank of England, although of course the question never arises. In this case, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would face a very difficult time if, after he or she had said, "We will achieve this fiscal result over the coming years", the independent body, at the time of the Budget, said, "Actually, they will not."

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Is not the truth that the sanction contained in both the Bill and the hon. Gentleman's proposal is the bond market? If a Chancellor of the Exchequer came to the House and said that he wanted to change, in primary legislation, the arrangement that we are discussing today, or if a future Conservative Chancellor said that he was ignoring what the new body was saying about the danger to the economy, we would very soon find our credit ratings lost or further downgraded, and long-term interest rates would rise. That suggests that the real discipline now is not in the House or even in the banking community. We are now subject to the requirements of credit agencies and the bond market for us to start behaving properly.

Mr. Osborne: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very good observation, which is, in fact, true of government through the ages. Even in mediaeval times, kings and Parliament in its then form were subject to the ability to raise money on what were then the international money markets.

Something interesting has happened in this country's politics. We used to regard Budget day, and pre-Budget report day, as the moment when the Chancellor, whoever it was, would come from on high and hand out the goodies. We were all supposed to be incredibly grateful, and then the Chancellor would disappear for another six months. Of course, things are very different now. The House of Commons is subject to the economic pressures imposed on it by, in part, the bond market.

I recently read an interview with the Swedish Prime Minister of the 1990s, Göran Persson, who said that no Prime Minister wanted to find himself in the situation in which he had found himself. He was spending more time in the City of London giving presentations to young bond market traders than talking to the Swedish people about the fiscal problems the country faced. The House should take very seriously the fact that the world's largest bond investor said today that next year it would sell gilts rather than buy them, the fact that all the credit ratings agencies have put the United Kingdom on a warning and will decide later in the year whether it should face a credit downgrade, and the fact that our gilt yields are rising at twice the rate of Germany's. Even if the Prime Minister is in complete denial about the economic situation and the fiscal problems that the country faces, I do not think that that is an excuse for the rest of us to ignore those problems.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) about the discipline of the bond market, but I believe that an independent office for budget responsibility would help Members of Parliament to hold Chancellors and Prime Ministers to account for their promises, and would give Members proper information on Budget day so that they could challenge what the Chancellor and the Prime Minister of the day were saying. It would also discipline the Government internally, and would help Chancellors to achieve their and the Government's stated goals.

Our proposal has been welcomed by many different people, including independent economists. The Institute for Fiscal Studies has said that a new independent body of the kind that the Conservatives propose

> "could help keep the interest rates at which the government is able to borrow low", because it would enhance the confidence of the bond markets in the Government's ability to deliver on their objectives. It has been supported by the CBI and many other organisations. That is why we have published our legislation in draft today. It means proper accountability, a real set of national accounts, lower interest rates, economic stability, and the restoration of Britain's credibility in the world markets. That is what a Conservative Government will bring to this country as we consign this Government and this nonsense of a Bill to the dustbin of history.

6.56 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I want to explain briefly why I will not be supporting the Government tonight.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): There is nothing new about that.

Mr. Field: That is true, and it is a sadness for me, but clearly not a big enough sadness to the hon. Gentleman, who is now leaving the Chamber.

Given the Chancellor's ability to present such thin gruel to the House, I am surprised that his party did not claim to see the signs of joined-up government. Yesterday they announced that in future all five-year-olds in our schools would be taught the dangers of debt, how not to fall into debt, what to do if they fell into debt, and how to get out of debt as quickly as possible. Bright, or perhaps not so bright, five-year-olds might suggest that the lessons could start here rather than in the classrooms.

I want, however, to inject a note of seriousness, if not horror, into the debate. I want to compare our present position with the phoney war that led up to world war two. Although those on all three Front Benches now talk of the need to lower the deficit, they are all also talking about spending more. I do not believe that our voters—the voters of this country—have any idea how serious the financial position of the country is, or how massive the cuts will have to be if we are to return some semblance of order to our national accounts.

Let me illustrate that first by looking at the payments on the new debt. Let us suppose that we could not roll that debt over, but had to close Government Departments. The cost of the debt in the first year of bailing us out—I am ignoring past debt, which we have to service as well—would be the loss of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department for business and enterprise, the Law Officers' Department and the Northern Ireland Office. In the second year—we are not concerned only with the new tranche of debt; there would be two years of debt—we would have to lose, in its entirety, the Department responsible for innovation, the universities and skills. In the third year, the debt repayments would be greater than the budgets for defence, the Cabinet Office and some other Departments of State. It would decimate what we do as a Government if we had to pay for the money that we intend to borrow by closing Government Departments and the programmes that go with them. I do not believe that the people of this country yet have any idea about the seriousness of the position that we face.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that part of the problem is that the Government also seem to have no idea about the seriousness of the situation?

Mr. Field: I am critical of all the Front Benchers. In the past few days, the official Opposition have been talking about spending new money. It is bizarre beyond belief to think that the health budget can be ring-fenced. It is one of our biggest budgets, and commitments have been given from Government and Opposition Front Benchers about the sanctity of such budgets. It will be impossible for us to balance the books even at the rate that the Chancellor is talking about—I shall discuss in a moment whether that level would be adequate or quick enough—if we decide that some of the largest departmental expenditures will somehow be saved from cuts.

Mr. Cash: The right hon. Gentleman is talking a great deal of sense. Does he agree with my earlier point that the approach of addressing these issues without having regard to the duties that are imposed on local authorities by Parliament is part of the problem? We have to deal with the question of whether legal liabilities are being raised to a level that cannot be supported by public administration.

Mr. Field: I accept that, but we face something far more immediate than that, as I tried to make plain in my intervention on the shadow Chancellor. We keep hearing contributions in this place that sound as though we are now in charge of our affairs and our future, but we are mere pawns on the chessboard of the credit agencies and the bond market. It is to their tune, sadly, that we now have to dance. My worry is that even in the next few months we are going to have difficulty in floating the amount of debt required to see us up to and through the election, let alone the next umpteen years.

Kelvin Hopkins: I usually agree with much of what my right hon. Friend says, but I am alarmed by what he says about the level of cuts that he believes we face. He is talking only about the expenditure side, and not the income side, of the problem, but we should be looking at income and not expenditure. If we cut spending now, we will just make the problem worse.

Mr. Field: In my view, if we do not cut enough and soon enough, we will not have a currency. The debate about whether we should have taxation or cuts is to some extent academic. The plea about tax evasion and avoidance that my hon. Friend has made ever since he has been in the House—ever since I have enjoyed listening to him—is one that I was pleased to hear the Chancellor pick up in such a positive way, but that alone is not enough.

I return to the central issue of whether we are going to see ourselves through to the general election. We have been living in a cloud cuckoo land partly because all the political parties have been saying that they are going to spend more, so that nobody would think that things will be all that tough. The economic crisis was said to be the most serious since the 1930s, but when improvements in programmes are announced, people think, "Well, it can't be all that bad, can it?" What has added to that illusion is the fact that the Government have been printing money, between 98 and 99 per cent.

[Mr. Frank Field]

of which has been buying the Government debt. What we do not know is what the markets will do when there is no more funny money to use to buy that debt. We know that there is £25 billion more; presumably, that money is being spent now and will, one hopes, take us up to February—but then things will hit the fan. Of course, the Government are taking proper actions such as saying to the banks, which behaved so irresponsibly in that earlier period, that they need to restructure their liabilities and assets so that they have a more stable basis from which to carry out their trade. Surprise, surprise, one of the assets that the Government say that the banks should have more of are Government gilts. The danger is that if the international markets do not believe us, those gilts might not be much better than the American mortgage bonds that were floated a few years ago and that got us directly into this mess.

I want to make a plea to the Government. The point of maximum danger will certainly come when we cannot, or are not going to, print any more money to buy our own debt. Earlier, I made a comparison between the current situation and the phoney war—the lead-up to the war. The comparisons are chilling. In 1938, people came to the House and to the Dispatch Box and told us that there was no real threat from the international situation and certainly not from Germany. Recently, there has been an unwillingness across the whole House to get to grips with the size and extent of the debt. That unwillingness has been equivalent to the denials about the dangers of Nazi Germany. Back then, when the Government started to lose support, they were forced to give a pledge to Poland. An equivalent pledge today is the Bill before us, which the Government would not have introduced willingly, but they know that they need to introduce it if they are to increase the confidence of the markets. In 1939, the then Prime Minister said to Montgomery when visiting the British Expeditionary Force, "I don't think the Germans have any intention of attacking us. Do you?" Montgomery soon put him straight on that. The bizarre denial of that time culminated in the Norway situation, when we all learned just how grave and perilous the position of this country was.

I want to end by making a plea to the Government. The Conservative party did not have a terribly good record on Munich, so I am not trying to make party political points here; it is far more serious than that. It is a big regret of mine that in the lead-up to the Iraq war—and I am probably the only person in Christendom who still believes that the Iraqis did have weapons of mass destruction—I did not ask the then Prime Minister an obvious question about the plan for day two. I did not ask about the plan for ensuring that the country did not descend into chaos after the Government had been toppled. I therefore make a plea to the Chancellor, knowing that no one will be able to stand up and say that they have taken the relevant precautions. What defences have the Government thought through if long-term interest rates do not rise in the way that the shadow Chancellor has described, but start to gather pace? What will our response be? What will be our defence to prevent further deterioration if we lose our credit rating? What do the Government have in the cupboard to ensure that we do not face a gilt strike when the Debt Management Office at the Treasury reports to the Prime Minister that it has not been able to garner enough funds that week to buy up the Government debt? Margery Allingham wrote a brilliant diary on the horrendous drift into war from 1938 to 1939. When the Norway disaster engulfed the country, she wrote of the then Prime Minister, Chamberlain, that he was a "vain old man with nothing up his sleeve." Please, God, I hope that this Government have a lot up their sleeve.

7.9 pm

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me an opportunity to contribute to this pressing and important debate. As we have just been hearing from the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), we gather at a time of great economic risk for our country. The first signs of tentative economic growth may be appearing, but we are far from out of the woods.

The economic backdrop to the Bill is dire, as the right hon. Gentleman has just said. In 2009, the British economy contracted by almost 5 per cent. That is worse than in either of the Conservative recessions of the early 1980s and 1990s, and worse even than 1978 and the winter of discontent. Remarkably, it is even worse than the year of the Wall street crash or any of the subsequent years during the great depression.

Our economy contracted by more in 2009 than in any peacetime year since 1921, and the impact on our public finances has been truly devastating. One quarter of British public spending is now unfunded. We have a low-tax economy, not because ordinary people and households around the country pay less tax but because of a collapse in corporation tax. At the same time, however, we have a high-spending Government. The money coming into the Treasury's coffers is comparable to that in an American-style society, but the money going out of those coffers is more comparable to that in a Scandinavian-style society. The long-standing ready-reckoner suggesting that any country borrowing more than 10 per cent. of gross domestic product in a given year has entered basket-case territory has been breached. In this financial year, we in Britain will borrow more than 12 per cent. of our GDP, and the proportion will be well over 10 per cent. again next year.

What will be the effect on public services—the local schools, the police, the hospitals—in our individual consistencies? One quarter of those services are unfunded, and we are plugging that gap this year with public borrowing. As a country, we are borrowing an extra £500 million every single day, which equates to more than £20 million extra every hour or £1 million extra every three minutes. We have borrowed about £25 million extra since this debate started. Our currency has been massively devalued, and we are now printing extra money.

It is often said by the Government that other countries have experienced recession too, and that is of course true. When those countries were growing, however, we never heard from the Prime Minister that Britain's rising prosperity was due to international factors that had nothing to do with the policies of his Government. Instead, all his plans were predicated on the best-case scenarios, and that left Britain dangerously over-exposed. When this Prime Minister boasted that we had abolished boom and bust on his watch, he was half right—he just got the wrong half.

I want, however, to turn to where the Prime Minister has a valid story to tell. It has been said—and the Chancellor said it again today—that our borrowing is at a level similar to that of other comparable countries, and that is broadly true. We were told by our iron Chancellor that we would not let our debt rise above 40 per cent. of GDP, but it is now doubling to 80 per cent. Even so, it remains lower than the debt level in Italy—although by some measurements Italy's economy is now bigger than ours, and our total debt is still rising faster than Italy's.

It is also true—and in this the Chancellor, the Prime Minister and others have a point—that by historical standards Britain's debt looks manageable. It may be rising to 80 per cent. now, but we have just been hearing from the right hon. Member for Birkenhead about the consequences of 1945, when our total debt as a percentage of GDP stood at a terrifying 250 per cent.

The second world war is always rightly portrayed in terms of the human casualties that were suffered, but until I saw that figure I had not fully appreciated the terrifying scale of indebtedness that we as a country faced at that time. We may be broke now, but we have been three times more broke in the past.

Mr. Cash: Given my earlier remarks about the true level of debt, would the hon. Gentleman be surprised to hear that aggregating the bank bail-outs—never mind the cost of the RBS-Lloyds deal that was never even disclosed—would put the actual liabilities in the region of £3.84 trillion? He has just given the figures for 1945, but that sum is equivalent to 274 per cent. of GDP.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. I shall not comment on his specific statistics, but merely observe that I am painting the rosiest picture that I can of the current state of the public finances.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is another very big difference between 1945 and now? In 1945, it was decided by common acclaim to get the deficit down by sacking, through demobilisation, almost 1 million public officials who were in the Army or serving the Army. The Government are not about to do the equivalent now.

Mr. Browne: There is another, slightly more obvious difference between now and 1945. Then, we had run up a spectacular debt that changed Britain's place in the world, in many ways for the worse. It left us vulnerable and led to years of rationing and hardship for households right across the country, but we had something pretty spectacular to show for that greater debt—we had defended ourselves against an unprecedented threat to our freedom and independence. Sixty-five years later, it is somewhat harder to work out what the current Prime Minister's monumental achievement from our rising debt is.

Instead, our Prime Minister today stands metaphorically on the observation deck of the new Burj Khalifa skyscraper. Lifted high on a mountain of debt and hubris, he surveys a scene of economic depression and endless desert.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is right to follow the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) in emphasising the severity and seriousness of the current situation, but the big difference between 1945 and today is that then the war was over and the expenditure on it had finished. In contrast, the unsustainable level of expenditure that we have today has not finished, and there does not appear to be any credible offering from the Government as to how they are going to bring that expenditure under control. We just have this Bill, which halves not the overall debt but just the rate at which we will increase it. That is no real solution at all.

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman is right that our debt-to-GDP ratio fell, in a good way, quite markedly after the second world war. Nevertheless, it is still true that we have previously been in territory where that ratio has been well over 100 per cent. We are not in that position at the moment.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has referred to 1945, because we had a wonderful Labour Government who brought us out of that terrible time. Does he agree that, instead of deflating our way out of the massive problems that we faced at that time, we grew our way out of them? We did not spend our time talking about what we had to cut: in fact, we created a national health service, for example, in which we spent more.

Mr. Browne: Perhaps I should avoid a protracted historical discussion, although I always thought that the hon. Gentleman's favourite Labour Government were in office during the period of achievement from 1976 to 1979. However, we have managed to identify another one whom he holds dear to his heart.

I was talking about the Prime Minister standing on deck looking at the consequences of his policies. In that economic desert, we find before us this Fiscal Responsibility Bill—a pathetic and dangerous piece of legislation.

It is pathetic, because we should not need a new law to make the Government do their job. We just need the Government to do their job. The Chancellor is like a man with a new year's resolution to lose weight. He knows that he desires the outcome, but he doubts his ability to make the disciplined decisions that are necessary. He therefore passes a law requiring himself to lose weight, confident in the delusion that he can now tuck into a diet of endless doughnuts and pork pies. As people across the country are daily discovering to their dismay as they examine their discarded gym memberships and low-fat cookery books, there is a world of difference between resolving to do something and having the fortitude to see it through.

The Chancellor has flunked the difficult decisions at every turn. The media were briefed that December's much delayed pre-Budget report would be bristling with tough choices. It did contain an announcement from the Chancellor on pay restraint, as well as the bizarrely counter-intuitive set of higher taxes on employing people, but it then emerged that the extra spending in the PBR added up to more than the extra revenue that would accrue. As in the Prime Minister's Labour conference speech, the goodies kept on coming, but these really were empty promises.

What was the result of the PBR? Having previously said that the deficit this year would be £175 billion, and after announcing a slew of supposedly tough choices in the pre-Budget report, the Chancellor was able to announce that the deficit would now be £178 billion, falling next year—during a period when the economy is forecast to grow in all four quarters—to £176 billion. That is why, speaking as a man still just in his 30s, I know that our national debt will not reach 40 per cent. again until I am in my 60s. The Chancellor's legacy is a burden that blights an entire generation.

[Mr. Jeremy Browne]

It is not an enviable record, but the Chancellor has at least one partial admirer. I was reading The Economist over Christmas. Its edition of 19 December identified the "Heroes of New Labour". Underneath, it added, "Yes, there have been some". There are, to be precise, five heroes of new Labour. None are current MPs; two have died, sadly; and one, Lord Adonis, experienced his finest hours as a member of the Liberal Democrats. The Chancellor is not one of them, but he warrants a footnote under the heading "The nearly men". The article says:

> "By stubbornly keeping his job, Alistair Darling, the unfortunate Chancellor, probably prevented a desperate fiscal plight from becoming even worse under a putative successor."

His biggest legacy, his entry to the new Labour hall of fame, is to have prevented the right hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) from making a bad situation even worse. We are all genuinely grateful, but the Chancellor's hopes must have been so much greater as he walked into this Palace as a new Member of Parliament many years ago.

The Bill is not only pathetic but dangerously wrong-headed. How can we know what the world will face in 2016? We may confront the scale of threat to our national security that demands the wholesale economic sacrifice that helped us to win the second world war, which we have discussed in this debate. What are we meant to say if that happens—"Sorry, we are not fighting. We can't due to our obligations under clause 1 of the Fiscal Responsibility Act 2010"? We may face another recession—it is entirely possible; the so-called double dip scenario. We all hope that it is unlikely, but it is entirely possible. What then? What are we meant to do? Are we meant to say, "Sorry, all the hospitals are going to have to close. That is our obligation under clause 1 of the Fiscal Responsibility Act 2010"? The Chancellor said today that that would not happen because the Chancellor of the day would come to the Dispatch Box, rip up the Act and say, "Don't worry, I never meant it in the first place." That raises the question why we are all here pretending that this is a serious piece of legislation.

We need real determination to plot a path to sustainable recovery, and that requires real political leadership. So how dispiriting it is that the so-called official Opposition woefully fail to match the scale of the task before us. The Conservative shadow Chancellor, in his speech to his own conference, made a virtue of his supposed resolution. It was an interesting speech, but as he confirmed his intention to target big tax cuts on the very richest households, he told us:

> "We are all in this together."

As I watched the television and listened to his speech, I was initially reminded me of the immortal question asked to Debbie McGee—to paraphrase: "What first made you sceptical about the shared austerity message of millionaire George Osborne?"

The shadow Chancellor went on to say that he had identified £7 billion-worth of savings. Let us leave aside for a moment the fact that some of those were costed in 2020 prices and failed to match any sustained scrutiny. This is the crucial bit. The Conservative shadow Chancellor went on to say:

> "Anyone who tells you these choices can be avoided is not telling you the truth."

But that was not really the truth. We have a structural deficit of about £85 billion, so what the Conservative shadow Chancellor told us was perhaps at best one 12th of the truth. It might have been up to a point the truth, but it certainly was not the whole truth and it certainly was not nothing but the truth. Instead, just yesterday we had the Conservatives splashing £400,000 on posters claiming that they would aggressively cut the deficit, but they gave no specific proposals except a single pledge to spend more.

Mr. Gauke: Those of us who were listening carefully to my hon. Friend's speech at that party conference will know that he stated that we did not claim that we had set out a full policy. What he announced was not going to address the full structural deficit, but we had provided an indication. Given the criticisms made by the hon. Gentleman, does he have a full plan to address an £85 billion structural deficit?

Mr. Browne: Let me come to our proposals in just a moment. People will be keen to hear them.

Lorely Burt: Given that 70 per cent. of the deficit is structural, and therefore pre-dates the current financial turmoil, does my hon. Friend think that a Bill that provides no detail about how the Government intend seriously to tackle the problems with the public finances demonstrates any fiscal responsibility at all?

Mr. Browne: I accept my hon. Friend's point. The Bill is near to worthless, but it is a valid point that the Conservatives have just spent a lot of money on a poster campaign across the country that does two things: says that they will try to tackle the deficit and identifies one measure that does nothing to tackle the deficit. That is the point that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead was making. If anything, the deficit would be even greater were the Conservatives' proposal to be implemented. This is the new, cool Steve Hilton-aroma Conservatism, pointing in different directions at the same time. It is what Tony Blair called triangulation and the third way, what fashionable Cameroons call red Toryism and the rest of us call an abdication of leadership. I do not doubt that the Conservative leader's greatest priority is the NHS, but he does not mean the national health service; he means the Notting Hill set.

Philip Davies: The only interpretation that anyone can put on the hon. Gentleman's remarks is that the Liberal Democrats propose a huge cut in spending on the NHS. By how much does the hon. Gentleman's party think that the NHS budget should be cut? Everyone would be interested in that.

Mr. Browne: We are getting to the interesting nub of the argument. We are saying that there is not a good reason to ring-fence Departments. That does not necessarily mean that the Department of Health would be cut, but the implication of the Conservatives' policy—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should hear me out; I am doing the hon. Gentleman the credit of taking him seriously. The implication of his party's policy is that the cuts in schools, police and our soldiers in Afghanistan would be greater, deeper and more fundamental than they would be if all the Departments took the burden of the deficit reduction. That has got to be the case. If the Conservatives would make the cuts across a smaller number of Departments, the cuts would have to be deeper to make up for the fact that some had been ring-fenced. That is a serious question that the Conservative party will have to explain to teachers, police officers and many other public servants and people who use our public services.

Stewart Hosie: I know that the hon. Gentleman is getting dreadfully angry. There is a big fight between the Liberals and the Tories in his seat in the south-west, and it is all dreadfully vexed. The hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) said that 70 per cent. of the deficit was structural. That comes in at about £125 billion. Scotland's share of that would be about £11 billion—the total cost of the NHS in Scotland. How many nurses and teachers does the hon. Gentleman plan that the Scottish Government should sack in order to meet the Liberals' version of cutting the debt?

Mr. Browne: My understanding is that the Scottish National Party aspires to be in coalition with the Conservatives after the general election, so they may be able to come up with a joint plan at that stage. Let me get to our deficit reduction proposals. The straightforward answer is that we are not saying that Departments should be ring-fenced. In the mind of some Members, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead may have exaggerated in his speech the scale of the threat we face, but he rightly warned of the scale of the problem, as I tried to do in the introduction to my speech. Our economy is 5 per cent. smaller than it was a year ago. We cannot carry on with all this "share the proceeds of growth"—with a robe of feel-good Conservatism, without wearing a tie—saying that there are no hard choices to be made. It is not a realistic way forward.

Mr. Gauke: I just want to be clear. The hon. Gentleman has set out the argument for cutting spending across the board, so the implication is that there would be cuts in the NHS budget under a Liberal Democrat Government.

Mr. Browne: No, I have not said that.

Philip Davies: What have you said then?

Mr. Browne: I will tell you if you listen. I said that no Department is ring-fenced. I have said not that there would automatically be cuts in every Department, but that we should not have a policy of ring-fenced Departments. I will give way to any Conservative Member who will say that all the extra money that Labour has spent on the NHS has been spent 100 per cent. efficiently and that there is no scope for finding efficiencies in the national health service. If there is scope for finding efficiencies in the NHS, the question Conservative MPs have to ask themselves is why they would cut efficient parts of schools, the Army or the police beyond a point they would otherwise need to do, to support inefficient parts of the national health service. That is a valid question, which the Conservative party, due to marketing reasons, is unable to answer.

Mr. Pelling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Browne: No, I want to make some progress.

I want the deficit cut, which is why my party has consistently made bold and eye-catching contributions to our national debate on that subject. That is why in the past months we have called for pay restraint, which protects those on low incomes but would make significant savings of billions of pounds over two years. As I have just said, Britain is almost 5 per cent. poorer than it was a year ago and we cannot afford a national wage bill that pretends nothing has happened.

We have led the way in saying that some major capital spending proposals are unaffordable. We have said that households with incomes that would be the envy of the majority of people should not also be topped up with unaffordable extra tax credits. We have identified specific projects that we believe can no longer be financially justified. That is why in a Statutory Instrument Committee in February—less than a year ago—I argued against both Labour and Conservative Front Benchers that the so-called baby bonds were no longer affordable.

There was great unity among the Front Benchers of the two old parties; they were committed to the old policies, as though the deficit had never happened, but later in 2009 the Conservative shadow Chancellor, to his credit, belatedly caught up, telling his conference that baby bonds are > "a luxury we can no longer afford."

Where the Liberal Democrats lead, others in the House follow. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is true.

I am constantly looking for new savings. I realise the enormous challenge that a deficit of £500 million extra every day poses. I was looking through Hansard a couple of weeks ago and I found a question from the Member who is known to the Conservative shadow Business Secretary as Philip Holland, but is better known to the rest of us as the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). Anyone anxious about the Conservatives' plans for deficit reduction needs to understand how seriously they are taking the task. I shall read out that brief question to give the House a flavour of the magnitude of the Conservative approach to the task. The question is headed "Christmas":

> "Mr. Philip Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department has spent on Christmas (a) cards, (b) parties and (c) decorations in the last 12 months.
>
> Mr. Hain: In the last 12 months, my Department spent £385 on Christmas cards and £1,054 on receptions. We did not purchase any Christmas decorations."—[Official Report, 10 November 2009; Vol. 499, c. 178W.]

The shadow Chief Secretary's job is not just to clear up the mess left by his leader; he is also asking the brave deficit reduction questions that can transform our country's prospects. I have done the calculations, and the savings identified by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge equate to 0.26 seconds of national debt—the gap between Usain Bolt and the man who finished second, with the Conservatives left on the starting blocks.

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, as I indicated a little while ago that I wanted to intervene.

[Kelvin Hopkins]

The core of the hon. Gentleman's rather rambling round-about speech is squeezing public expenditure—wages, capital investment and other spending programmes. Surely that will deflate the economy and raise the level of unemployment, which will make the problem worse by reducing tax revenues and increasing benefit payments.

Mr. Browne: I have acknowledged in the past, and will acknowledge again, that the Chancellor is right to be concerned about debt. He is also right to warn that it is possible to cut too deep and too quickly. Navigating a course from our current dire position to calmer waters is a real challenge for the Chancellor and for whoever is in government over the next decade or more, but it is a great political and economic challenge that requires great political and economic skill from the Chancellor, the Prime Minister and the rest of the Government. It does not require legislation of the sort that is before us this evening.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Does my hon. Friend share my concern that although the Government have a model of the economy written in Fortran, which they will provide, they will not provide the data that go into the model? Proper scrutiny of what the Government are doing is, therefore, difficult, as is making the right judgments, such as whether we are going too deflationary. Would it not be better if the Government were to release the data that go into the Treasury economic model, to enable people to make such judgments more effectively?

Mr. Browne: It would inform the debate, although one is sceptical about the accuracy of some of the data. Recently I told the Chancellor that he had revised upwards his borrowing figures for this year. He appeared to imply that that had not happened, but I have gone back through the figures. In his 2008 Budget—less than two years ago—the Chancellor announced that borrowing for the year 2009-10 would be £38 billion. At the time, some commentators were shocked at the scale of our predicament. Later in 2008—the pre-Budget report just over a year ago—the figure for this year was revised up to £118 billion. In the 2009 Budget, we were told that instead it would be £175 billion, and now the latest estimate for the year that is about to finish is £178 billion. That gap—between the £38 billion forecast less than two years ago and the £178 billion forecast today—represents the Chancellor's credibility in forecasting and deficit reduction. We are borrowing £140 billion more this year than the worst-case scenario forecast less than two years ago.

Anyone wanting to know the worth of the legislation need only look at the helpful explanatory notes provided to us all. One line, on page 5, sums it up perfectly:

> "There are no significant financial effects of the Bill."

Never has anything been said with such brevity and accuracy in an explanatory note, or with such devastating political insight in a document that does not normally verge into that territory.

The cupboard is bare, and too much of the political debate is empty. No wonder that Labour and the Conservatives, in the initial skirmishes of the general election campaign, now both look to the Liberal Democrats for leadership and inspiration.

7.38 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I did not think it would be possible for anyone's credibility to emerge from this debate weaker than the Government's, but after that speech I am beginning to wonder whether it is not the Liberal Democrats who have damaged themselves more in our discussion tonight. That really was a speech that missed the target entirely, if I may say so, yet it is a target that is pretty easy to hit.

The language that others have used about the Bill is overwhelmingly condemnatory—a con trick, vacuous, irrelevant; I will not go through all the quotations that my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) read out. The one bit I agreed with the Liberal Democrat spokesman about was when he described the Bill as a dangerous and pathetic piece of legislation.

The Bill will make bad law. It is declamatory. No explanation has been given about how it will be enforced. It will carry no credibility in the markets. Indeed, it could further erode credibility in the markets, as it may appear no more than a rhetorical substitute for the action we need. In other words, it will appear to be what it really is—mere words.

But it is not just the confidence in the markets that I am worried about and that could be eroded. Legislation such as the Bill erodes confidence in Governments and gives politicians and Parliament a bad reputation. It is corrosive of respect for the rule of law and our institutions. The Bill is, of course, a political document designed to substitute for the markets' lack of credibility for the numbers in the pre-Budget report and the Red Book about how the deficit will be filled.

That credibility deficit has three main causes. The first and immediate cause is that three quarters of the gap between spending and tax is now acknowledged, even by the Government, to be structural—that is to say, it will remain even after the effects of the recession on the deficit have been unwound. It has been created largely by explicit mistakes of Government policy in recent years, not by the crisis. The policy in question is the Brown spending binge that fuelled the boom and aggravated the bust. The Government increased public spending by much more than the economy was growing, and for many years.

Spending has increased from 37 per cent. of GDP to 48 per cent. of GDP. In some ways, that is the most dramatic change in the structure of the UK economy since the wartime measures were unwound. Many of us on the Conservative Benches warned that such rapid spending increases posed a danger for fiscal policy. When I was shadow Paymaster General, I gave several warnings myself. I pointed out that > "we could be heading for a serious financial threat to our fiscal position".

It is, I said,

> "extremely worrying that we should be facing that threat at this point in the cycle."—[Official Report, 17 March 2005; Vol. [illegible], c. 487.]

The second cause of the credibility deficit—I said that there were three—is the sustained lack of transparency in the Government's accounts. If the markets cannot be sure of the Government's figures, they will fear the worst. Examples of the impenetrability of the accounts are legion. What really is the scale of the Government's liabilities? We cannot be sure. We have had some discussion of that this afternoon. It will fall to an incoming Conservative Government, aided by the office of budget responsibility, to find out.

The third main cause of the collapse of credibility has been the emphasis in presentation on language rather than substance, and spin before action in the conduct of fiscal policy over a substantial period. The Bill is just one further illustration of that phenomenon—a phenomenon that we have had to endure for years. For example, we now know that the so-called fiscal rules were mere words. Their credibility was shot when the Prime Minister, who was then the Chancellor, fiddled his start date for the business cycle in July 2005, immediately after the election, in order to avoid admitting that he was breaking his own fiscal rule. Empty economic rhetoric has been the Prime Minister's stock in trade for a long time. It was, after all, the Prime Minister who, as Chancellor, as late as 2007 said in the House that

"fiscal discipline is the foundation of the strength of Britain's finances."—[Official Report, 21 March 2007; Vol. 458, c. 816.]

Handing the assumptions in the Red Book to the Comptroller and Auditor General of the National Audit Office for supposed vetting was another gesture that eroded credibility. It sounded good but it was an insubstantial thing to do, as the markets soon discerned and as the Comptroller and Auditor General more or less admitted in evidence in public session in a Committee. In the end, it has only made Labour's credibility problems even worse.

I said at the beginning that the three main causes of the credibility deficit—the structural origins, the lack of transparency, and the empty rhetoric—cannot be addressed by Labour's current measures, but they can be assuaged by other practical steps. First, on the structural gap between spending and tax, the obvious answer is to set out how the gap will be plugged. That is what we have just been discussing with the Liberal Democrats.

In practice, that means explaining how public spending will be cut. It means reversing a proportion of Labour's spending binge. But Labour have done the opposite. They have announced increases in spending of £3.5 billion and they have even cancelled the spending review. That leaves a gaping hole in the credibility of Labour's overall financial policy.

Members of the Conservative Front-Bench team have been courageous in coming forward with a number of tough measures in recent announcements and have talked of an age of austerity. It is fair to say that the Conservative party has gone further than either of the other two in making a clear case for the reality of the situation—the reality that we will have years of very difficult fiscal policy before we can get overall financial policy back on an even keel.

More will need to be done by us from within Government, where I hope we soon will be, to find out the true scale of the deficit and to make it fully transparent. Then an analysis of the relevant merits of various additional measures can be done with full civil service support. I cannot stress too strongly that it is only by working with civil servants, drawing on their expertise and reviving a Whitehall culture of thrift, which has sadly been lost, that we can hope to restore Britain's public finances. The main reason for the binge was political, but a major subsidiary reason has been Labour's failure to mobilise Whitehall to the cause of the efficient use of public money.

The second point that I want to make in this respect is on the credibility of the numbers on the basis of which decisions will be taken. Have Labour really been cooking the books? Perhaps scarcely at all. Perhaps a lot. We do not know. Twenty years ago I left the Treasury and went to spend a very enjoyable year at Nuffield college, Oxford. There, among other things, I wrote a short book on public expenditure and fiscal policy. Two of the suggestions in that book, eventually published in 1996, were to create an independent national statistical office and to create a fiscal policy committee charged with the task of producing the forecast and thereby bolstering the credibility of the Government's accounts.

From the Front Bench a little over five years ago, I worked up those proposals at the request of the then shadow Chancellor, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). They were subsequently published as "The Independent Fiscal Projection Committee" and "A Framework for Statistical Independence". The Government responded to the first after the election by giving independence to the Office for National Statistics, but the second pillar of the plan was wholly ignored by the Government.

I was delighted when my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton took up the latter idea. His proposed new body, which he has called the office for budget responsibility, goes further than I proposed in 1996—a good way further—and further than my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset suggested in that document. I believe that what my hon. Friend has proposed will contribute to the economic credibility needed to reduce the deficit in one crucial respect, which he mentioned in his speech. It will put the Government at one remove from the forecasting business, with all the temptations to fiddle the forecasts that can come with that.

Those two measures that I spoke about earlier, a credible plan to reduce public spending and a credible, independent, depoliticised and verified forecast, will act on the credibility deficit. That is important because, as the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is no longer in his seat, pointed out, the credibility issue is not about mere words. It comes with a price tag, potentially huge in terms of loss of market confidence in plans to fund the deficit and service the debt stock. It is the Governor of the Bank who told us that the deficit, at nearly 13 per cent. of GDP is "truly horrendous". The debt stock will have doubled as a percentage of GDP to nearly 80 per cent. shortly, as the spokesman for the Liberal Democrats, the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) pointed out.

Even if credibility is eroded only to the extent that it represents, say, 50 basis points on debt servicing costs, we are talking about billions and billions of pounds in higher taxes or lower public spending for a generation. Even more perilously, the loss of credibility could manifest itself in a collapse in people's confidence in the currency.

Mr. Cash: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his prescience and look forward to reading the pamphlet that he produced at Nuffield college, Oxford, because it sounds very interesting. He mentioned thrift, but the issue is not just about efficiency. Does he agree that however much we develop models and look at the bond market, at credit risk and at the rest of it, until real change is made, the scale of the problem will require an adjustment on the statute book to the duties that are imposed on all public authorities? That is a serious and difficult problem, but it is one that we will have to address. We cannot go on imposing legal duties, with which local, national and public auditors are required to comply, and at the same time step up the amount of legal liability that we impose on all of those public authorities.

[Mr. William Cash]

Mr. Tyrie: My hon. Friend returns to a point that he made in an earlier intervention. I listened to it carefully, and I probably agree. The Americans deal with the same issue using their distinction between discretionary and non-discretionary funding in the federal budget.

This debate takes place against the backdrop of an election. The respective claims of the major parties on the public finances will come to the fore, and the danger is that there will be a bidding war. Each party will claim that it can do more than its opponent to tackle the deficit, with less pain than its opponent. That will not make for an enlightening election. It could lead to a further erosion in the credibility of politics and politicians, to which I alluded at the beginning of my remarks.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning my book. In it I suggested a way out of the problem—a way that might bolster rather than erode the credibility of respective claims of the parties, particularly at election times. My proposal was quite straightforward: in addition to creating a fiscal policy committee, which is similar to the proposed office of budget responsibility, I suggested that to bolster the credibility of the Government and Opposition parties' policies on tax and spending in the months prior to an election, that body should examine all their pledges and come to a view about the bottom-line effect on the deficit.

It would be quite reasonable to ask that institution to undertake that work for any party registered under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 and to publish the assumptions on which it came to its conclusions about the scale of the parties' pledges and their implications for public borrowing. If it did that it would concentrate the minds of politicians when they make exaggerated claims on economic and financial policy, especially at election time. Such a measure would raise the quality of debate in elections and of public discourse about economic matters between elections, giving the public greater confidence in the statements of politicians.

A major Opposition party might be reluctant to subject itself to such scrutiny, but what credibility would such a party have? It might supply inadequate information about its policies, thereby preventing meaningful costings to be made by the office of budget responsibility. If it did, the OBR should say so and let the electorate draw its own conclusions. At election times, such a measure is still achievable, even if things have to be done in more of a rush. The Government's costings would be largely straightforward: after all, one function of the OBR would be to have a firm grip on Government pledges. In any case, before the Government went to such a committee, they would have available to them the full resources of Whitehall in order to cost any additional pledges that they wished to unveil in their manifesto.

As for the Opposition parties, any party worth its salt and challenging seriously for power would want the credibility of its economic plans endorsed by the OBR. The party would be likely to engage with the office well before it published its manifesto, and it should be permitted to do so confidentially. In Committee I intend to table an amendment to give effect to this proposal, and I very much hope that it secures cross-party support.

The agenda of British politics has been set by Labour: it is to repay Labour's debts. That will be a huge and painful undertaking, affecting the entire British population. Labour's only hope of restoring confidence in itself would have been to set out the spending measures required to plug the deficit. That is Labour's duty, after all: it is still in government. But even if it had done so, I am not sure how much weight it would have carried with the markets or with the public at this stage, because the canker at the heart of Labour economic policy derives not just from its credibility on fiscal policy, but from a deeper collapse in confidence: confidence in the Government's ability to take any correct decisions for the country—the confidence that can, in turn, be built only on the sound foundations of economic competence.

When the economic history books are written, the writers' pens will above all linger not on the Government's intentions but on their incompetence. How was it that a Government inheriting such a strong economic legacy could have so easily squandered it? How was it that so little could have been bought with so much extra public spending? Even two years into this crisis, Labour still tries to return to the tactics of the past decade—the tried and failed tactics of rhetorical devices, which we have in this Bill, as a substitute for something solid. The Bill's title could usefully serve in one of those history books as the heading for a final chapter. It could read: "All credibility gone: the Fiscal Responsibility Bill is brought to the House." It would describe willing the end without the means and yet another addition to the catalogue of gesture politics.

The decision to postpone the spending review has been crucial. Those who argue that the Bill is merely a cheap political trick to avoid disclosing the pain that Labour would have to inflict on the electorate get at only half the truth. The Government appear to have no notion of how to implement the measures required to give effect to the good intentions of the Bill, and that is symptomatic of so much policy making over the past decade. Their response to any problem has all too often been to seek to legislate it out of existence, and, when disappointment has inevitably followed, the tendency has been to blame others, especially Whitehall officials, and the wider public service, for a so-called "failure to deliver". We have therefore had a succession of initiatives, most of them equally misguided, seeking to deal with the problem through efficiency units, a succession of studies, the tsars and so on.

Ministers hoped that those measures would compensate for Whitehall's alleged shortcomings, when the shortcomings that mattered were really much closer to home. It is the bankruptcy of ideas and, above all, of understanding how to translate intentions into action, more than the financial bankruptcy, which this Bill illustrates.

7.58 pm

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I remind the House that I have business interests with a multinational industrial company and an investment management company.

I rise to remind the House that the big financial crisis through which we have been living was in origin a crisis of borrowing too much. The Government now admit that their regulators were asleep on the watch, and that banks borrowed too much. It is clear that individuals and families borrowed too much. They felt that they had to because the erratic and expansionary monetary policy followed on both sides of the Atlantic fuelled a house-price boom and took houses and flats ever more beyond people's reasonable expectations of being able to service a mortgage. They were dragged into borrowing too much to meet those giddy house prices based on the monetary excess that the Government and their agents had unleashed.

Industry and commerce also borrowed too much, and in some cases, particularly under the private equity model, the levels of leverage for companies were very high and made it difficult for them to trade profitably and successfully. Yet the Government, who tell us that the private sector sinned and borrowed too much, now seem to believe that the way to correct the problem is for the state to borrow too much in its turn.

My first message for the Government is that we cannot solve a crisis of over-borrowing by borrowing too much in the state sector. We cannot resolve the British state finances by underwriting every bad debt and every bad loan throughout the banking system—we have to get the banks to sort it out and to take more of the hit. This Government have dragged the taxpayer and the state into accepting far too much risk and far too much debt obligation. That is why we are now on the verge of another nasty phase to this long and tragic financial crash: the phase when the state is made to realise that it is borrowing too much, and the markets and others force the state and its agents—the Government of the day—into getting their own house in order because otherwise they will find that they cannot borrow at anything like a sensible rate, if at all, or on the scale that they wish.

I think it is agreed ground between the three largest parties in this House that the deficit is too large, that it is growing too quickly, and that it needs to be controlled within the next four to five years. It seems that the principal disagreement remains between the Government and the rest of us about the timing of when to start to control borrowing. It is less painful to start to control borrowing now than to leave it for another year. It will do less damage not to have borrowed another £200 billion before deciding to give up the bad habit. If someone is an alcoholic, the time to stop drinking is today—it is not a good idea to have another year of drinking very heavily and damaging their liver. They know they have to tackle the issue, so why not start now? They may then discover that they have a longer and happier life, because there is life after alcoholism, as all those of us who are not alcoholics are pleased to report to anyone who might be in doubt.

We have to say exactly the same thing to this Government about borrowing. There is life for a Government after borrowing too much. It can be a very good life where the economy will function better, not worse—a situation where the public services are better run, not worse run, and where if they put quality, efficiency, productivity and performance into their vocabulary when managing the public services, they may well discover that they can run them better and provide more for considerably less input than the current costs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) remarked, one of the extraordinary things about this Government is how they managed to spend so much money to so little effect; that is the tragedy that we have to tackle. Unfortunately, the Bill is not the means to do that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) pointed out with great humour and aplomb in noting that it sets out to have the Treasury controlling the Treasury. Why should the Treasury need to control itself? Why can it not run self-disciplined budgets in the normal way? Why can it not use the existing mechanisms of pre-Budget reports, Budgets, forecasts and economic reports to this House to provide the discipline that is required?

I should like to pause for a little on the details of the Bill, which I hope will be substantially amended if we have to go through the rigmarole of legislating it at all. It is bizarre in its own terms and seems to be against the run of the advice that the Chancellor has regularly given us on how to run an economy in trouble. Clause 1 tells us that in has to fall compared with the preceding year. To ensure that it falls by a reasonable amount, there is the added rider in subsection (2) that it needs to halve by 2014. That means, as I reminded the Chancellor when he was here earlier, that in any given year borrowing could go up. That is even true in the period when one is trying to halve borrowing, because one could leave it all to the end and suddenly have very big cuts in the last year or do it all earlier and then have greater freedom. Because it is expressed as a proportion of income, there could be individual years when borrowing was going up, assuming that the economy was growing. Perversely, however, if in that period we had another unfortunate year when the economy was not growing, it would be necessary to reverse and to cut borrowing in cash terms. That is the exact opposite of the natural stabilisers that the Chancellor has always told us are very important, as Conservative Members have accepted. We agree that the natural stabilisers are important if one gets into a position where there is such a big fall in output as this Government have presided over. The Government should change this and come up with a formula that recognises that it is necessary to take into account the state of the economic cycle.

> "each of the…years 2011 to 2016, public sector net borrowing expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product"

The second part of clause 1 contains the most important part of the whole proposition—that borrowing should be halved as a proportion of gross domestic product. Given that under current economic policy we are not going to get much growth, that means that it is necessary, roughly speaking, almost to halve the current cash deficit, so we are talking about somewhere between £80 billion and £100 billion of spending cuts, tax increases or some combination of the two. There is always a temptation among those on the Labour Benches to believe that tax increases are the better option, but if they choose the wrong tax increases they could make the position worse. If enterprise is taxed too much, there will be less of it and they may end up with less revenue. They also like to tell themselves that if only they could at last get to grips with tax evasion and avoidance all our problems would be solved, whereas after 12 years of their trying to do that, all the evidence shows that it does not solve the problem as it is a very small part of a much bigger problem.

[Mr. John Redwood]

We cannot get away from the fact that in order to cut the deficit by this magnitude, even under a Labour Government with some strange tax plans, most of the burden would have to fall on public spending, and trying to cut public spending by £80 billion to £100 billion has proved to be difficult in the past. The Government clearly find it impossible because they have produced a Bill for the House of Commons demanding that we do this, yet there is not a single item in the supporting papers or speeches to tell us how they would achieve it. Worse than that, they have cancelled the normal public expenditure review setting out detailed plans for the future because they clearly find it too difficult, too embarrassing, or both, to have to admit that the large chunks of money that they have committed in the past are no longer affordable and perhaps discover that some of those chunks of money are indeed very wasteful.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend is making an excellent speech. Does he agree that there is another factor apart from having to review legislation, which imposes the duties to which I have referred—that is, the need to emphasise the necessity for enterprise and small businesses from which one can generate the growth that is required in order to fill the gap? After all, not one penny of public expenditure comes from anything other than the tax revenues from private enterprise, and if we do not put our emphasis on the growth of small businesses and enterprise companies, we will not be able to close the gap, which makes complete nonsense of this ridiculous Bill.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We clearly need a lot more growth; I think that that is also common ground between the main parties in this House.

The evidence of our past successes and failures as a country is very clear. When a Government have had the courage to cut the marginal rates of income tax on people of enterprise and investors and to cut the rates of profits tax and other taxes on employment in small businesses, there has been a proportionate improvement in the growth rate and an increase in the tax take from those sectors. Governments who have gone for extremely high penal rates of tax on the rich, the successful and the potential investors who might do something to improve our economy have had the reverse experience. They have discovered that growth has slowed or gone into reverse, and that lots of bright and talented people have gone abroad because they do not wish to pay such tax at all. That would be even more true today in this extremely footloose globalised world. Surely we should learn the lessons of the '70s, when Governments had high taxes and it did not work, and the '80s, when they summoned up the courage to cut the taxes and it started to work rather well with the enterprise policies that were introduced. The same has been true all around the world. Wherever a country has had the courage to set very competitive tax rates on enterprise, business, success and investment, it has found that it gets a lot more revenue in.

As I always try to tell the Labour party, the best way to tax the rich—I would like to tax the rich more as well—is to cut the tax rates, because we then have more rich people in this country who pay more tax, because it is less worth while to pay for all the accountancy advice to get around it, and venture more of their money. This morning I spoke to a successful entrepreneur who told me: "I'm on strike. I was a successful entrepreneur. I sold my company because the climate was becoming so hostile in this country. I managed to sell up before the crash. I have no intention of going back in because they're making the climate even more hostile—I'll sit on my backside and do nothing for a bit."

Mr. Pelling: I know that it is politically difficult to say that one is in favour of bringing the 50 per cent. tax rate back down, but would that not be the best approach for an incoming Conservative Government so as to encourage enterprise?

Mr. Redwood: I have made a clear statement about what I believe is the way that works best, and I trust that a future Government will be wise and will want to set competitive rates of tax on enterprise, success and rich people so that we tax them more in the way that I have described. That is clear advice that I am sure will not fall entirely on deaf ears, because it works and has worked in the past and elsewhere in the world.

In clause 1, after the extraordinary claims and strange wording that I have mentioned, we go on to be told that in due course net debt has to start to fall as a proportion of gross domestic product, but only in the final year of the period. The Chancellor effectively confirmed that the Bill is drafted in that way because the Government do not believe they have any chance of getting net debt down as a proportion of our national income until 2015-16. That could well be after the next election but one, in two Governments' time rather than one. It is remarkable that they can be that precise in thinking that that will be possible by that stage. For once, I agree with their realism that, with their policies, they will not get net debt down any time soon, and not before 2015.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) rightly pointed out that the debt is grossly understated in the figures that the Government use. The Office for National Statistics has got nearer to the truth. I have always cited a figure of £3 trillion-plus for the true level of debt and obligations of the British state. Now that the Government have gone to the aid of banks in difficult situations and allowed the pension deficits to build up so colossally, that is the kind of figure that we would come up with if the British state account were put on the basis on which the British state puts any reputable company account. I see no reason why it should be treated differently. Clause 1(3) is pretty meaningless, because the Government will clearly carry on using definitions of net debt that no one else believes. Everybody else knows that they greatly understate the position.

That brings me to another problem with the Bill. The part about interpretation, definitions and so forth is one of the slenderest that I have ever seen in a piece of legislation. I presume that that is intentional and designed so that were there to be a future Labour Government in the time period in question, they could play all sorts of games with the definitions of net borrowing and net debt if things went wrong, just as Labour played all sorts of games with the cycle and the definitions of the golden rule in its earlier years in Government. The Bill is shoddy and unacceptable because there is no professionally and internationally agreed definition of the debt and borrowing that they are trying to measure. Doubtless they would want to leave quite a lot out by anybody else's standards of financial reporting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton made mincemeat of the Treasury imposing a duty on itself and of the fact that there are absolutely no sanctions on anyone involved in this sorry charade. It is not so much a case of Ministers giving themselves a "get out of jail free" card in case something goes wrong as giving themselves a card that says that no Minister ever goes to jail or suffers any other penalty of any kind, however bad, grotesque and wrong their implementation of the policy.

The Bill is a worthless piece of paper and an unnecessary intrusion into what should be a serious debate. It will not take a trick with the bond markets in the City or with anybody in this place other than a few Labour loyalists. It is a political prank, an expensive press release. It is wasting the time of the House and it is completely unsubstantiated by any plans.

Mr. Osborne: Say what you think!

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend tries to tempt me to be a bit more outspoken, but the House knows me all too well—I am not characteristically outspoken.

I return to the divide on the timing of the reductions that the Bill requires. The Government's case is that they should delay the reductions for about another year. That is felicitous, because it will get them through the general election period and put all the burden of the cuts on to a future Government, but perhaps they actually believe what they are saying. Maybe they believe this neo-Keynesian nonsense that they have come up with that the only thing that is sustaining the economy is the excess public spending and borrowing, and if they started to reduce it now, it would plunge the economy back into a nasty recession. I have some simple questions for them about that. If all this public spending and borrowing is so good, why is our economy still in recession, as the Chancellor admitted from the Dispatch Box? Why is it the only main economy in the world that is not out of recession? As they have made so much more of the matter and are borrowing so much more as a proportion of national income than most competitor and comparable countries, one would have thought from their analysis that we would be romping out of the recession ahead of the others. Instead we have been mired in it for all too long. Let us hope that we are now coming out of it. There is evidence of some revival in the private sector, which is most welcome.

Another problem that the Government have with their punk Keynesianism is the idea that all this spending is somehow not getting in the way of borrowing and spending in the private sector, which of course it is. The only individuals and institutions in this country that can borrow on the scale that they want to at the moment are public sector ones. The Government have developed a sort of recycling machine whereby money is lent to the banks, who lend it back to the public sector, and the Bank of England prints the money just to ensure that the Government can afford to buy all the debt that they are creating to route through the public sector.

The Government have a public financing system on a merry-go-round of borrowing and buying debt, particularly using the publicly owned banks, at the expense of everybody else. The small business people I speak to in my constituency and elsewhere tell me that it is still a nightmare trying to get the borrowing that they need to carry out their business, let alone expand it. Individuals are still finding it extremely difficult to borrow money that they might want to start up a business or buy an asset that they could productively use.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): My right hon. Friend stresses the importance of small businesses, which create local jobs for people who are unemployed. Once people are employed they pay tax, which goes into the Treasury, instead of living on benefits that come out of the Treasury, so it is a double whammy and a double benefit to the Treasury and the community.

Mr. Redwood: I wish the Government would consider seriously the people who are unemployed and would like to set up a business of their own. They need access to bank credit, which they clearly do not have at the moment because of the distorted and broken banks and the regulation that is reinforcing that distortion. Those people also have a problem with the benefits system, and a good reform would be to make it easier for people to use the cover of benefit to get started. As my hon. Friend rightly says, we could then have a double win, because they would go off benefit altogether at a certain point and we would have tax revenue coming in as they started to pay themselves a salary or an income from their business. I hope that that point will be considered.

The Government are in a hole with their argument that all this public spending and borrowing is sustaining the economy, and that it would relapse without it. They have against them the problem of international comparisons, but also that of historical comparisons. If we look at recoveries from previous, rather shallower recessions in this country, we notice a certain common characteristic. Usually, the recovery got under way when the Government of the day admitted that they had a budget problem and took action to control the budget deficit through a combination of tax increases and spending cuts. In 1981, famously, quite big reductions were made in spending to curb the budget deficit, and from the day of the announcement of those cuts the economy accelerated away into one of its long and successful periods of growth. Something similar happened after the exchange rate mechanism disaster of the early 1990s. Again, it was when the Government got a grip on the deficit that we ushered in a very long period of expansion under two different parties.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in addition to the Government's historical problems, they have a current difficulty in that they seem incapable of securing the support of a single Back Bencher for the vital debate on the most pressing problem that faces this country? Only those Back Benchers who support the Opposition, not the Government, have spoken.

Mr. Redwood: That is a wise observation. Only one Labour Back Bencher is even present to hear of the Government's travails.

Stewart Hosie: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point about recovery from the 1980-81 recession. He will of course recall that, even after its technical end in 1981, unemployment continued to rise for three full years.

Mr. Redwood: That is a sad truth. All of us who lived through that were miserable about it, but it was good that we started to recover. The evidence shows that cutting public spending did not impede, but enabled the recovery. I remind Labour Members of Conservative Front Benchers' main claim on that point: we do not recommend spending cuts because we want to cut spending; we have come into politics because we want good public services—obviously, all politicians like to be involved with success in public services—but we believe that cuts are now essential because of the interest rate threat, which my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton correctly identified.

The reason that Governments had to make cuts—and, in some cases, provide for tax increases—to get out of previous recessions was that, if they had not controlled the deficit, the deficit would have controlled them. If we do not control the deficit, it will exact an extremely high price on the rest of the British economy in the form of much higher interest rates and rationed credit, when we need low interest rates for longer and a more plentiful supply of credit from the private sector to get the productive economy moving again.

Our problem is that we have a banking crisis and a crisis of over-borrowing. If we persist in over-borrowing in the public sector, we will not strengthen, but undermine or weaken the recovery. We will make progress more difficult, delay the necessary action and when the cuts—forced by market crisis, collapse of sterling or a bond crisis—eventually come, they will be more rapidly administered, more brutal and less well thought through. It is far better to plan and start to take action now so that the markets begin to say, "Ah, they are serious; they understand it. We can give them a bit of time because we now know that they want to get on with it."

If we constantly repeat, "Tomorrow, tomorrow—mañana, mañana", the markets will not believe a word we say, our interest rates will continue to rise, as they have done in the past year, and our currency will continue to fall, as it has done in the past year. The Economic Secretary appears to think that that is funny. He should wake up to the reality over which the Government are presiding. Interest rates should remain low—we do not want them driven higher by market movements. Our currency is being driven lower, and we need a floor in sterling before the situation gets out of control. I hope that the Treasury sees the need for that. It would be good if it could persuade the Prime Minister—the First Lord of the Treasury—that he also has some duties, and that he does not fulfil them by tarting up a few words as a Fiscal Responsibility Bill. He has the power to instruct the Government to start to tackle the problem.

Apart from the absence of Labour speakers, the interesting point about the Government is the absence of any commentary on how they might start to control the deficit by controlling public spending. Let me begin with an observation and then make an unpopular comment. A substantial reduction can be made in the number of people employed in the public services while delivering a good level and quality of public service in crucial areas. We currently do too many things badly. The Government have recruited another million public sector employees in the past 12 years and they have not always chosen well the roles into which to put those people. Often, they have complicated and made the process of public service delivery less efficient by over-recruiting in the wrong areas.

The first thing I would do to try to tackle the deficit is put a control on all new recruitment. Every year, 5 to 10 per cent. of public employees leave, find better offers, retire, go off to have children and do not want to return to work. That means that the work force can be reduced quite rapidly over four or five years without compulsory redundancies and the costs and disruption they bring. If one has a strongly enforced natural wastage policy, one can give one's existing public employees much better chances of promotion and career development because some posts will need filling. They tend to be more interesting and better posts, so people can be accelerated into them and that can create a better life for them. We need to control our costs and do more with less. The biggest cost throughout the public services is that of labour.

Of course, we need all the teachers, nurses, doctors and uniformed personnel that we have—I am not talking about those front-line jobs. However, most public employees are not in those jobs. We can introduce better processes, ensure that we do more with less and simplify the tasks. If we simplify the regulatory system, we need fewer regulators; if we simplify the tax and benefit system, we need fewer people clerking and administering those systems. That is what we need to do. Any company would do it when faced with the need for cuts on a proportionate scale that the Government face.

Companies do not immediately ask, "How can I cut my most important service to the public?" or, "Can I close down all my shops to show that I'm in a financial mess?" or, "Can I get rid of all the key personnel so that I can do a really bad job?" Companies ask, "Which people can I do away with so that it's least damaging to the business? To whom can I give more authority and promote, who can then do more for less? How can I win more business with fewer people?" A company has to work like that, particularly in a global marketplace. For example, every year, manufacturing companies are normally asked by their leading customers to cut their prices because of the power of global competition. They therefore have to get on with delivering more for less. They cannot do that by skimping on quality; they must also improve their quality every year, otherwise competitors will do better for less.

My unpopular point is that Members of Parliament must show that we ourselves can do what I have outlined. As I understand it, the current expenses system budgets for every Member of Parliament to have three full-time staff. I think we can do our work with two. I do not want to be unkind to current colleagues, so I believe that we should say to all new Members of Parliament that they will get an allowance for only two full-time staff. Those who are already here can carry on with three—I do not know whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, employ three staff, but I do not, so I know that the work can be done with fewer—but when one leaves, the Members should move on to the system of two full-time staff. That is a minimal sacrifice that we should make to show the public sector that more can be delivered for less. A Member of Parliament can do a perfectly good job with two rather than three staff, and that makes a contribution. Armed with that moral authority, we can then approach the big parts of the civil service and say, "Look, this is what we're doing; this is our contribution, and now we'd like you to do something similar. We don't want you to take out one in three—perhaps one in 10—but we need to act to make an impact on this huge deficit."

Let us consider pensions. Members of Parliament, unbeknown to the public and unbeloved by them, have already worsened the terms of our pension scheme for everybody who is here. We have to make bigger contributions and there has been some dilution of the benefits—rightly so because the costs were large and the deficit was getting out of control. We are therefore contributing to tackling the deficit. I think we need to go further, and to say to new MPs that like all private sector schemes, the MP scheme is closed to new Members. We have to work our way through our pension problem in exactly the same way that people are working their way through many private sector problems—they have realised that they are not affordable any more, and that they have to make cheaper arrangements for new staff. We are going to have to do the same in many public sector pension schemes that are far bigger and more important than the MP scheme, but it is important to do it first for that scheme, so that we lead by example and have some moral authority when we come to tackle the problem.

There are many other ways in which we could start to curb the deficit. I have no intention of repeating speeches that I have made in the House before and of naming individual programmes and areas of work that I would like to see discontinued, such as the identity card and regional government agenda and so forth, which we could simply abolish and scrap. I am pleased to say that there are many such schemes that could be scrapped, which would start to fight the deficit.

The issue of process is terribly important. The public sector in Britain must learn to do more for less. It must learn to raise quality every year and to cut the price every year, which is what organisations in the private sector must do year after year if they wish to be successful. It is not impossible. Indeed, one of the joys for any new Government is that they will inherit such an inefficient mess that the early improvements in efficiency will be relatively easy. It is far more difficult to take over a company that has been through 10 or 20 years of such processes because the obvious, low-hanging fruit will have been taken—as private sector people would say, the obvious inefficiencies will have been squeezed out. A new Government will have many inefficiencies to squeeze out. They will have to be bold and strong and do such things in a sensible time scale and in a way that does not disrupt the rights and loyalties of existing staff. I think that can be done, and it will begin to curb the deficit.

This afternoon and this evening is, I am afraid, a waste of time and money. Parliament stands ready to do something serious, and the Government deliver a nonsensical Bill to bind themselves or their successor in a way that is not binding and incurs no penalties. What we need is a Government who know how to run the public sector. We need a Government who understand that the world does not owe us a living and that it is moving on rapidly. We need a Government who understand that industry and Governments elsewhere are far more efficient and smart, and far more able to do more for less. This Government seem not to understand that.

If we do not wake up soon, we could have a currency crisis, a bond crisis and a public financing crisis. We might then have a public sector management crisis because cuts done in panic, on a big scale and too quickly, could be very damaging. If we put the processes in place now, we might start to get confidence back and we would begin to curb the deficit earlier, which is what we need to do.

8.31 pm

Ms Katy Clark (North Ayrshire and Arran) (Lab): It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to contribute to this debate. I suspect that many of the speeches that we have heard so far will be the kind of thing that we will be hearing in debates over the coming months as we go towards the general election.

I will not be able to support the Government in a Division on Second Reading this evening, but for very different reasons than those others have outlined. I agreed with much of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said. He made a powerful speech and articulated very clearly the scale of cuts that we are facing, which I do not think the British people really appreciate at the moment.

In his helpful contribution, my right hon. Friend highlighted one powerful issue that we need to be aware of: the influence of market. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and a number of others on the official Opposition Benches spoke about the influence of the market on decisions that Governments will make over the coming period, but the irony, which seems to have been lost, is that the markets put us in this position—there was a failure to regulate, but a completely irresponsible approach by the free market put us in this situation. In my view, the Government had no alternative but to take the type of action that they have taken in the past two to three years. The Chancellor was correct that there was no alternative to taking banks into public ownership and bailing them out, and to the fiscal stimulus.

One problem is that there is an over-skewing of our economy in favour of the financial sector. In Britain, much of the financial stimulus has gone towards the financial sector. Our manufacturing base has not had the type of financial injection it has had in some other countries. Perhaps they did not go through some of the experiences that we had in the 1980s and 1990s, when we saw the demise of so many traditional industries and the flourishing of the City and the financial sector. Obviously, at times, that has had benefits for us. I am not in any way trying to minimise the huge financial input that the City and the financial sector have had into this country, but they have put us in difficult situations in the recent period.

I cannot support the Bill because of the scale of public sector cuts that will be required if it is implemented. I am simply not willing to vote to cut essential services for some of the poorest people in this country. We need to have a massive debate not only on why we got into this situation and how we ensure that it does not happen again, but on how we deal with the deficit that we face. In peacetime, Britain has never before faced such a deficit. We have only had to deal with such situations during times of war.

I do not defend every penny that the public sector spends. Anyone with an ounce of sense realises that the public sector does not do everything in the most efficient way, and some things could be done more cheaply, although in some cases more money needs to be spent to provide a better service.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Lady says that she supported bank nationalisation. Does she think that it was right to put huge sums of money into very expensive subsidies to banks but not into failing industrial or retail businesses?

Ms Clark: Each situation needs to be looked at on its merits. With the banking sector, there was no alternative, because if the banks had collapsed, the economic situation would have been much worse, given that the economy depends on them. I would have welcomed greater support from the Government for the manufacturing sector, and I will support any such provision in the times to come. The retail sector is in a slightly different situation. There is a long-term argument for retaining a steel industry and other parts of the manufacturing sector, because we will rely on them in years to come. Once we lose those sectors, they will be very difficult to recreate. Those of us from the north and Scotland—the more industrialised areas—know of the proud industrial traditions of this country. We were at the forefront of manufacturing and development, but that is no longer the case in many sectors of the economy.

The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) talked about substantial reductions in public sector jobs. If we are to follow the advice of all the Front-Bench teams, especially of the official Opposition, we will see substantial cuts in public sector employment, which will have massive economic implications, especially in those parts of the country that are more heavily reliant on public sector jobs. As has been pointed out, if jobs are lost in the private sector, tax revenue is lost and we no longer have the benefit of the production by that individual. But the same is true in the public sector. There is a huge cost to the state in the loss of employment in the public sector and, at a time when we have to be alert to the risk of growing unemployment, any solution that involves cuts in public sector jobs is a very short-term approach.

In recent months we have had much debate about the possibility of a double-dip recession, and that is a genuine risk. It is difficult to predict when we can start to consider how to reduce the deficit, and that is one reason why I feel it would not be helpful for any Government to have the restraints in the Bill placed on them. No Government, of any political persuasion, would have been able to predict some of the economic experiences that we have had in the past three years. As a Labour MP, I do not want to see my Government constrained in that way. I want Ministers to be able to respond to events, use their judgment and do everything that they can to protect the British economy and the British people. Therefore, as a matter of principle, I am not convinced that a Bill is the most helpful approach.

However, the real reason why I feel unable to support public spending cuts of this nature is the types of cuts that they will likely mean to some essential services. I have voted against various Government proposals that have amounted to substantial public expenditure, including Trident replacement and the identity cards scheme, and I believe that there will be a range of other Government initiatives, such as the NHS computerisation programmes, that perhaps we should look at as well.

I am not saying that there are not areas of public spending that very legitimately we need to look at. Of course, we are currently embroiled in overseas armed conflict. I have never voted in the House on those issues because there have not been any votes since I was elected in 2005, but before I became an elected representative in this place I marched against those conflicts. We need to have a serious discussion about our society's priorities and values. My concern about the Bill is that yet again the poor will pay the price when those who have the power and run the show make mistakes. Bizarrely, over the past one and a half to two years, the debate has gone from being about the mistakes made by those running the banks to how we can most effectively and severely cut public spending, and of course it will be my constituents and those of every Member in this House who will pay the price.

I understand the reasons for the Government's stance. However, over the coming months we must be extremely careful in our approach towards the public sector, particularly education, health and the other essential public services on which the most vulnerable in society rely. Many of those services have been fought for by individuals and communities generation after generation, and if we start down the path of closing community halls, libraries and other services, they will not come back easily. I would like injected into this debate a discussion about not just cuts, but our society's values, and we need to say very clearly that it is not those at the bottom of the heap who have got us into this mess. As we move forward, we must also say that it is our role as elected representatives to ensure that they are not the people who pay the price.

8.42 pm

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I do not want to repeat what anyone else has said, but this is a profoundly pointless piece of legislation, because one would have imagined that the job of any Government at any time would have been to ensure fiscal responsibility and sound public finances all the time. One would not imagine that the Government would need a law to tell them to do that, and certainly not a law that will enshrine on the statute book, if it gets that far, deep and savage cuts—cuts that this Labour Government have already planned. An £800 million budget cut has already been announced for Scotland.

Only this Government, I suspect, could be so foolish as to lay out very broad and deep public spending cuts before we have a sustained and sustainable economic recovery from the recession. Only this Government, I suspect, would carve them into stone on the statute book, at a stroke sucking out the consumption and demand that has propped up the economy in the past little while and which is almost certainly necessary to ensure a further and sustainable economic recovery.

At its heart, the Bill is also dishonest. Although it is fundamentally about deep cuts—as I said, an £800 million cut to the Scottish budget has already been announced—the Government have refused to publish or carry out a comprehensive spending review. That means that we do not yet know the implications for every single one of the UK's spending Departments. We are therefore having this debate in a vacuum, without knowing the implications for ordinary people and ordinary services or for the economy more widely—the very point that the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) made. It may be those at the bottom of the pile who will pay the price for this Government's economic failure.

The absence of both a comprehensive spending review and an understanding of what the cuts really mean make a mockery of the explanatory notes. The hon.

Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne), who speaks for the Liberals, mentioned this earlier, but paragraph 31 says:

> "There are no significant financial effects of the Bill."

He seemed to agree with that, but I disagree entirely. There are massive financial implications for every UK spending Department and, potentially, for almost every piece of public investment. There are also implications for, in the first instance, the incomes of tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of public sector employees who will lose their jobs and, in the second instance, private sector employees, as expenditure in local communities is reduced, as the cuts begin to bite on public sector income and the spending power in local communities. There are also massive financial implications arising from the increased social protection costs as people are paid off as a direct consequence of the cuts.

Do the Government not understand that it was only increased Government consumption—up 2.2 per cent. last year, at a time when household expenditure fell by 3.6 per cent., when total business investment was down by 22 per cent. and when gross fixed capital formation was down by 17 per cent.—that kept the economy afloat at all? Do they not understand that to begin the process of deep and savage cuts now, before the private sector has the confidence to spend and invest, and when credit for businesses and individuals remains incredibly difficult or expensive, is economically stupid? That is the economics of the madhouse. The measures—the Labour cuts—therefore not only put faltering economic recovery at risk but, as the hon. Lady said in her speech, run the risk of pushing the economy into a double-dip recession, which is something that I know the Treasury is concerned about. I am therefore at a loss to explain why they are introducing the measures today.

As an aside, I am also at a loss to say where the Chancellor is. There were only two, very modest financial measures in the Queen's Speech: the Financial Services Bill and the Fiscal Responsibility Bill. Both are small and modest—indeed, this one really does not matter—yet the Chancellor is not even here to listen to this short debate, on one of only two financial measures in the Queen's Speech.

Before embarking on this political dividing line of a Bill—that is all it is—this Labour Government should have learned the lessons of fairly recent history: the recessions of the 1980s and 1990s. The recessions of 1980-81 and 1990-91 lasted for five quarters. This recession has already lasted for six. The declines in GDP then were 4.7 and 2.5 per cent. respectively. This recession has already taken our GDP down by 5.9 per cent. The economy took two full years after the technical end of those earlier recessions to reach the point at which the GDP recovered to pre-recession levels. As I said earlier to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), it took three years before unemployment stopped rising after the technical end of the recession in 1981 and two full years before it stopped rising after the technical end of the recession in 1991. In the absence of the clarity that a comprehensive spending review would give, the scale of the cuts envisaged by the Bill and the PBR run the risk of replicating, or worse, the human cost, as well as the economic danger, of the 1980s and 1990s recessions.

I have been a critic of the deficit and the debt levels since before the recession and before the banking crisis. Going into the recession, I said that there was nothing in the tank, because our debt at that point was around £500 billion and due to rise. I want the deficit and the debt to be reduced, but there are alternatives to what the Government propose in the Bill. When the New Zealand Government introduced their Fiscal Responsibility Act 1994, they did so on the basis of five important principles. I shall go through them briefly. The first was that Government debt would be reduced to a "prudent" level. That principle acknowledged that the existing level of Government debt was too high—as it is here—and that the Government needed to run operating budget surpluses for a period of time to reduce the outstanding debt and the annual deficits. They talked about a "prudent" level, not about an arbitrary 50 per cent. cut in order to be able to afford an artificial political dividing line.

The second principle was that, once debt was reduced to a prudent level, the New Zealand Government would seek to maintain a balanced budget on average over the medium to long term. They did not seek to do so over one economic cycle, in which the Government would change the start and end dates to make the cycle fit the numbers, or over a single Parliament. They sought to achieve their aim using an average over the medium to long term. That was very sensible. If the Government here were to adopt that principle, they would still be able to invoke counter-cyclic measures in the midst of an ongoing debt and deficit reduction programme, if we were to hit a further significant downturn. The automatic stabilisers would kick in safely, and we would have the ability to use fiscal stimulus measures, if they were required, while we stuck to a medium to long-term objective of bringing the debt and deficit down to a prudent level.

The third principle was that the New Zealand Government would achieve and maintain a level of net worth that provided a buffer against unforeseen future factors. That principle recognised that factors other than explicit Government debt—such as public service pension liabilities or bank deposit insurance such as the asset protection scheme—have an impact on the fiscal position.

The fourth principle was that the Government would manage fiscal risks prudently. That called for attention to be paid to all fiscal risks, such as shifts in the demographic structure of the population and off-balance sheet state guarantees. This Bill, however, is a blunt measure to camouflage risky and damaging cuts, and it says nothing about prudent financial management.

The fifth principle was that the Government would pursue policies that were consistent with a reasonable degree of predictability in regard to the level and stability of tax rates for future years. That principle recognised the importance of tax stability for private sector planning and growth. Although this Bill is called the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, it says nothing about the important matter of tax stability.

Whether the Bill is passed or not, we might have a Budget in the spring. On the "Andrew Marr Show", the Prime Minister said that that could happen

> "if it's the right time", which was meaningless nonsense to avoid saying yes or no. There might be a Budget in the spring, but there will be no time for a Finance Bill to consider its tax implications. There will almost certainly be an emergency Budget closer to the summer, but that will cause further uncertainty and delay. We are already seeing further tax rises, more tax changes and more tax uncertainty, all of which risk discouraging the investment that we need in order to grow the economy. Growing the economy is the real key to tackling the deficit and ending the debt, but the Bill says precisely nothing about that.

[Stewart Hosie]

I heard the Chancellor's rhetoric earlier, but when I looked at the Bill, I wondered whether he was talking about the same piece of legislation. I also wondered, when I heard him justifying some of the measures, whether he was on speaking terms with the Prime Minister, who said on 10 June last year that > "you cannot cut your way out of the recession".

On 21 October, the Prime Minister said:

> "The only way forward for this economy at the moment is to maintain the fiscal stimulus".—[Official Report, 21 October 2009; Vol. 497, c. 906.]

In The Daily Telegraph on 25 October, he said that > "it would be suicidal to put recovery at risk by suddenly cutting".

Then, on 28 October, he said:

> "What sense does it make to withdraw the fiscal stimulus now…?"—[Official Report, 28 October 2009; Vol. 498, c. 279.]

He is, of course, the Prime Minister of the only serious economy in the world that does not have a fiscal stimulus package any more. As recently as 2 December, he railed against those who wanted "immediate and savage" cuts that would prevent Britain from recovering from the recession, yet that is precisely what the Bill and the pre-Budget report will achieve. It is precisely what the noble Lord Mandelson was referring to at the Press Gallery lunch in July, when he warned of austerity "for the next decade". When I hear the Chancellor and other Labour figures railing against so-called Tory austerity for a decade, I am reminded of the noble Lord Mandelson warning against Labour austerity for the next decade. The Herald reported accurately—I was there at the lunch—that

> "Lord Mandelson has raised the prospect of an age of austerity in Britain under Labour, with spending cuts… running right the way through to 2020."

What we are seeing today is the enabling legislation to do that.

The Government appear to be determined to risk economic recovery by withdrawing the lifeblood from the economy before we have a sustained and sustainable recovery. I believe that they will pay the price for that at the ballot box, but that will be of little comfort to the hundreds of thousands of ordinary people who will pay the real price for Labour's economic failure and this inflexible Bill.

I want to see the deficit and the debt cut, but I want to see that done from a position of a sustained and a sustainable economic recovery. I conclude my remarks by saying that if anyone thinks that tackling the deficit and then the debt will be difficult from a position of sustained and sustainable recovery—and it will be; there will be tough choices to make—it will be absolutely impossible from a position of faltering recovery or a double-dip recession or one that will require the kind of swingeing cuts that other Members have spoken about, made in a knee-jerk and panicked way. That is something that none of us wants to see.

I tell the Government that we will oppose the Bill today and bring forward amendments in future stages. The attempt to tackle the deficit and the debt must be done in a flexible way that protects genuine front-line services and allows the deficit and the debt actually to be reduced from a position of real growth, rather than having the whole economy butchered simply to create an idiotic dividing line between two parties in the run-up to an election that the Prime Minister does not even have the guts to call.

8.57 pm

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): I congratulate the hon. Members for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) and for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) on breaking the ice on the consensus in the debate on this cold winter evening. It is important to talk about the economic implications of the Bill.

In reality, what we have seen over the last 18 months or so has been a socialisation of the bad debts that were created on the banking books as a result of huge leverage and excess capacity within the debt markets, making it inevitable that the Government would transfer those debts into the public sector. It would have been completely irresponsible for any Government not to have acted in that way. In respect of the current Bill, however, running down that socialisation of bad debt in a compulsory fashion could lead to very significant economic damage for our country.

The dangers of having a double-dip recession are real. My own professional experience involved spending a great deal of time working for Japanese financial companies, but the last thing I would like to see is our country suffering the 20 years of economic turpitude that that country has faced. If we take away the ability to use proper fiscal stimulation, there may well be real problems.

There are many clouds over the economy. VAT is going to increase, for example, and internationally, US housing is still in great difficulties. Only last week, the US Government found it necessary to give another bail-out to GMAC. There are weaknesses in other economies. French consumer confidence was unexpectedly down today, while there are tremendous weaknesses among our European partners, particularly in Ireland and Spain. We must also remember that for our own economy, manufacturing production is down almost 11 per cent.—10.8 per cent.—over last year and the service economy has contracted by 4 per cent.

In considering the Bill, we should bear in mind the tremendous fragility in our economy. Many pressures—well-meaning pressures—were exerted for banks to be required to put a significant amount of extra capital on to their books, but in the coming years that would inevitably result in continuing severe restrictions on the ability of private sector banks to give stimulative support to our economy, and in such circumstances it is important to maintain full fiscal discretion.

There are real questions to be asked about whether quantitative easing is an appropriate tool, but there is no doubt that if we withdrew it, the need for fiscal stimulation would become ever more important. We must bear in mind just how significant the removal of credit from the economy has been as a result of the financial crisis. A substantial amount of that credit came from financial organisations that were not banks. There was a heavy reliance on short-term borrowing from the financial markets—perhaps, in the UK economy, the equivalent of £240 billion of credit stimulation. The £200 billion of heavy gilt issuance represents only one part of meeting the amount of credit creation that has been withdrawn from our economy, and a severe reduction in fiscal stimulation could lead to significant troubles for it.

Much reference has been made to history in today's debate. Members have mentioned, for instance, the crisis that followed the post-war period. It should be remembered that the success of the recovery in Europe was the result of a considerable fiscal stimulus on the part of our United States partners in terms of the recapitalisation of Europe. Members were making false assumptions when they cited that period to justify significant reductions in fiscal spending now.

I think that the danger of a crisis in the bond markets has been greatly exaggerated, in terms of their ability to absorb significant issuance of United Kingdom Government debt. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) recalled that in the 1980s the Swedish Finance Minister greatly resented having to come to speak to young people in the City, and to justify why people should buy Swedish debt. I was one of those young people in the 1980s, although I am less young now.

There is no doubt that the power of the bond markets is very important. I remember a senior financial official in the Reagan Administration saying that if he were to be reincarnated he would want to be reincarnated as the bond markets, such was their influence and strength at the time. I believe that, particularly if there is a significant reduction in Government spending, banks will be keen to buy issuance from Government—they are being pushed in that direction by regulatory change—but if we move too quickly to remove fiscal stimulation, the only productive area in which banks will invest will be gilts, because the return from them will be significantly higher than that provided by other potential investments or lending in the United Kingdom economy.

If I wanted to be particularly controversial, I would say that the UK Government's triple A rating does not really exist any longer within the capital markets, as the credit level is treated as being below that. There is a danger in us, as politicians, regarding that as absolutely totemic. This is obviously a matter of great historical departure—other than, potentially, on some war bonds, our country has never defaulted—but being rated double A-plus would not be such a severe challenge. Many other G7 countries have gone through such change.

The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) made the most pertinent point when he said that the debate is also about our credibility as politicians. Legislating to deliver a promise weakens the position of politicians because it implies, or even states, that any other promise that politicians give which is not backed by legislation is inevitably of a lower calibre. This highlights the way in which politics has become so debased that legislation comes to the House purely on the merits or demerits of making a particular point with the media.

Unfortunately, as the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran has pointed out, the type of restriction involved could be very severe in terms of public services dislocation and the lack of discretion that politicians would have in future. I cannot see the sense in both of the main political parties, which have for so long emphasised that they like the flexibility that this country enjoys because it is not part of the euro, wanting to move on and suggest that our country can do well and prosper if our politicians are straitjacketed by a restriction on their future discretion to make judgments about appropriate economic policy. In reality, if we needed, through economic policy, to have a higher rate of fiscal stimulus than that required by the tapered approach to reduction in the annual public deficit, we would probably—as has happened in the past to meet the European 3 per cent. of gross domestic product borrowing requirements—have a system of obfuscation and using different means of private finance initiative to hide real Government borrowing. As a result, we would end up further undermining our credibility as politicians. We should have the confidence to be straightforward with the electorate about the requirements of Government and about our finances.

I agree strongly with the comments that my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) made in an intervention on the Chancellor. It seems reasonable that the approach to politicians' pay should be the same as that in the private sector. If the Government are determined to put the Bill through Parliament, and if they think it is important, perhaps there should be performance-related payments for the Chancellor if he hits targets. Let the Bill have real bite if they think it is important. There is no point in passing legislation with no sanction or incentive of any kind for the Chancellor regarding the proposals.

Let me address the Opposition's amendment. Initially, I decided not to support it because I think it is important that politicians should feel that they can deliver results by their actions rather than through legislation or the setting up of alternative quangos. However, I think that the amendment is written in such a way that there is sufficient flexibility to allow those of us who are not members of the Conservative parliamentary party to support it. In particular, this House would be strengthened if the opportunity were taken to set up an independent Budget office, similar to the one in Congress, to look at how the Government are performing their fiscal and debt management.

Such a body would revitalise this place's ability to hold the Government to account about their finances. This House's inability to do that on taxation issues has been a long and unfortunate tradition in this House, although the Public Accounts Committee has done extremely well in its endeavours to look at whether Government money is well spent.

In conclusion, this Bill will place our country and politicians in such a fiscal straitjacket that our very prosperity will be put at risk, and it is being done on a mere whim. The Government are playing to the media, and trying to create false division lines between the two main parties represented in this Chamber.

9.11 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I am pleased to have an opportunity to contribute to this debate, on what is the first parliamentary day of the new decade. It is also the first parliamentary day of the final year of this Parliament and, I hope, of this Government. Change will undoubtedly come this year, in that it has to be an election year.

As previous speakers have noted, the election is at the heart of this Bill. That observation has not been confined to politicians in this Chamber, as it has been made by outside commentators as well. In its commentary on the pre-Budget report, Goldman Sachs wrote:

[Mr. Philip Dunne]

> "The UK press has concluded that the relatively slow pace of tightening, which doesn't begin in earnest until 2011, reflects politics more than economics—there's a general election next spring."

We will have to wait and see whether Goldman Sachs is right about the spring, but the sentiment reflects what the Bill is all about.

I want to add my voice to those who have spoken in the debate and declared this to be an utterly feeble Bill. The only support for it has come from those [illegible] the Government Front Bench. It is one of the thinnest pieces of legislation that I have seen since I arrived in the House nearly five years ago, and it has quite properly been ridiculed—by the shadow Chancellor in particular, but also by every speaker other than the Chancellor himself.

No other issue is more significant, or a greater plank in the Government's own election planning, than sorting out the public finance deficit that this country faces after 13 years of Labour mismanagement. There is no bigger issue facing the country, or for voters to consider at the coming election. No difference between the Government and the Opposition is more striking than their respective approaches to dealing with this matter: the Government are clearly divided, and the Opposition are clearly united.

We could not have illustrated that better had we, as the potential Government in waiting, planned today's debate and set out the approach to be taken by Labour Members to supporting their own Government's legislation. They have not followed that approach. I said earlier that, apart from the Chancellor's, only one speech had been made from the Labour Benches, but now there have been two. Both speakers have said, in terms and at the outset of their remarks, that for very different reasons they would not be supporting the Bill.

There has not been a single speech in support of the Bill. That shows more clearly than we could ourselves the truth of the shadow Chancellor's allegation in his remarks that there is division at the heart of Government over how to tackle the deficit. As we have all acknowledged, I think, that is the critical issue that the country faces at present.

So given that lack of interest, I have to ask why the Government business managers have decided to rush the Bill through the Committee stages on the Floor of the House. The obvious answer may be that they need to get the Bill through quickly to have it on the statute book ahead of a general election, which may be called in early or late spring. But that is too simplistic an answer to my question. I think the simple fact is that the Bill will not be handled in Committee, where evidence sessions could be taken, because the Government are incapable of finding anyone to call as a witness to support the Bill. The evidence sessions would merely give grist to the mill of the Government's opponents on their own Back Benches and on the Conservative Benches in pointing out what a perfectly frivolous and ludicrous piece of legislation we have before us. In short, we are not dealing so much with solutions to a credit crunch. The Government are trying to deal with solutions to a credibility crunch.

The Government have form on the issue of fiscal stability. In his famous, or should I say infamous, Mansion House speech in 1997 the present Prime Minister, then Chancellor, set out his fiscal rules—his first attempt to provide an aura of credibility for his approach to the public finances. He said:

> "We will introduce tough rules for government borrowing."

A year later, he told us:

> "I will never let the deficit get out of control. We will not spend money we have not earned."

Well, we all know what happened to those fiscal rules. The goalposts were moved as soon as it looked like they might be missed.

The commentators at the Institute for Fiscal Studies spelt out in their 2007 Budget briefing:

> "The perception that the Chancellor has moved the goal posts and has delayed the tax raising measures and cuts in spending plans that we and other independent commentators had been saying would be necessary until after the 2005 election undermines the credibility of the fiscal framework."

The measures were obviously dropped.

What is the impact of that lack of credibility when it comes to dealing with the current state of the public finances? We have heard from other speakers this evening about the impact within the market. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) drew analogies with the run-up to the second world war, clearly with an eye to securing an impact in the media. The impact of the lack of credibility is extremely significant. It is not just the credit rating agencies, which have put the UK sovereign debt on informal credit watch. It is not just the market commentators, who are saying that the Bill will do nothing seriously to address the debt-to-GDP ratios, which must fall faster. The Governor of the Bank of England himself has said that the deficit needs to be reduced much faster than is proposed in the Bill.

Apart from the commentators, the markets themselves are telling us that we are getting perilously close to an apocalyptic scenario. Let us look at the three market measures that are most regularly used to compare this country's public debt with that of our international comparators. We can see that the UK is in a perilous position. In the gilt market—which includes the impact of currency, so the measure is not the most directly relevant—the yield on medium-term gilt is up 43 basis points since 1 December 2009. There has been a similar increase in the US, yet in Germany the figure has risen by less than half over that period.

We can look at inflation-linked bonds, which remove the differences in inflation between countries. Since 1 December 2009, UK medium-term inflation-linked bonds have risen by 23 basis points to almost 3 per cent.—2.96 per cent.—which indicates an inflation risk over the risk-free rate.

Mr. Pelling: Is some of that movement in basis points to do with the market discounting the heavy prospective issuance of debt that is coming, particularly in the US and the UK? Reference was made earlier to PIMCO, which has invested heavily in Government bonds and has taken the view that the UK and the US are particularly difficult investments at this time.

Mr. Dunne: That helps to explain the differential rates in different countries. I am trying to draw out the significant increase since this Bill was first referred to in the pre-Budget report, to show that the markets have no faith in it as a means of trying to reduce the public finance black hole the country finds itself in.

The third measure is credit default swaps, which take out the currency risk because they indicate the premium this country would have to pay should it raise debt in other currencies. Here again, the issue is stark. The UK credit default swap rate today is 83 basis points, up 12 since 1 December 2009, whereas in Germany the rate is only 26 basis points and has risen by three since 1 December. We have had an increase of four times more than that in Germany, and we have a credit default rating twice that of the United States.

Where does that place the UK when competing for finance internationally to fund our deficit? A table helpfully produced by the House of Commons Library showing 2009 Government borrowing as a proportion of gross domestic product for OECD countries rates the UK as third worst. Only the economies of Iceland and Greece are in a more precarious position, and the country that is closest to the UK is Ireland. We have all seen what has happened to their borrowing costs and the stark action that has had to be taken by all three of those countries to bring their public finances under control. The UK sits right in the middle of that bunch.

Quite apart from the challenges of funding the Government's spending over the coming years, given the public finance position we are in, the other significant worry is the impact the increase in rates will have on the rest of the economy—the whole private sector, whose borrowing costs are also priced off the so-called risk-free sovereign rating. There is no question but that the volume of Government debt is not allowing private sector credit spreads to contract. The simplest indicator is the continued wide spread of new mortgages. It is not the supply of credit to the household sector that is so much of a problem, but the price. The Government need to recognise that their action in failing to get to grips with the state of the public finances is spilling over and restraining growth in the private sector of the economy that they are so keen to support.

The Government's credibility is the key to understanding whether the Bill has any prospect of achieving success. We have heard from many other speakers this evening that the Government have no credibility when it comes to forecasting either their debt levels or GDP growth. The track record for their debt forecasting was well demolished by my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor. As he said so clearly, in every Budget or pre-Budget report from the Chancellor and his predecessor, there has been a claim for debt reduction over a four-year period—as envisaged in the Bill—yet not once has it been achieved.

On the forecasting track record for GDP growth, the pre-Budget report assumes, first, that the economy will recover in a more dramatic fashion than we have experienced in any previous recession. Secondly, it assumes a consistency in growth rates that is unprecedented on two counts. It assumes a 3.25 per cent. increase in GDP for the four years starting next year. This is not only above the trend rate that the Government have presided over throughout the past 13 years, but it is a greater and more sustained increase than in any comparable four-year period of the Blair/Brown chancellorship. One can only assume that those forecasts were optimistic.

My final point on the credibility of the Government in their approach to the Bill relates to their actions. The Bill does nothing to restore faith in the Government's competence in administering the economy or to restore faith in the Treasury's competence. Let us take a recent example of Treasury competence to see whether the current Treasury team are the right people to monitor the reductions in the deficit envisaged in the Bill. Let us take the issue of the bank bonuses.

At the time of the pre-Budget report, the Government announced that they wished to get a grip on bank bonuses. Their objective, which was widely shared across the House, was to extend the period of deferral of bonuses to bank executives in particular, to ensure that they were not motivated to bet the bank's balance sheet, to put it crudely. Let us take as an example the largest financial institution over which the Government have some direct influence—the Royal Bank of Scotland, where the taxpayer is the largest shareholder.

The Government have proposed a bonus scheme for executives at the Royal Bank of Scotland that envisages payments over a three-year period—50 per cent. in year one, 25 per cent. one year later, and 25 per cent. a year after that. That is, broadly speaking, more generous than the current market norm, where deferred bonuses are typically paid equally in three instalments, rather than loaded to year one. Leaving that criticism aside, the other issue that the Government have completely failed to take into account when considering introducing a deferral scheme to Royal Bank of Scotland is that a large proportion of the senior executives at RBS who are transacting in the markets and who are therefore eligible for bonuses are former ABN bankers—the very bank that got RBS into the perilous state that it is in.

If we look at the bonus scheme that applied to those bankers—the current RBS executives who were formerly ABN AMRO executives—the Government's proposed bank bonus deferral scheme, far from extending the period over which they get paid their bonuses, will actually reduce it. Their scheme had a four-year deferral provision, whereas the proposed scheme has a three-year deferral. Not only have the Government introduced a more generous scheme in the one company over which they have some direct control, but they have exposed an issue in relation to the Bill—that is, what happens to a Government Minister who makes such a mess of an area for which they are responsible, such as the bank bonus deferral that I have just described?

What sanctions apply? Will such a Minister be fired or moved on? Who knows? That is highly unlikely. In this Bill no sanctions at all are proposed in the event that one of the targets is missed. As Martin Wolf suggested in the Financial Times to add to the ridicule of the Bill, a future Chancellor who failed to meet the targets might be sent to the tower of London. What chance of this Chancellor or the Minister accepting that as a suitable sanction in the event of failure of the Bill? Perhaps she might be able to tell us.

9.29 pm

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): This has been a somewhat curious debate. I do not know whether there has been a precedent for such a Bill. The Bill was at the heart of the Prime Minister's party conference speech in 2009; it was the flagship economic Bill in the Queen's Speech; and it is the centrepiece of the Government's economic strategy to reduce the deficit. However, I wonder whether we have ever had such a Bill, because it has attracted not a single voice of support from Back Benchers on Second Reading.

[Mr. David Gauke]

I suppose that the Government might have hoped that in a time of crisis the country would unite around them as they set out to address the problem, but as it happens the Bill has managed to unite the House in opposition. The fact is that we have had only two contributions from Labour Back Benchers in the debate. I do not know where the rest of the parliamentary Labour party are tonight—they may be plotting, once again, if the rumours that have been reported this evening are true—but not one Labour Back Bencher could be prevailed upon to speak in support of the Bill.

Instead, we have had from Back Benchers a series of critical contributions. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and his hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) took somewhat different perspectives on the Bill, but they both opposed it. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) from the Scottish nationalists, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) from the independents, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friends the Members for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) were all critical, too. Almost any speaker this evening could have uttered the words that we have heard used to describe the Bill, including "profoundly pointless", "frivolous", "a political prank", "an expensive press release" or "mere words", but we have not heard any words of support for the Bill.

Let us imagine the scene in the Treasury last year as preparations were made for the pre-Budget report. The public finances are in ruins and we are borrowing more than at any time in our peacetime history. For every £4 spent by the Government, £1 is borrowed. We are borrowing more than any other G20 country. The CBI, the International Monetary Fund, the OECD and the Governor of the Bank of England are all calling for a credible plan to reduce the deficit. The credit rating agencies have started to express their concerns about the UK's triple A rating, and the risks of failing to set out a credible plan are becoming clear in the markets, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow so clearly set out. We even have the example of Greece, one of two OECD countries borrowing more than the UK, where confidence has been lost and it costs them an extra 2.5 per cent. on interest rates to clear Government debt. It is plain that without a credible plan, mortgage rates may go up and businesses will find credit hard to secure.

The challenge that the Treasury faced at the time of the PBR was to restore fiscal credibility, and what did we get—a clear acknowledgement of the scale of the crisis, details of departmental spending in the years ahead, a general sense of direction on how the deficit would be reduced, or even just policies to improve the dismal and discredited forecasting record of the Treasury? No, we got this Bill: a Bill that sets out targets but no enforcement mechanism—no sanctions if they are breached. That is not a credible response; it is a distraction policy.

Mr. Redwood: Has my hon. Friend noticed that neither Labour Back Bencher who spoke in the debate has returned to the Chamber for the winding-up speeches as is traditional? Does he share my concern that the Labour Whips may be dealing with them at the moment—trying to re-educate them?

Mr. Gauke: I am grateful for that intervention. I look forward to reading on tomorrow's blogs reports of the mobile phone conversation in which the Government's Chief Whip explains exactly what he is going to do. I believe that he has a habit of making such phone calls on trains.

This Bill is a distraction policy. The idea that the existence of a target somehow provides credibility in itself is ridiculous, even if it is a target devised by the people who brought us, and broke, the golden rule. I suppose that we should be grateful that there is some acknowledgement of the credibility problem, given that the Prime Minister is currently going through one of his bouts of total denial as to the need to address public spending in this area, but that is very little comfort.

Let us not ignore the intellectual confusion at the heart of the Bill, which has been brought out by several speakers, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham and the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran—we hope that she is safe. It is not often, I suspect, that those two Members agree on much. Nevertheless, the point has to be made.

In the past couple of years, the Government have argued that nothing could be done to reduce the deficit until the recovery was well under way; that notwithstanding the record levels of borrowing, fiscal policy could continue to be used to counteract the recession; and that it was appropriate to have a discretionary fiscal stimulus through a temporary cut in VAT. Now, however, we have a Bill that means that from 2011 to 2016 borrowing must fall year in, year out, regardless of the economic circumstances and where we are in the economic cycle. Never mind the discretionary fiscal stimulus—this could preclude even the use of the automatic stabilisers, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham pointed out. Does that mean that the Government now believe that we have borrowed so much, and will continue to do so; that we do not have room for manoeuvre; and that once we are through a general election the fiscal levers will not be available for at least six years?

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend recognise the problem that I have presented to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark)? All three of us have argued for a long time that the Government's figures on net debt are simply not true. They are not giving the real picture to the British people, and they are not even giving the picture that the Office for National Statistics has given.

Mr. Gauke: My hon. Friend raises an important point. One of the benefits of an office for budget responsibility would be that we could provide some credibility in exactly that area.

If, as the Bill implies, it will not be possible to use the fiscal levers from 2011 to 2016, that would appear to signal the complete collapse of the Government's position, which is that fiscal levers are a very important element of what a Government can do. One might ask why the born-again Keynesians on the Labour Benches will be walking through the Lobby in support of the Bill given that that is what it says, as they would know if they actually read it. To be fair to the hon. Member for North Ayrshire and Arran, she has read the Bill and she will not be walking through that Lobby; I wonder whether many of her colleagues will be joining her.

Alternatively, perhaps, as ever with Labour Governments, fiscal discipline will be there for as long as it is absolutely expedient, as in the case of the abandoning of the fiscal rules at the point at which they prove to be a constraint. The Chancellor gave us the answer earlier today when he stated that if there were a recession and difficulties in the economy, the Chancellor would simply have to come back and explain to us that the target was not going to be met. If that is really the case, then we have to ask what on earth is the point of the Bill.

If the Government genuinely wanted to increase the institutional pressures to reduce the deficit, they could have followed our policy and established an office for budget responsibility that could publish its own fiscal forecasts. We have heard several times today about the Treasury's failures in its own fiscal forecasts. It could make recommendations as to whether the Government would meet their stated objectives in reducing the deficit or whether further action was necessary, and of course it could be a much more sophisticated instrument than the targets set out in the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) pointed out, the difficulties that exist and the use of the private finance initiative and other off-balance-sheet mechanisms have done little for the Government's credibility in this area.

Truth be told, whatever the Government propose at this stage, there is nothing that they can do to restore their credibility. This Government are to fiscal responsibility what Tiger Woods is to marital fidelity. The Chancellor had his chance to set out a credible path to fiscal responsibility—indeed, we read the leaks suggesting that he fought to put forward proposals that would have delivered something close to credibility—but the man whom we thought was unsackable was still too weak to stand up to the Prime Minister and the Schools Secretary, and yet again we had a pre-Budget report that did nothing to address the Government's lack of credibility.

The Chancellor could have set out spending plans that would have reassured the markets, and in doing so perhaps protected his own legacy, but he failed to do so. Instead we have this pathetic excuse for a Bill. As the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) has pointed out, it is vacuous and irrelevant. At a time of crisis in the public finances, we need leadership that will rise to the occasion. We need a man with a plan, not a man with a stunt. If the UK is to have fiscal credibility again, there is one necessary condition. It is not this Bill, it is a change of Government.

9.41 pm

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Sarah McCarthy-Fry): In 1997 the Government established two clear fiscal objectives, which have been maintained since and will remain in place. The first is, over the medium term, to ensure sound public finances and ensure that spending and taxation have a fair impact within and between generations. The second is, over the short term, to support monetary policy to help smooth the path of the economy.

The financial crisis and the global recession have had a profound impact on the public finances, resulting in a significant increase in Government borrowing and, as a result, increasing public sector net debt. Those major economic shocks have hit every country in the world, and we have had to be flexible in our response to changing circumstances. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out, our first priority was to provide support to the economy, which is why the Government undertook a fiscal stimulus to provide support when the economy was weakened. That stimulus and the effect of the automatic stabilisers are providing fiscal support totalling about 5 per cent. of GDP this financial year, which has helped limit the severity of the downturn and its impact on businesses and individuals.

The Government estimate that as a direct result of the fiscal stimulus announced in the 2008 pre-Budget report, GDP growth in 2009 will be about half a percentage point higher than it would otherwise have been. There were costs to stepping in, but not to have intervened would have been even more costly and burdened the economy over a much longer horizon. We have always been clear that the initial support must be followed by steps to secure sound public finances. Our fiscal stimulus was deliberately time-limited to increase its impact during the downturn and ensure sound public finances over the medium term.

Timing is all, and much of today's debate has centred around the timing of the consolidation. There have been contributions from my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), my hon. Friend the Member for North Ayrshire and Arran (Ms Clark) and the hon. Members for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie), for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) and for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne). Some hon. Members complained that we were not going fast enough, and others that we were going too fast.

Mr. Gauke: As the Exchequer Secretary runs through the various contributions to the debate, can she recall any other occasion on which the flagship measure in the Queen's Speech has not attracted a single voice of support from the Government Back Benches?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I cannot speak for Back Benchers who may not have been able to get here in time to speak in the debate. [Interruption.] The proof of the parliamentary Labour party's support will be in the votes for the measure.

The Government will not withdraw support too quickly. Tightening fiscal policy too quickly risks jeopardising the recovery, which would result in the deterioration of the fiscal position. The Government will therefore ensure that fiscal policy continues to provide support to businesses and individuals in the early stages of recovery.

Mr. Redwood: Why have countries, which borrowed much less and ran a much tighter ship, recovered much sooner?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: We must look at things in a wider context. We should remember that unemployment in this country is not as high as in other countries. We must examine all the factors.

When the economy is better placed to support a more rapid tightening, fiscal policy will shift towards consolidation. Well-timed and planned fiscal consolidation will support economic growth during the recovery. In line with fiscal objectives, the Government's fiscal strategy is threefold.

[Sarah McCarthy-Fry]

First, we will base policy decisions on a realistic fiscal forecast, based on a range of assumptions, some of which are designed to provide caution for uncertainty. Secondly, we will ensure that the fiscal policy framework is set to deliver the Government's fiscal policy objectives. To that end, the Government have introduced the Bill. Thirdly, we will set out a credible plan to deliver sustained consolidation in the medium term to ensure sound public finances in a time frame that is consistent with economic recovery and growth. In line with that, the pre-Budget report outlines plans to more than halve the deficit in four years, and the fiscal consolidation plan included in the Bill embeds the deficit reduction. That is the sharpest reduction in the budget deficit of any G7 country.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I sympathise with the Exchequer Secretary's plight this evening. She says that the Government aim to have a credible policy. How credible can it be when a heavily whipped parliamentary Labour party cannot produce one Back Bencher to speak in favour of it? No wonder the Chancellor is desperately whispering in her ear. It is a night of humiliation for him and for the Government.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I have no need of sympathy from the hon. Gentleman.

As the economy emerges from recession, and exceptional uncertainty recedes, the Government believe that it is appropriate to strengthen the fiscal framework. That will support the recovery and is in line with international action. As Governments around the world work together in response to the downturn, many other countries are now choosing to strengthen their fiscal frameworks. Indeed, the International Monetary Fund has highlighted fiscal responsibility laws as a way in which to buttress fiscal adjustment following the financial crisis by strengthening institutional arrangements. The Government have chosen to enhance the fiscal framework through the Bill. The measure will help businesses and investors make long-term plans with confidence about the future fiscal position and the financing environment.

Stewart Hosie: The position has been buttressed globally, but which other G7 country has withdrawn its fiscal stimulus package?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: We are not immediately withdrawing our fiscal stimulus package—I am sure that that will be debated further in the pre-Budget report debate on Thursday.

Mr. Dunne: Will the Exchequer Secretary give way?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I want to make some progress, then perhaps I shall give way if there is time.

The Government have set out measures to reduce borrowing by £57 billion by 2013-14 and to contribute to more than halving the deficit over four years. The Bill embeds the deficit reduction in legislation and also sets further targets to reduce the deficit in each year to 2015-16 and to have the national debt falling in that year.

Mr. Gauke: Will the Minister explain what would happen if she were in government in 2012 or 2013 and there were a recession? Would the target of reducing borrowing year in year out, as set out in the Bill, still apply? Is that the Government's position?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I cannot remember whether the hon. Gentleman was here for the Chancellor's opening speech, but he dealt with that point quite closely—[Interruption.] I will repeat it if the hon. Gentleman wants me to. If there were an unprecedented situation, the matter could be looked at again, but we are setting out a plan for a reduction in the deficit and further targets to reduce the deficit in each year.

The plans contribute to ensuring sustainable public finances in the medium term, and I do not think that placing them on the statute book is a distraction. Legislation provides certainty and stability, and we are giving Parliament a new role in both setting and monitoring the Government's fiscal plans. In particular, Parliament must approve fiscal plans before they become law, which is a significant evolution of the extent to which the Government are held to account for their medium-term fiscal policy.

Mr. Cash: In view of the tremendous certainty that the Minister is describing, will she tell us now what net debt means under the Bill?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I was going to come to that later in my speech, but given the number of interventions, I might not get there. The legislation requires explanation of key terms to be set out in the code for fiscal stability. The Chancellor has stated that that will be published in draft in advance of Committee to allow for scrutiny. All definitions and fiscal aggregates used in the Bill will be national statistics, produced by the independent ONS, using European and internationally accepted methodologies.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I am not going to give way because if I do, I will not get to the end of my speech.

The International Monetary Fund has set out that the strengthening of medium-term frameworks, including through fiscal responsibility laws, should help to support the fiscal adjustment that will be necessary in most economies following the financial crisis. The Bill is therefore a crucial part of our fiscal strategy, binding the Government to deliver on the tough decisions we are taking to more than halve the deficit over four years and to get debt falling.

The Bill builds on, and significantly enhances, the existing legislative underpinnings of the fiscal framework. It requires the Government to set out at all times a legislative fiscal plan for delivering sound public finances. That must be approved by Parliament before it becomes law, and the Bill places a binding duty on the Government to meet the plan.

Mr. Jeremy Browne: Given that less than two years ago the Chancellor forecast that the deficit this financial year would be £38 billion, and that instead it has turned out to be £178 billion, why is the Minister so confident that her right hon. Friend is able to predict what the economic circumstances will be in 2016?

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Maybe the hon. Gentleman missed it, but there has been a global economic crisis since then.

Fiscal plans cannot be changed except with the approval of Parliament through new legislation. That demonstrates the Government's commitment to delivering consolidation—

Mr. Browne: The Chancellor might be the leader of the Lib Dems by then.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: I think that that is the most unlikely thing in the world.

The fact that the fiscal plans cannot be changed except with the approval of Parliament through new legislation also demonstrates the importance the Government place on action to ensure sound public finances in the medium term. The Bill makes the Government accountable to Parliament for meeting their fiscal plans and creates a new scrutinising role for Parliament in relation to both progress towards and compliance with them. That is a significant evolution of the extent to which the Government are held to account for their medium-term fiscal policy. Parliament is the right body to hold the Government to account for their plans for tax, spending and borrowing.

The Government are required to account to Parliament through regular progress and compliance reports, which will be produced alongside Budgets and pre-Budget reports. Progress reports must set out the progress that has been made towards compliance with the plans. If targets are not met, the Treasury must set out for Parliament why not. The revised code for fiscal stability will set out that the Treasury must also report on what it will do to remedy the situation if targets are not met. These measures represent a significant evolution of the extent to which the Government are held to account for their medium-term fiscal policy.

As the Chancellor noted, the Government do not consider that an office for budget responsibility—as proposed by the Opposition—is the right solution to the challenge we face. Establishing a new quango would not enhance the fiscal framework. Instead, it would risk undermining the role of Parliament in scrutinising the Government's fiscal plans. Introducing blurred lines of responsibility for forecast and policy-making functions risks damaging accountability: policy-makers would be acting on forecasts for which they were not fully responsible. It is Parliament and Parliament alone that is best placed to hold the Government to account for their plans. They should have ultimate say in matters of tax, spending and borrowing.

Further, evidence does not suggest that outsourcing the forecast would improve its accuracy. The Treasury's fiscal forecasts since 1997 have been marginally more accurate than the forecasts for the UK made by many independent international organisations, such as the OECD, the IMF and the European Commission, and no more or less cautious than the range.

Instead, the Government's approach is to strengthen the existing fiscal framework and enhance accountability to Parliament rather than outsource it to an external body. Parliamentary scrutiny has been bolstered by the steps the Government have taken since 1997 to improve fiscal transparency. In addition, the independent National Audit Office will retain its existing role in auditing key forecasting assumptions.

Parliament should have the ultimate say in matters of tax, spending and borrowing. The Bill will give Parliament a new role in holding the Government to account for their medium-term fiscal policy and meeting the targets of the fiscal consolidation plan. The legislation includes clear targets, and will create a transparent reporting process for assessing progress and compliance against fiscal plans. If the Government are not on track it will be obvious, and if plans are not achieved the Government will have to set out why not.

The Government have made it clear that reducing spending accounts for two thirds of the action the Government are taking to reduce the deficit following the crisis—measures that will reduce the deficit by £57 billion in 2013-14. This is shared between current and capital spending. Specific savings that we have already set out include £12 billion of savings from the smarter government reforms to the public sector; £4.5 billion from slowing increases in public sector pay and pensions; and £5 billion from cuts to lower priority programmes, as well other efficiencies across all Departments, where £10 billion value-for-money savings have been found already.

The Government have already set out clear plans for fiscal consolidation. In April in the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out plans for consolidation and the recent pre-Budget report confirms these. These plans include more than halving the deficit in four years. The Bill enshrines these plans in law, through the Government's first fiscal plan, the fiscal consolidation plan.

The Government are committed to sound public finances and have set out clear plans for consolidation. We will not withdraw support too quickly and jeopardise recovery. The annual pace of consolidation set out in the 2009 pre-Budget report is faster than the pace of deficit reduction forecast by the IMF for all other G7 economies in the period up to 2014. Further, the Government will return with legislative targets beyond 2015-16 at an appropriate time. The pre-Budget report projects that the deficit on the cyclically adjusted current budget will be eliminated by 2017-18.

We are now at the turning point in the global recession and at a time when we need to start building and planning for the future. As growth picks up, we must ensure that we have sustainable public finances. Through enhancing the fiscal framework, the Fiscal Responsibility Bill will support that task. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The House divided: Ayes 182, Noes 280.

Division No. 26] [21.59

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Amess, Mr. David
Ancram, rh Mr. Michael
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Baron, Mr. John
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter

Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C.
(Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Foster, Mr. Don
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francois, Mr. Mark
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, rh
Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Horam, Mr. John
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Howell, John
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Neill, Robert
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Rosindell, Andrew
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Chloe
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Syms, Mr. Robert
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Timpson, Mr. Edward
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Sir Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Mr. Roger
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
James Duddridge and Jeremy Wright

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Bain, Mr. William
Baird, Vera
Balls, rh Ed
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, rh Mr. Ben
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, rh Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, rh Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Corbyn, Jeremy
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, Mr. Dai
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Fisher, Mark
Fiello, Mr. Robert
Flint, rh Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael
(Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez
(Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai

Healey, rh John
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jim
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, rh Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khan, rh Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, rh Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, rh Mr. David
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
Martlew, Mr. Eric
Mason, John
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, rh Mr. Pat
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, rh Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McNulty, rh Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, rh Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Price, Adam
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Roy, Lindsay
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Sharma, Mr. Virendra
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andy
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spink, Bob
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, rh Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, rh Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Twigg, Derek
Vaz, rh Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Williams, Hywel
Wills, rh Mr. Michael
Wilson, Phil
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, rh Ms Rosie
Wishart, Pete
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mark Tami and
Mr. Bob Blizzard

Question accordingly negatived.

Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 62(2)), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House divided: Ayes 265, Noes 196.

Division No. 27] [10.15 pm

AYES

Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Bain, Mr. William
Baird, Vera
Balls, rh Ed
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, rh Mr. Ben
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, rh Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, rh Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Etherington, Bill
Fisher, Mark
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, rh Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael
(Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez
(Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry

George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, rh John
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jim
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, rh Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khan, rh Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, rh Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, rh Mr. David
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, rh Mr. Pat
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, rh Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McNulty, rh Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, rh Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Roy, Lindsay
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Sharma, Mr. Virendra
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andy
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spink, Bob
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, rh Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, rh Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Twigg, Derek
Vaz, rh Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, rh Mr. Michael
Wilson, Phil
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, rh Ms Rosie
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mark Tami and
Mr. Bob Blizzard

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Afriyie, Adam
Amess, Mr. David
Ancram, rh Mr. Michael
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Baron, Mr. John
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Ms Katy
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, Mr. Dai
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Foster, Mr. Don
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francois, Mr. Mark
Gale, Mr. Roger
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Horam, Mr. John
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Howell, John
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David

Kawczynski, Daniel
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mason, John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Neill, Robert
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Rosindell, Andrew
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Chloe
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Syms, Mr. Robert
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Timpson, Mr. Edward
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Sir Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Jeremy Wright and
James Duddridge

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, (Standing Order No. 83A(7)),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Fiscal Responsibility Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Committee, consideration and Third Reading

2. Proceedings in Committee, any proceedings on consideration and proceedings on Third Reading shall be completed at one day's sitting.

3. Proceedings in Committee and any proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

4. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

5. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to the proceedings on the Bill in Committee and on consideration and Third Reading.—(Steve McCabe.)

The House divided: Ayes 254, Noes 187.

Division No. 28] [10.30 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Bain, Mr. William
Baird, Vera
Balls, rh Ed
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, rh Mr. Ben
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, rh Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, rh Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, rh Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael
(Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez
(Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, rh John
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Hill, rh Keith
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jim
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin

Howarth, rh Mr. George
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khan, rh Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, rh Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, rh Mr. David
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, rh Mr. Pat
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, rh Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McNulty, rh Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, rh Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Roy, Lindsay
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Sharma, Mr. Virendra
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andy
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Angela E.
(Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, rh Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, rh Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Twigg, Derek
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, rh Mr. Michael
Wilson, Phil
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, rh Ms Rosie
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mark Tami and
Mr. Bob Blizzard

NOES

Afriyie, Adam
Amess, Mr. David
Ancram, rh Mr. Michael
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Baron, Mr. John
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, Mr. Dai
Davies, David T.C.
(Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Duncan, Alan
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Farrelly, Paul
Foster, Mr. Don
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francois, Mr. Mark
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Horam, Mr. John
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Howell, John
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Luff, Peter
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mason, John
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
McCrea, Dr. William
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Neill, Robert
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Ottaway, Richard
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam

Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Rosindell, Andrew
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, David
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Chloe
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Syms, Mr. Robert
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Timpson, Mr. Edward
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Sir Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Jeremy Wright and
James Duddridge

Question accordingly agreed to.

Business without Debate

DEFERRED DIVISIONS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 41A (3)).

That, at this day's sitting, Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply to the motion in the name of Secretary Alan Johnson relating to Immigration.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

CORPORATION TAX BILL

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 90 (5)), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time; to stand committed to the Joint Committee on Tax Law Rewrite Bills (Order, 26 November 2009, and Standing Order No. 60(6)).

CORPORATION TAX BILL (WAYS AND MEANS)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 52 (1) (a)).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Corporation Tax Bill, it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to tax which may arise from any of the provisions of the Act.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

TAXATION (INTERNATIONAL AND OTHER PROVISIONS) BILL

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 90 (5)), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time; to stand committed to the Joint Committee on Tax Law Rewrite Bills (Order, 26 November 2009, and Standing Order No. 60(6)).

TAXATION (INTERNATIONAL AND OTHER PROVISIONS) BILL (WAYS AND MEANS)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 52 (1) (a)).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Taxation (International and Other Provisions) Bill, it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to tax which may arise from any of the provisions of the Act.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I suggest that we take motions 7 to 12 together.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Speaker: Objection taken. We will put them individually.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

CRIMINAL LAW

That the draft Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (Designation of Participating Countries) (England, Wales and Northern Ireland) (No. 3) Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 4 November, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

TRIBUNALS AND INQUIRIES

That the draft Amendment to Schedule 6 to the Tribunals, Courts and Enforcement Act 2007 Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 20 October, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

TRIBUNALS AND INQUIRIES

That the draft Transfer of Functions of the Asylum and Immigration Tribunal Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 20 October, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

TRIBUNALS AND INQUIRIES

That the draft Transfer of Tribunal Functions Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 20 October, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (1996 Hague Convention on Protection of Children etc.) Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 11 November, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

BANKS AND BANKING

That the draft Banking Act 2009 (Exclusion of Insurers) Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 10 November, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6)).

IMMIGRATION

That the draft Immigration (Biometric Registration) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 2009, which were laid before this House on 25 November, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

The House divided: Ayes 243, Noes 42.

Division No. 29] [10.45 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Bain, Mr. William
Baird, Vera
Balls, rh Ed
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bottomley, Peter
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, rh Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, rh Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, rh Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Mr. Michael
(Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez
(Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gilroy, Linda
Griffith, Nia
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, rh John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Hill, rh Keith
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hood, Mr. Jim
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khan, rh Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, rh Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, rh Mr. David
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCrea, Dr. William
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, rh Mr. Pat
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, rh Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McNulty, rh Mr. Tony
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, rh Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Roy, Lindsay
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Salter, Martin
Seabeck, Alison
Sharma, Mr. Virendra
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simpson, David
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andy
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Angela E.
(Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spink, Bob
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari

Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, rh Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, rh Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Twigg, Derek
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, rh Mr. Michael
Wilson, Phil
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, rh Ms Rosie
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mark Tami and
Mr. Bob Blizzard

NOES

Breed, Mr. Colin
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Burt, Lorely
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, Mr. Dai
Foster, Mr. Don
George, Andrew
Gidley, Sandra
Goldsworthy, Julia
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Harvey, Nick
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, David
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Jones, Lynne
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Lamb, Norman
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Mason, John
Moore, Mr. Michael
Öpik, Lembit
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Price, Adam
Pugh, Dr. John
Rennie, Willie
Robertson, Angus
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Stunell, Andrew
Taylor, Matthew
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Williams, Hywel
Williams, Mr. Roger
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wishart, Pete

Tellers for the Noes:
John Hemming and
Dr. Evan Harris

Question accordingly agreed to.

REGULATORY REFORM

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 18(1)),

That the draft Legislative Reform (Insolvency) (Miscellaneous Provisions) Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 29 October, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERS' FUND

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 118 (6) and Order, 23 November),

That, pursuant to section 4(4) of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and section 1(4) of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1957, in the year commencing 1 October 2009 there be appropriated for the purposes of section 4 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948:

(1) The whole of the sums deducted or set aside in that year under section 1(3) of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939 from the salaries of Members of the House of Commons; and

(2) The whole of the Treasury contribution to the Fund.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 119 (1)),

GAS SECURITY

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 11892/09, draft Regulation concerning measures to safeguard security of gas supply; notes the Government's position on this proposal and agrees the broad aim of the Regulation that seeks enhanced EU resilience to supply shocks through robust preventative and emergency planning and strong emphasis on the role of a well-functioning internal gas market as the best insurance for security of gas supply; and further notes the need to ensure that the powers of the Commission in this Regulation satisfy the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality and supports the Government's aim of securing this.—(Steve McCabe.)

Question agreed to.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business) shall have effect for this Session with the following modifications, namely:

In paragraph (4) the word 'eight' shall be substituted for the word 'thirteen' in line 42 and in paragraph (5) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 44;

(2) Standing Order No. 90 (Second reading committees) shall have effect for this Session with the following modification, namely:

In paragraph (2) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 21;

and

(3) Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 29 January; 5 and 26 February; 5 and 12 March; 23 and 30 April; and 7 May.—(Steve McCabe.)

Hon. Members: Object.

PETITION

Car Scheme (Castle Point)

10.56 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): Rene Begley, the co-chairman of New Thundersley Townswomen's Guild, has kindly organised this petition.

Our communities are enriched and strengthened by volunteers who work in excellent schemes such as the Castle Point social car scheme. I warmly congratulate all the caring people involved in that scheme, which helps vulnerable people. Each councillor is individually responsible for ensuring that frail people are able to remain in their homes and to have help with their mobility. The public will hold councillors personally to account for trying to cut the car scheme's funding without proper consultation with its organisers and with no consultation at all with the public or users of the scheme.

The petition states:

The Petition of the New Thundersley Afternoon Townswomen's Guild, the residents of Castle Point and others,

Declares that they object to the proposed reduction in funding for the Castle Point Car Scheme buses, to take effect from January 2010, that this reduction in funding will impact upon frail, elderly and infirm residents who rely on the buses as a means of independent living, and that public transport such as the Car Scheme offers a cheaper and greener alternative to private transport.

[Bob Spink]

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Government to press Castle Point Borough Council, and all Councillors, to reverse the decision to reduce funding for the Castle Point Car Scheme, and to increase support for local, greener transport schemes.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

[P000691]

Southend-on-Sea

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—(Steve McCabe.)

10.58 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) has the honour to represent the town of Southend-on-Sea, which I can say without fear of contradiction is the finest seaside resort along the Thames estuary. In its heyday, going back to Victorian times, it was enjoyed by east-enders, not only for day trips but to spend long weekends there. Sadly, in 2010, British holidays are not quite as popular as they used to be, primarily because the cost of air travel is greatly reduced and we often cannot entirely rely on our climate.

Southend is probably no different from any other coastal resort in having fewer people in jobs, higher levels of benefit claimants, and more people in poor health and with worse transport links than their inland counterparts. That is very common among coastal resorts. However, Southend is trying to re-establish itself as an attractive and vibrant seaside town for visitors and residents alike, and it is blessed with superb leadership from Councillor Nigel Holdcroft, who is the council leader, ably supported by his deputy John Lamb. We also have an excellent council chief executive, Rob Tinlin, who is supported by a superb team of officers.

We are perhaps not quite in the strong funding position that we would have hoped for, because the last census was somewhat lacking in rigour. The Minister will understand that we intend to ensure that the next census is absolutely accurate, because the last one basically left off 20,000 people, which was very damaging in funding terms. However, I am delighted to say that a £25 million investment package will mean four new regeneration schemes. One is City beach on Marine parade, in my hon. Friend's constituency, which will be launched on 7 January.

Congestion and weak transport infrastructure are challenges for the town, and the other three key development projects will significantly reduce congestion and journey times. Work on the Victoria gateway, again in my hon. Friend's constituency, will start in March. The other two projects are in my constituency. One of the worst bottlenecks in the town is at Cuckoo corner, where £5 million improvement works will begin in April. It is hoped that when the improvements are completed, there will be a reduction from the 400 minutes a day of congestion that is experienced at peak times. The final piece of work, which will be started shortly, is at Progress road, a key section of the main arterial route into Southend. Those are positive schemes that my hon. Friend and I welcome, but there are further bottlenecks at the Bell and Kent Elms junctions with the A127, and I hope that in due course there will be some improvements.

The Minister will be only too well aware of the expansion of Southend airport. Most residents welcome the fact that there is an airport in Southend, but since its current owner, Stobart, put in plans to expand it, there has been some debate in the town about the benefits of the suggestion. I believe that the council will examine the proposals on 20 January. For my own part, I feel that to satisfy all residents' concerns there should be a public inquiry, but I know that the Minister cannot say anything about that and that it is a matter for the Secretary of State at the end of the day.

The council has invested £5 million in the third phase of improvements to the A13, which is one of the town's main arteries and is also subject to bad congestion. Although Government funding was received for the first and second phases, for which we were very grateful, nothing was provided for the third phase, which covers the area from the entrance boundary with Essex to a third of the way into the town centre.

I should tell the Minister that the decision not to extend the c2c and National Express contracts on our two rail links is creating uncertainty, particularly as there are negotiations under way with c2c and Network Rail regarding parking and redevelopment. I would be grateful if he had a word with his colleagues about the delay in that.

I am delighted to tell the House that throughout the summer, Southend enjoyed a relatively high level of tourism, and the local authority produced an attractive programme of events for tourists to enjoy.

I had the privilege of chairing proceedings on the London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Bill, and I am a keen supporter of the games. Southend is bidding to become the United Kingdom's capital of culture for 2013, and several projects are under way that can only help the overall regeneration of the town. The international arts organisation, Metal, has come to Southend having renovated the grade II listed building, Chalkwell hall. I attended its launch at the end of September. It was a great occasion and a celebration of the town. Many events were held there, and that has done a great deal to boost morale.

We hope that, in the longer term, Metal will encourage creative businesses to set up in the town, helping us to become a regional centre for the creative industries. I was delighted that, before Christmas, the Heritage Lottery Fund awarded Prittlewell Priory museum a grant of £1.3 million. The grant will fund repairs and refurbishment, as well as creating new displays and a new external building, thus creating even more space for new displays. The project will also add new signage, trails and publications to connect Prittlewell priory with the surrounding area and landscape. The refurbished museum will tell the story of the priory from its monastic days to its life as a Victorian house, as well as that of the wildlife of the park. In addition to Southend council, the Friends of Southend Museums and the Cory Environmental Trust have pledged sums to match fund the lottery grant. That is all good news.

We are delighted that Hadleigh, which is close to my constituency, will be a venue for the 2012 Olympic mountain bike events. In addition, many venues locally would make an ideal base for hosting teams from smaller visiting nations. For example, I recently had the privilege of opening Eastwood school's new, wonderful, first-class sports complex. That would be an ide[illegible] for one of the smaller nations to use as a base [illegible]

There will be a state-of-the-art swimm[illegible]cility and a world-class Olympic-sized diving facility at Garon park. The council has invested £14 million to ensure that Southend residents, as well as visiting teams in training for the 2012 Olympics, can enjoy the facilities. In addition, other key swimming facilities in the town at Belfairs and Shoebury in my hon. Friend's constituency will be refurbished. I know that I speak for all local residents when I say that we are looking forward to the Olympic games. We certainly intend to ensure that Southend is at the heart of the celebrations.

Given Southend's waning popularity as a destination for weekend visitors, we have tried to direct its energy towards the twin activities of becoming the centre of culture for the east and becoming a centre of learning. We have a wonderful college, which has joined forces with the university of Essex under the excellent leadership of the principal, Jan Hodges. It was opened in 2007, and we have a marvellous campus, with performing arts, a business school and health and human sciences. Recently, we joined forces with Basildon and Thurrock. We welcome the fact that Southend is the lead in the partnership, but are somewhat disappointed that there does not seem to be funding for a single campus for South Essex college. Until there is additional funding, we will have a split-site campus, which is not ideal.

The Minister knows only too well that Southend has suffered a blow through job losses. HSBC has closed its card-processing facility, and 750 local jobs have been lost. I know that I speak for my hon. Friend when I say that we are concerned about the rumours of further job losses at Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs site in the town—the numbers working there have already been reduced. Further losses would certainly be unwelcome.

Finally, the pier regeneration is very important. As the Minister knows, Southend pier is the longest in the world and the town is famous for it. We were very disappointed recently about it. We had been given the impression that we were to be given funds to develop and restore the pier given that it has had three fires, and we invested £36,000 on a design competition because we were encouraged to do so by the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment, but unfortunately our bid was unsuccessful. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport announced only £5 million of major projects when it was expected that there would be £15 million. Was that why the decision was delayed by four months?

About two years ago, a DCMS Minister was good enough to give us money to help deal with the cliff slippage that we suffered in Southend. The Department for Transport provided £1 million in the last financial year for emergency stabilisation in the west of Southend in Belton Hills and by Leigh railway station. Any further support the Government could give would be very welcome.

In conclusion, we are very grateful indeed for the help that has been given thus far for the regeneration of Southend, but any further help would be very much welcome.

11.11 pm

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on securing this debate and look forward to the Minister's reply, given that he recently enjoyed a visit to Southend and the surrounding area. I ask three things of him: to count correctly, to fund directly, and to get the infrastructure right.

Counting correctly relates to the census. The failure to count 20,000 people in the 2001 census costs Southend £7 million each year, so counting correctly is the most fundamental single thing the Minister could review when considering the future prosperity and regeneration of Southend.

[James Duddridge]

Secondly, on funding directly, I say candidly that there are far too many organisations with their fingers in the pot. We have extremely good directly elected councillors, and they should be allowed to get on with the job of spending the money as local residents desire, rather than the money going through an alphabetti spaghetti of acronyms and quangos. Frankly, those not only add little value, but are sometimes destructive of the value the council could add. I ask the Minister to get rid of some of those organisations and to fund everything directly.

Finally, on infrastructure, living in Southend sometimes feels like living on an island in the corner of Essex. We need to speed up traffic along the A127 and A13. The sea-to-sea rail line has been award winning, and despite the problems that National Express has had elsewhere in the eastern counties, I urge the Minister to consider awarding the contract and franchise to the existing management of the line, who have been absolutely fabulous. Given our road infrastructure problems, I would be very disappointed if the existing management of the sea-to-sea railway were not involved in the longer-term franchise for the line.

11.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Shahid Malik): It is a pleasure to engage in this debate under your stewardship, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I congratulate the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on securing the debate, which is on a subject that is important to him, his constituents and others living in Southend. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on his contribution.

As I was sitting on the Bench earlier, a number of Ministers who have had the same responsibilities asked what debate I was here for. When I told them that it was on the regeneration of Southend, three of them said, "I've done that in the past." That is testament to the hon. Gentleman's commitment to his constituents and their well-being—and that goes for the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East as well.

It has been just over a year since we last had a debate about regeneration in Southend, and there has been much progress since then, as I saw when I visited in September. Since my visit I have been a big fan, as I was incredibly impressed. The hon. Member for Southend, West mentioned leadership, and I was impressed by the leadership and the partnership at work in Southend. I am very aware that partners in Southend have been working hard to ensure that the town becomes a thriving regional centre, with culture and commerce at its heart, and that it is seen as an exciting place to live, work and visit.

One of the most impressive things I saw was the education hub of South East Essex college and the university of Essex in the town centre. Those developments have attracted multi-million pound investment and brought many benefits, including employment opportunities, supporting learning and raising skills levels, and transforming the street scene with more young people living in and around the town centre.

I also note the comment made by the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East about counting. I am not fully aware of the issue, but I will get back to him with more information about the census. The issue was also raised by the hon. Member for Southend, West.

It is not surprising to find that regeneration features strongly in the recent comprehensive area assessment for Southend, published last month. The assessment recognises the important role that regeneration has played in transforming the town and highlights not only the education hub but other developments such as Pier Hill, Hamlet Court road and the network of 11 children's centres, many of which are located in the central areas of the town that I saw on my visit.

Importantly, Southend's regeneration has not simply been about bricks and mortar; it has also been about people, businesses and communities. It is about instilling confidence and encouraging people to join in and helping them feel in control of what goes on in their town. It is therefore important that we build on this success and exploit the potential within Southend. The local strategic partnership, Southend Together, has a shared vision to > "ensure Southend is a proud and dynamic city".

Partners have been working together very productively to deliver that vision, and I was pleased to meet many of them during my visit last year. I mean that very sincerely.

There are also significant opportunities to promote the advantages of Southend's location close to London and the 2012 Olympics; to become both a nationally and internationally recognised centre of educational and cultural achievement; to make maximum use of its physical assets including the seaside and the magnificent world record-breaking pier; and to promote Southend as a place to live and work, as well as to visit. It is very good news that Hadleigh Farm has been selected as the venue for the mountain bike events in the 2012 Olympics. I know just what an inspiring venue it will be, with an amazing view across the Thames estuary—Constable country at its best.

I am sure that hon. Members will agree with me, however, that along with such opportunities, Southend, like many other seaside towns, still faces a number of real challenges, and the hon. Member for Southend, West alluded to many of them. It has significant pockets of social and economic deprivation, mainly centred in the Milton, Victoria and Kursaal wards, all of which rank in the top 3 per cent. of most disadvantaged wards in the country according to the indices of multiple deprivation.

Southend has of course not been immune from the effects of the global economic downturn, as the hon. Gentleman highlighted. It has some of the highest unemployment rates in the east of England. The claimant count in November 2009 was 5 per cent. compared with 3.4 per cent. for the region. It was 50 per cent. higher than the same time a year earlier, although unemployment has stabilised in recent months.

The hon. Gentleman was right to mention the airport. Certainly when I was there, there seemed to be a consensus among the regeneration leadership that it could be a good thing. However, he was right that it would be inappropriate at this stage for me to comment, given that it is likely to come before my Department and the Secretary of State in due course.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the urban regeneration company for Southend, Renaissance Southend Ltd, which brings together all the public and private partners in the area and the central area master plan, looking at the potential for redeveloping the town centre and improving the commercial seafront as a visitor attraction and destination.

The East of England Development Agency is supporting Renaissance Southend Ltd through core funding, as well as working with it and the council. It has invested more than £30 million in Southend over the past five years, most recently—I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has already touched on some of these—on projects such as the £5 million redevelopment of the former Clifftown United Reform church into a state-of-the-art facility for the teaching, training, rehearsal and performances of the East 15 acting school students, and the new student accommodation and car park on London road, which promises to be a striking landmark for the town. It is obviously a bold design and certainly will be a talking point.

Both hon. Gentlemen have talked about the need to ensure that there is one Southend—in the sense that at the moment the various funding agencies perhaps cause confusion. I hope that they will be reassured that the new "single conversation", which has already begun between the Homes and Communities Agency and Southend partners on all aspects of housing, infrastructure and regeneration, will reduce some of the complexity.

The HCA carried out a reprioritisation exercise in September 2009 for projects provisionally identified for funding in the Thames Gateway delivery plan. I am pleased to say that Southend did well out of that reprioritisation, with seven out of 10 potential projects placed on the high priority list for funding, which is testament to the hard work of stakeholders and the project teams. Six of those now have funding agreements in place or near to completion, providing more than £9 million of funding, in this and the next financial year, for a mixture of public realm projects and studies of development potential.

Southend's role as a cultural and educational centre is being supported by partners in a number of ways. I am pleased to say that we have recently agreed to the merger of South East Essex college and Thurrock and Basildon college, which will help provide a wider range of curriculum and progression opportunities, further strengthening the education offer—something that is obviously critical given where we are in the economic downturn.

Hon. Members will recognise Southend's aim to become not only the cultural capital of the east of England, but the UK capital of culture in 2013, with its recent bid "Southend's Got Front". As the hon. Member for Southend, West mentioned, the recent opening of Chalkwell hall, the new home for Metal, will provide a low-carbon space that can be used as a power house for creativity in the community and far beyond, allowing artists to develop their talent and ideas.

The City Beach project, of which the hon. Gentleman is aware, with public sector funding of £7 million, will bring urban design improvements to the central seafront and public realm, based on enhancing the promenade, improvements to the sea wall and the installation of architectural lighting.

Improvements to transportation routes are important to the continued development of Southend. That point was well made by the hon. Gentleman. As was pointed out, a significant part of the borough council's plans is the work on Priory crescent and its junction with the A127 at Cuckoo corner—a pinch-point on the route to and from the eastern part of Southend. The Department for Transport has provided just under £5 million through the community infrastructure fund, or CIF2, taking the scheme through to completion by March 2011. Work on the Victoria gateway, which will provide improved pedestrian links between Victoria station and the town centre, will also start shortly. Both schemes should help to improve public transport prioritisation and through-route development of the south Essex rapid transit scheme. I also note the hon. Gentleman's point about c2c, which I will push in the direction of the relevant Minister.

However, as we know, regeneration is as much about communities as it is about physical infrastructure. I would like to note some of the work seeking to improve the lives of those in the more deprived areas. We have allocated £1.6 million from the neighbourhood element of the safer and stronger communities fund to Southend-on-Sea. The programme has delivered genuine results, such as the small grant programme for local people developing schemes to support their residents, as well as neighbourhood wardens, who patrol the local area during daytime hours.

Some £243,500 has been awarded from the social enterprise investment fund to set up the St. Luke's healthy living centre, a social enterprise aiming to improve the health and well-being of local people and create training, employment and social enterprise opportunities for residents. The local strategic partnership has also set up community voices, a series of free community engagement-focused events designed to give residents and businesses direct access to key agencies. The most recent event was themed "Beat the Recession", and provided advice and guidance on a range of topics, from personal finance to dealing with stress.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about the pier and the redevelopment there. Wave 3 of the sea change programme was heavily oversubscribed. The sea change partnership, which is led by the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment, which manages the programme on behalf of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and its partner non-departmental bodies, had to make difficult choices among good projects. Written feedback on why the bid was unsuccessful has been given to Southend borough council. Wave 3 of the sea change programme takes us to the end of 2010-11, and it is too soon to make announcements on public expenditure beyond then.

There is no doubt that Southend is a place with a very bright future indeed. However, we must ensure that the momentum is consolidated and built upon. We recognise that, with other places, Southend faces challenges, some of which have been made more difficult in the current economic climate. The Government and local partners have been actively working together to try to reduce the impact of the downturn on local communities and businesses.

11.28 pm

House adjourned without Question put (Standing Order No. 9(7)).

2

House of Commons

Wednesday 6 January 2010

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

BUSINESS BEFORE QUESTIONS

LONDON LOCAL AUTHORITIES BILL [LORDS]
(BY ORDER)

Motion made, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be read a Second time on Wednesday 13 January.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Aluminium Industry

1. Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the First Minister on the future of the aluminium industry in Wales. [308870]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wayne David): We remain committed to supporting the aluminium industry in Wales, as we demonstrated with our strenuous efforts to save jobs at Anglesey Aluminium over the summer.

Mr. Goodwill: To be fair to the Government, I guess that they did as much as they could to try to ensure the survival of Anglesey Aluminium, but is not the fundamental problem the operation of the European Union emissions trading system, which is making it increasingly difficult for primary metallurgical industries to operate in the EU? It would be all well and good if it resulted in the reduction of global CO_2, but it merely results in carbon leakage to other economies such as China and India, which are not constrained in the same way.

Mr. David: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct about the Labour Government's efforts with regard to Anglesey Aluminium. We made strenuous and laborious efforts over the summer to try to save those jobs as far as we possibly could, but unfortunately, for commercial reasons, the company was not able to accept the offer that was made to it. I must say that we remain committed to the aluminium industry generally in Wales and, of course, in the whole of the United Kingdom, but it is important to recognise that we operate within a European Union framework. Naturally, we are concerned about the environment and carbon emissions, and we are doing everything possible to work with our European partners to ensure that those emissions are kept to an absolute minimum. It is important to recognise also that European Union directives have an important role to play in sustaining this country's economy.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): A happy new year to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all Members.

The decision by Rio Tinto Alcan to cease production at Anglesey Aluminium has left a massive hole in the regional economy of north-west Wales, but I put on the record my thanks to the Wales Office and, indeed, to the Government for their efforts with their generous offer and intervention to keep production going. Unfortunately, the company's internal matters took precedence.

Looking forward to the future use of the land on the Anglesey Aluminium site and the concept of green energy, does the Minister agree that we need to move forward to ensure that those jobs are kept on Anglesey? Will he meet the First Minister to ensure that priority is given to Anglesey?

Mr. David: I also wish my hon. Friend a happy new year. I am sure that it will be a happy new year for Labour, too. The prospects for the island of Anglesey are rosy. For example, I welcome the decision by the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority to consider Wylfa as a potential site for new nuclear build, and obviously we are looking at various options to ensure that the available land on the Anglesey Aluminium site is used in the most productive way possible. I am aware that a very positive meeting occurred between representatives of a certain company, my hon. Friend and the Secretary of State for Wales, and I am sure that those deliberations will continue. I shall use my good offices to hold discussions with the First Minister as well.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): In 2007, when Lord Mandelson was European Trade Commissioner, he promoted a scheme for halving duty on the imports of aluminium to the EU. That was to the significant benefit of the Russian aluminium industry. To what extent does the Minister consider that that decision contributed to the demise of Anglesey Aluminium?

Mr. David: I do not believe that it was a factor in any way at all, because the aluminium industry throughout the world has faced difficulties. We are of the view that working closely with our European partners is entirely positive, and that is recognised by Rio Tinto, for example, which is an international player. Of course, discussions take place with the European Union, but it is important to recognise that we live in an international community, and the European Union is a big and positive player.

Car Scrappage

2. Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): What assessment he has made of progress on the car scrappage scheme in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [308871]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Since its launch, the car scrappage scheme has generated more than 291,000 orders for new vehicles in the UK, with about 14,500 of those orders having been made in Wales.

Mrs. Williams: I thank my right hon. Friend for his response, particularly as it confirms my own view. Does he agree that the car scrappage scheme has been of greater value to the British and, indeed, Welsh economies than would have been the Opposition's proposals to cut inheritance tax for their wealthy supporters?

Mr. Hain: I could not have put it better myself; my hon. Friend has got it in one. Rather than wasting public sector money on the richest people in Britain, very few of them in Wales, with inheritance tax giveaways, our putting money into the car scrappage scheme has increased production by a fifth at Ford Bridgend and resulted in a fifth of all new car registrations throughout the UK. That is active government—government supporting people, not favouring a tiny, rich few.

Wind Farms (Montgomeryshire)

3. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): What assessment he has made of the potential effects of construction work on new wind farms in Montgomeryshire on the level of traffic and the environment in that area. [308872]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wayne David): We firmly believe in the long-term benefits of wind energy. Any assessment of traffic and the environment would, of course, be a matter for the relevant planning authority.

Lembit Öpik: Many in Welshpool, Cefn Coch and across Montgomeryshire are very worried about the thousands of slow-moving lorry loads required to build potentially 700-plus turbines, which will cause traffic gridlock. They are also concerned about the environmental impact of the turbines themselves. Will the Minister meet me to hear in more detail the concerns about the traffic flows and about the environmental impact of turbines, if they are built?

Mr. David: Of course wind energy is the most commercially viable renewable technology available, so it is important to go along and enhance its development whenever possible. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I was in Welshpool last year myself and saw the area that he talked about. We will continue to monitor the situation while recognising that responsibility lies with the Welsh Assembly Government, but I would be happy to have further discussions with the hon. Gentleman and other colleagues on this matter in future.

Economic Inactivity

4. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on the level of economic inactivity in Wales. [308873]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Because of the actions my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Government have taken to preserve jobs and get people back to work, the level of economic inactivity in Wales fell by 3,000 from the last quarter. We will not let short-term job losses turn into long-term unemployment. We will not allow Welsh communities to be scarred by worklessness again.

Mr. Harper: I am grateful for that answer. The Secretary of State recently said in the Welsh Grand Committee that unemployment in Wales may well keep rising for some time during 2010. Has he made any estimate of the level at which he thinks unemployment may peak during this recession?

Mr. Hain: What has been interesting is that all the commentators are now saying that unemployment will peak at a far lower level than has been said by the Opposition and was previously feared. We have now seen economic activity rates in Wales down 3,000; jobseeker's allowance and claimant count figures down 500; vacancies up 2,000; and unemployment still up 93,000 in Wales on what we inherited from the miserable Conservative Government last time.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): My local authority of Cynon, Rhondda and Taff is particularly pleased with the future jobs fund and the impact it is having on employment in the Cynon valley. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that the Government will continue to protect those who are out of work—unlike the Conservative party in the 1980s, which threw people on the scrapheap?

Mr. Hain: Again, my Back-Bench colleagues are eloquent in their denunciation of failed policies on the other side of the House.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): They would be, wouldn't they?

Mr. Hain: Well, they would be because they represent Welsh seats that were devastated by Tory policies in the 1980s and 1990s when the number of people on incapacity benefit in constituencies such as that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) and mine tripled. It has been coming down under Labour. My right hon. Friend is absolutely right that we have seen active Government intervention, spending and investing over the past two years—continuing into the future—rather than a Government who will slash spending and condemn people to losing jobs, bankrupting businesses, plunging Britain and Wales into exactly the same cycle of decline and depression from which we rescued Britain and Wales when we came to power in 1997.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): In the Witney constituency of the Leader of the Opposition, 10 claimants are chasing every vacancy. In the Rhondda, 75 claimants are chasing every vacancy, while in Neath it is 35. Will the Secretary of State press his colleague in the Department for Work and Pensions to modulate the pressure on claimants to find work, reflecting local conditions such as those I mentioned? To do otherwise, I think, would be both impractical and inhumane.

Mr. Hain: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, and if he has any concrete examples, I would be happy to take them up with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. The hon. Gentleman will understand the imperative of encouraging people to stay in the world of work. If, sadly, people have been made unemployed, what we are doing, which was not done in the 1980s and 1990s, is to provide them with job opportunities, training and support so that when vacancies arise—there are more and more of them in the Welsh economy generally— they can take that opportunity locally. About half the claimants leave jobseeker's allowance within three months and more than 70 per cent. within six months—a far better record than in the miserable Tory 1980s and 1990s.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the growth in the manufacturing industry that was noted in the purchasing managers index survey published on Monday will be good news for Wales, bearing in mind our above-average dependency on manufacturing industry? Does he not think that that will help to bring down the level of economic inactivity?

Mr. Hain: I do indeed. No one is suggesting that this recession has been anything other than extremely difficult for businesses and for those whose jobs have been under threat, but my hon. Friend is absolutely right: the latest PMI index report shows that private sector growth in Wales increased in November for the seventh successive month. Manufacturing is up, and employment rose for the first time in two years. Wales was the only UK region to record job creation during November, and the latest figures show that the growth in exports from Wales since 1999 was greater than in all the rest of the UK put together. That is a good record under Labour.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Perhaps the Secretary of State will take off his rose-tinted glasses. Under Labour, more than 100,000 more people are economically inactive in Wales than the entire population of Cardiff. In the past year, the number of long-term unemployed has more than doubled. Welsh gross value added has gone backwards compared with the rest of the UK, and Wales is the poorest part of the country. What effect does the Secretary of State think that that is having on the social fabric of Wales?

Mr. Hain: The difference between this, the deepest recession that Britain has faced in generations, and the much lighter recessions that the Tory Governments completely failed to deal with in the 1980s and 1990s in Wales is that people are now being helped out of difficulty and the economy is starting to recover. It is recovering much more quickly than people expected, and much more quickly than the doom merchants on the Conservative Benches who have been talking Wales down have been saying it would. That is because we have adopted active government policies to invest in jobs and support businesses, rather than turning our backs on businesses as was done in the Tory 1980s and 1990s.

Mrs. Gillan: I do not live in the 1980s; I live now. Given the importance of employment in agriculture, is the Secretary of State concerned that under Labour, gross value added per capita for Welsh agriculture has fallen by more than 68 per cent., or more than two thirds? This shocking decline is worse than in any other part of the United Kingdom. Is it not a fact that the legacy of Labour in Wales will be more unemployment, more poverty, more debt and a devastated rural economy?

Mr. Hain: The problem is that hundreds of thousands of people in Wales had to live in the 1980s and 1990s under a Tory Government. That is why we are determined to prevent the Tories from inflicting such misery on them again. The hon. Lady does not acknowledge that there are now 93,000 more jobs in Wales than when we followed the Tories into power, despite this being the most difficult recession for 60 years. That is a record of Labour success against Tory failure.

Funding and Finance for Wales

5. Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the operation of the Barnett formula in Wales. [308874]

8. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What assessment he has made of the recommendations of the Holtham commission on funding and finance for Wales; and when the Government plan to implement the recommendations that they accept. [308877]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Holtham report made it clear that, although funding is currently at a fair level, spending allotted to Wales could decline in relation to that of England. That is why I have fought hard for an historic new commitment from the Treasury on funding, to prevent the people of Wales from being disadvantaged in the future.

Nia Griffith: I fully recognise the autonomy of the Welsh Assembly Government in determining specific spending priorities. What can the Secretary of State tell me, following his discussions with Welsh Assembly Ministers, that will reassure my constituents about the overall level of funding available for public services in Wales?

Mr. Hain: I remind my hon. Friend, the House and the people of Wales that the Welsh budget has more than doubled under Labour, going up from about £7 billion to nearly £16 billion next year. Again, that is a fantastic record compared with the Tory years. Spending on health services in Wales has more than doubled, for example, and there are now more nurses, more doctors and more health workers. That is a record of Labour's success that should reassure my hon. Friend, but we must protect Wales's budget in the future.

Mr. Llwyd: Now that there is irrefutable evidence of the unfairness of the Barnett formula, the time is surely right for a new formula to be devised on the basis of need. The Secretary of State said that he had an understanding with the Treasury, but Ministers have always been able to argue for more money for their Departments. What we really need is a fair structure. Can we not work together to achieve that?

Mr. Hain: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his modesty. Before Christmas, he told a media outlet that his favourite literary character is Superman. "Is it a bird? Is it a plane? No, it's the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy!"

I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I am happy to work with him, because the issue is one for Wales as a whole. To his and his colleagues' credit, they have asked questions about the Barnett formula. The formula has worked fairly up to now, as the Holtham commission said, but we need to ensure that it works fairly in future. That is why the formula and the agreement I got with the Treasury for assessing the allocation to Wales under the comprehensive spending review have to be refined to protect Wales's future.

Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend accept that as well as moving to the fairest possible system for the allocation of finances, we must understand that the problem with formulae is always unpredictable year-on-year fluctuations? We have seen that in local government, police, health service and other formulae. Will he ensure that any new system makes sure that there is predictable income year on year, whatever the elements on which it is based?

Mr. Hain: As always, my right hon. Friend makes a very telling point. This goes to the heart of the issue, which is that the Holtham report showed that although Wales had been treated more or less fairly, under seriously large increases in public spending we could see a convergence between Wales and the English average, which would disadvantage Wales against those areas of England that are most comparable with it, particularly the north-east. That is why we needed a new approach that underpinned the Barnett formula with an assessment that ensures every time that Wales is not disadvantaged—it puts a floor, as it were, under convergence—which is what I have achieved.

Road Accidents

6. Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): How many road traffic accidents there were in Wales in the latest period for which figures are available. [308875]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wayne David): The number of people killed or seriously injured in 2008 was 1,395, which is 31 per cent. lower than the average in the period 1994 to 1998. In 2008, 7,783 road accidents involving personal injury were reported in Wales. We are taking steps to reduce road traffic accidents still further. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are far too many private conversations taking place in the Chamber. The House must come to order, and I know that it will want to listen to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling).

Mr. Pelling: The debacle last winter of clearing the roads of snow and ice is perhaps being repeated this winter, with the roads up the valleys in south Wales being closed. Is it safe for my constituents from Croydon, Central, some of whom are Welsh and want to visit relatives, to visit Wales at this time?

Mr. David: The Government in all parts of the United Kingdom are taking drastic action to ensure the greatest free movement of traffic possible. As far as the Welsh Assembly Government are concerned, an announcement has been made that stocks are held for motorways. They are ensuring that stocks that are available for motorways are, if necessary, being made available for local authorities to help with other roads in Wales.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): The travel conditions in the snow at the moment are important and we all appreciate the difficulties. However, going back to serious measures that deal with road traffic accidents in Wales, I am sure the Minister will join me in congratulating the Welsh Assembly Government on their initiative to reduce speeds outside schools to 20 mph. That is a really important initiative that helps to save lives.

Mr. David: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct. The Welsh Assembly Government and police forces are working together in Wales on a number of initiatives to improve safety generally, and the one she cites is a very good example. Action is being taken outside a number of schools in Wales to ensure that there is the smallest possible chance of accidents, and it is proving to be extremely effective.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Statistics show that more than one third of all road traffic accidents in Wales in 2008, including 52 deaths and 372 serious injuries, involved young people between the ages of 16 and 25. Many of those accidents could be prevented by better training for young and newly qualified drivers. With that in mind, will the Under-Secretary meet me, other like-minded Members of Parliament and academics from Cardiff university who are involved in those issues, to see whether we can find ways to ensure that newly qualified young drivers can drive more safely, and thus reduce the tragic number of lost young lives?

Mr. David: The Government are making good progress on reducing fatalities and serious injuries. A 40 per cent. reduction target has been set and we are making good progress towards achieving it. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that we need to focus on young people, and the Government are doing that. I would be happy to have further discussions with him to see how that can be taken forward.

Future Jobs Fund

7. Mr. Dai Havard (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on the progress of the future jobs fund in Wales. [308876]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The £1 billion future jobs fund is already creating 4,300 jobs where they are needed most in Wales, including through the successful Merthyr Tydfil borough council bid, which alone will create more than 700 jobs in Merthyr and the nearby communities, helping many of my hon. Friend's young constituents to find jobs.

Mr. Havard: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer, which is in stark contrast to the abandonment of young people in the valleys by the Tories in previous recessions. What discussions will he have about economic regeneration and training opportunities to consolidate those that are available, so that the future jobs fund becomes an opportunity for future employment?

Mr. Hain: I applaud my hon. Friend's diligent application in supporting his constituents and his expert knowledge of the schemes. I am happy to continue to explore ways in which we can take them forward—they matter so much to Merthyr and areas such as my constituency.

I agree with my hon. Friend: I do not understand how the Leader of the Opposition can want to stop the future jobs fund and prevent funding from coming in to support young people, thus condemning them to the misery and unemployment that they suffered in the 1980s and 1990s under a Tory Government. That would be repeated if the right hon. Gentleman got power.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Despite the benefits of the future jobs fund—I pay tribute to it for the jobs that have been created in my constituency—45 per cent. of those unemployed are under 25. Does the Secretary of State share the concerns of the Prince's Trust about opportunities for young entrepreneurs to create businesses and jobs for the future?

Mr. Hain: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman. As he knows, one of the future jobs fund schemes is in Ceredigion. The Prince's Trust does fantastic work in Wales and elsewhere, and we should support its efforts to encourage young entrepreneurs to get themselves out of the crisis. That said, because of active Labour Government investment and the policies that we have pursued, youth unemployment is a third lower than it was in the early 1990s under the Tories. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is still far too much noise in the Chamber. It is unfair to hon. Members asking questions and, indeed, to Ministers answering them.

Youth Employment

9. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the First Minister on assisting young people into employment; and if he will make a statement. [308878]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wayne David): We know that young people in Wales and throughout the United Kingdom have been hit particularly hard by the recession. That is why we quickly introduced measures such as the young person's guarantee and the future jobs fund—to help them to find work as quickly as possible.

John Robertson: Further to the questions asked by my hon. Friends the Members for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen) and for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Havard), my hon. Friend knows that when larger employers close, it has the social effect of well-paid jobs and apprenticeships being lost. What is he doing to ensure that well-paid jobs and apprenticeships are maintained in affected areas?

Mr. David: It is important to remember that some 54,000 young people have been helped into work in Wales through a new deal for young people and £1 billion has been set aside in the future jobs fund. Those schemes are creating real jobs for young people the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, including Wales. I find it strange that Opposition Members opposed both initiatives. We are adamant that the mistakes of the past in the 1980s and 1990s will not be repeated. We will not stand aside and allow our young people to be lost from work for a whole generation.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): But is it not the truth that this Government's approach to youth unemployment has been characterised by massive complacency and a failure to engage with the issue? When the Minister and the Secretary of State met for their friendly pint with the new First Minister last night, what practical steps did they agree on to rescue Wales's lost generation of young people—the tens of thousands of youngsters doing nothing constructive with their lives?

Mr. David: The most important thing to realise is that we will not repeat the mistakes of the Tory past. That is the lesson that we have learned here at Westminster, and that the Welsh Assembly Government in Cardiff are learning as well. We are working together in a spirit of partnership to make sure that as many people as possible are put back into work as soon as possible, and our progress is there for all to see. If the Tory policies were implemented, there would be far more unemployed people in Wales than there currently are.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Rhyl city strategy team on its successful bid for the future jobs fund, which will put 320 young people back to work in my constituency over the next six months?

Mr. David: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent work he has been doing. What is happening in Rhyl is a good example of what can be achieved through proactive government at local authority level, Welsh Assembly level and here at Westminster as well. It is an excellent example of what can be achieved when we all work together and we do not stand to one side. It is worth remembering, too, that unemployment in Wales is still 30 per cent. lower than at the height of the early '90s; we will not forget that.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [308855] Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 6 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Gordon Brown): Before listing my engagements, I am sure that the whole House will wish to join me in paying tribute to the soldiers who have lost their lives in Afghanistan since we last met. They are: from 33 Engineer Regiment, explosive ordnance disposal, Sapper David Watson; from 2nd Battalion the Duke of Lancaster's Regiment, Corporal Simon Hornby; from 1st Battalion the Royal Anglian Regiment, Private Robert Hayes; from the Parachute Regiment, Lance Corporal Tommy Brown; from 3rd Battalion The Rifles, Lance Corporal Christopher Roney and Rifleman Aidan Howell; and from 4th Regiment Royal Military Police, Lance Corporal Michael Pritchard. Our thoughts are with their families and friends, who can be rightly proud of the courage, dedication, bravery and sacrifice shown by these men. That sacrifice will never be forgotten. We have been reminded once again since the House last met that there are those who seek to harm us through terrorist incidents. We must remain vigilant and ever grateful to all those serving in Afghanistan and around the world working for the safety of the British people.

I know that the House will also want to join me in sending our condolences to the wife and children of David Taylor who, sadly, died on Boxing day. He was a tremendous constituency Member of Parliament who thoroughly deserved the accolade of Back Bencher of the Year for his tireless work for the people of North-West Leicestershire. He will be greatly missed, not only by his family, who are here in the House today, but by colleagues in Westminster and all his constituents.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Donohoe: I would of course endorse all that my right hon. Friend says about those who have made the sacrifice of dying for their country while fighting in Afghanistan. I also want to say something about those in the west of Scotland who have died as a result of taking heroin, all harvested in Afghanistan, and to pay tribute to my hon. Friend and comrade, David Taylor, who served in this House assiduously and gave his all in his constituency as well.

If I may turn to the question, will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister give us an update on the situation in respect of the terrorist incident that took place on the plane travelling from Schiphol in Amsterdam to Detroit?

The Prime Minister: The whole House will echo what my hon. Friend says about the damage done in our country by drugs that come from Afghanistan, and I would be very happy to meet him to talk about those issues.

Since the Christmas day incident in Detroit, we have, as the Home Secretary reported to the House yesterday, taken a number of actions in key areas. In aviation security, the first of a new generation of full-body scanners will be in operation at Heathrow within a few weeks, and then, over time, in airports across the United Kingdom. Although the person who was involved in the Detroit incident was refused a visa and was on our watch list, we are nevertheless reviewing and enhancing our watch list arrangements, and given the changing nature of security, I have asked the Cabinet Secretary to ensure that any lessons that can be learned from recent events are considered and to examine whether we can further co-ordinate and integrate the work of the intelligence services and better make that work available to us.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): May I join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to the seven British servicemen who have lost their lives since the last Prime Minister's questions? They were: Private Robert Hayes, Sapper David Watson, Rifleman Aidan Howell, Lance Corporal Tommy Brown, Lance Corporal Christopher Roney, Lance Corporal Michael Pritchard and Corporal Simon Hornby. They died serving our country, and we must always honour their memory and look after their families.

I also join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to David Taylor and his contribution to public service. We, too, send our condolences to his wife and children. He was diligent, decent and determined. As one obituary brilliantly put it, he "was that rare thing among politicians: someone who was liked and admired equally by his constituents, his parliamentary colleagues and his political opponents."

He will be sadly missed.

This year the Government will have to borrow £178 billion. Yesterday, one of the largest holders of Government debt warned that British debt is likely to be downgraded. The OECD, the CBI and the Bank of England have all warned that there is no proper plan to deal with the deficit. Why does the Prime Minister think that all those people take that view?

The Prime Minister: First of all, let us put this in context. The debt of every country has risen as a result of the global financial recession, and debt in Britain is actually lower as a percentage of national income than that of America, lower than in France and Germany, lower than in Italy and Japan, and lower than the average for the euro area. So every country faces the difficulty of taking itself out of recession while having to develop a deficit reduction plan. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that we will not stop the fiscal stimulus before we are out of recession, and we will not take his advice and leave the economy without the necessary support. If we had taken his advice, many thousands more would be unemployed and many thousands of businesses would be lost.

We have published a deficit reduction plan—[Interruption.] Yes, it includes raising the top rate of tax. I assume that the right hon. Gentleman now supports that. It raises national insurance so that we can fund our health and public services. I assume that he has to consider that as well. It does not include cutting inheritance tax—costing £1.5 billion—for the 3,000 richest families in the country. It includes cuts in some of the major Departments, but it includes defending the front-line services of health, education and policing. He asks me about public spending this week after he said that it was the year of change—he changed his policy in the morning, he changed his policy in the afternoon and he changed his policy in the evening.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister talks about the context. The context is the biggest budget deficit of any advanced economy in the world. Let us be clear about what these people say about the Government's plans. The CBI says that the Government's plans are "too little too late". The Governor of the Bank of England says that "there is not a credible plan".

The OECD says that

"more ambitious plans…would strengthen the recovery".

Howard Davies, the man whom the Prime Minister appointed as the head of the Financial Services Authority, said that

"the loss of confidence in the Government's ability to get the public finances back under control" is

"The major risk"

facing this country. And he said that after the utterly feeble pre-Budget report. So let me ask the Prime Minister again: why does he think that all those people think that his plans are so feeble?

The Prime Minister: The Governor of the Bank of England said:

> "The very significant policy actions taken in recent months will…stimulate a recovery in demand, output and employment."

The IMF said that the UK

> "has shown a lot of leadership"—

[Interruption.] That was the managing director of the IMF. It also said:

> "The UK authorities' policy response to the deep recession…has been bold and wide ranging…The aggressive actions by the authorities have been successful in containing the crisis and averting a systemic breakdown."

I could go through the others. The OECD said that the "fiscal stimulus" has "cushioned the downturn."

It comes down to this: if we had taken the right hon. Gentleman's advice, there would have been no action and unemployment would have risen much faster. If we had taken his advice, the 200,000 small businesses that have benefited would not have done so. If we had taken his advice, we would be back to the '90s mortgage misery with repossessions. The Conservative party got wrong every decision on the recession and the recovery.

Mr. Cameron: The fact is that the Chancellor is now taking our advice. He said that we can get growth only when we deal with the deficit. The Prime Minister tells us about his Fiscal Responsibility Bill, but it is completely feeble. What is required is not an Act of Parliament, but an act of political will—an act of courage. The man whom the Prime Minister appointed to the Bank of England said this about fiscal responsibility Acts. They are, he said,

> "acts…of the fiscally irresponsible to con the public."

Is not the reason for the lack of faith in the Government's plans that the Prime Minister is so personally incapable of admitting what everyone knows to be true: that there is a need for cuts to be made? On Sunday, he said that public spending will rise by 0.8 per cent. in real terms each year. Given that everybody knows that cuts in departmental spending are necessary, was that not just completely disingenuous?

The Prime Minister: The person who was misleading the public was the right hon. Gentleman on Monday, about a married couples allowance. He said one thing on Monday morning, something different on Monday afternoon and something different on Monday evening, and then the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), who floated the policy, the former leader of the Conservative party, said that he had a private assurance of £4.9 billion being spent. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to reduce the deficit, presumably he does not want to spend £4.9 billion on a married couples allowance. If he wishes to reduce the deficit, presumably he will go ahead with the national insurance tax rise that we are proposing. If he wishes to reduce the deficit, he will not go ahead with his inheritance tax proposal, which he now says is his only pledge. We are reducing the deficit with a plan that includes tax rises, departmental cuts and protecting front-line services. The Conservatives would be cutting education services, police services and the main services in the country. Their policies are a change—a change back to the economics of the 1980s. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I just say to Members on both sides that we are not on the hustings now?

Mr. Cameron: I wish we were. I wish this Prime Minister had the courage to call the election so we could get on with it. I have to say, what a lot of desperate rubbish from the Prime Minister. I thought that he might mention marriage, so let me say this to him. The difference between me and the Prime Minister is this: when I lean across and say, "I love you, darling," I really mean it. The only divorce that has taken place is between this Prime Minister and reality. Let us take his claim that spending is going up by 0.8 per cent. Is not the only way that he can make that claim by excluding capital spending, which he is actually cutting in half? Is that not completely disingenuous?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman talks about love and marriage, when he is the person who cannot give a straight answer on the married couples allowance: he cannot say, "I do," or "I don't," when it comes to the married couples allowance. As for the public, will he give us a straight answer now? Does his deficit reduction plan include £4.9 billion to be spent on the married couples allowance, £1.5 billion to be spent on inheritance tax and not going ahead with the national insurance rise? That is why everybody says that there is a £34 billion gap in his proposals. He cannot go round the country promising everything to everyone. He has got to face up to the facts: his policies are fit only for opposition, not for government.

Mr. Cameron: If the Prime Minister wants to turn this around and make it Prime Minister's questions, he should get on and call the election. Then there would be all the time in the world to kiss and make up.

The fact is that this Government are now deeply divided. Everyone knows that the Chancellor wanted to reduce the deficit more quickly. Everyone knows that the Business Secretary goes around the country privately attacking the PBR as a complete failure. Perhaps the Prime Minister could name one Back Bencher on the Labour side who stood up and spoke for his Fiscal Responsibility Bill last night. Not a single one. Does he not understand that a divided party without a proper plan is putting Britain's recovery at risk? Is that not the height of irresponsibility, and why is he always incapable of doing the right thing?

The Prime Minister: Let me just give another example for the right hon. Gentleman. Last night he was asked, "Are you committed to education maintenance allowances?" What was his answer?

> "Let's just say I'm not uncommitted to it".

He then said:

> "Well, we're in a state of quite severe flux on this whole area…so I can't give you a straight answer".

Is this an Opposition party ready for government? It should go back to the drawing board and think again.

Mr. Cameron: The fact is that the appalling state of the public finances and the Prime Minister's complete inability to have a proper plan show the great truth of British politics. He has had two years to demonstrate some leadership, and he has completely failed to do so. He cannot convince business or the financial markets, and he cannot even convince his own Chancellor. Is it any wonder that he ekes out his time as an unelected leader completely incapable of convincing the country?

The Prime Minister: He is going to have to do better than that. He is going to have answer some questions on policy some time. He got it wrong on the nationalisation of Northern Rock, he got it wrong on the fiscal stimulus for the recovery, he got it wrong on helping the unemployed, he got it wrong on helping home owners, he got it wrong on small businesses. He got every issue of the recession wrong. Nobody will trust him, not just on married couples allowance but on the economy at all.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): A year on from the devastating conflict in Gaza, which left 1,400 Palestinians dead, the siege continues. Humanitarian relief is hard to come by, and Gaza lies shattered. Although there were undoubtedly war crimes on both sides, does my right hon. Friend agree that what is now happening is the collective punishment of 1 million people? Will he now make urgent representations to ease the siege on Gaza as a critical step towards a peace settlement in that region?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and she speaks for many people. We must not forget the people of Gaza. I have raised with Prime Minister Netanyahu the speed at which aid and humanitarian assistance can get into Gaza, and we are pressing the Israeli Government to do more to get more aid in. I will look at exactly the points that my hon. Friend has made and see what more we can do in this new year. In the end, this will require a political settlement between Israel and the Palestinian state that gives Israel security and Palestine a viable economic state that it can manage. In the meantime, we must avoid unnecessary suffering.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I also add my own expressions of profound sympathy and condolence to the family and friends of the brave British soldiers who have lost their lives serving in Afghanistan since the House last sat: Corporal Simon Hornby, Lance Corporal Michael Pritchard, Lance Corporal Christopher Roney, Lance Corporal Tommy Brown, Rifleman Aidan Howell, Sapper David Watson and Private Robert Hayes.

I would also like to pay my own tribute to David Taylor, who sadly died during the Christmas recess. I was once one of the MEPs for his area, and he had a reputation then—and always has had—as an outstanding constituency MP and someone who always spoke his own mind. My heart goes out to his wife Pam and his four daughters.

Last weekend, the Prime Minister said that he was all in favour of aspiration. Could he explain to us exactly what is aspirational about a tax system that he has created in which the poorest 20 per cent. pay more from their income in tax than the richest 20 per cent.?

The Prime Minister: It was because of all these things that we introduced the tax credit system, which is the means by which we take people out of poverty. We reward work for people who are in work, and for people who pay income tax it removes their liability by giving them tax credits instead. It is the means by which we bring greater justice, take people out of poverty and make work pay, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will continue to support the tax credit system, which is an essential part of our tax and benefits system in this country.

Mr. Clegg: The Prime Minister talks about justice. He has not delivered justice or fairness in the tax system. He is the one who scrapped the 10p tax rate. It is his rules that allow a City banker to pay less tax on capital gains than a cleaner pays on wages. He is about to hit millions of average earners with higher national insurance bills. Where is the fairness, where is the aspiration, in any of that?

The Prime Minister: The aspiration is helping people into jobs, giving people the chance to earn a decent living, and ensuring that the tax system is fair.

Presumably the hon. Gentleman will now support our 50 per cent. tax on the bonuses of the banks. Presumably he will support the raising of the top rate of tax to 50 per cent. Presumably he will support the removal of pension tax reliefs, which we are carrying out as very much part of the deficit reduction plan. What we have tried to do is ensure that in these difficult times, as we make changes, the burden is shared fairly, which means that those with the broadest shoulders must pay more. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree with that.

Q2. [308856] Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I wish to pay my personal tribute to David Taylor.

My I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to my concern about apprentices aged over 26 at Stoke on Trent college, which is conducting urgent talks with the aim of securing the funds that are needed for them to continue their training? In the light of the recent National Audit Office report on former coal mining areas, will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to do all that he can to ensure that the Learning and Skills Council, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, the regional development agency, and the Department for Work and Pensions work closely with the college to find a solution, so that all apprentices can receive full funding?

The Prime Minister: It is our intention, even in these difficult times when companies may not be in a position to keep apprentices on, to find alternative sources of employment for them and ensure that the colleges can continue to train them. However, I will examine the specific issue that my hon. Friend has raised. As for the coalfields regeneration programme, the National Audit Office's recommendations have been acted on, and funds from the programme have already been allocated. Stoke-on-Trent has received £3 million, more than half a million pounds of which has been committed to projects that will provide training for individuals.

I hope that my hon. Friend will find some of the answers to her questions in the decisions that have already been made, but I will look into the apprentices question. In 1997 there were 70,000 apprentices, and there are now a quarter of a million. No Government have done more to revive the apprenticeship, and we will not allow the number of apprenticeships to fall during this recession.

Q3. [308857] Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): Given that 29 per cent. of jobs in Croydon are in the public sector, I am very worried about Government plans to move public sector jobs out of the south-east. In response to a question in the House, the Chancellor kindly said that there might be "compensatory steps". Has the Prime Minister any positive views on what those compensatory steps might be?

The Prime Minister: I know that the immigration department in Croydon is in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Obviously, we are looking into how we can reallocate some jobs that are currently in the south-east in a way that will both save money and spread employment across the country. The Lyons review suggested that 20,000 jobs be reallocated. That has already happened, and we are considering what more we can do. However, I think the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the work of the London Development Agency and the work that is done in London are a means by which we ensure that jobs are created in London. We are always thinking about what we can do to create more jobs in this capital city.

Q4. [308858] Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Cancer treatment waits have been effectively eliminated for my constituents because our NHS doctors and nurses have met exacting cancer care targets. Today, Macmillan Cancer Support reported that because more people are surviving cancer—which is excellent news—they are more prone to health problems when their treatment ends, and need practical advice. What can my right hon. Friend do to ensure that they receive that advice and help?

The Prime Minister: The Macmillan work is something that is very special in our country, and very much appreciated. I believe that because of the advances that we are making in cancer care—particularly if cancer is detected early and people are able to go through the screening process—many lives that would otherwise be lost are being saved.

I appreciate that considerable aftercare is necessary even after many years, and I am determined that we will continue to support it. However, I believe that the best way in which we can help to deal with the cancer problems in our country is to ensure that we do not lose the two-week guarantee that patients can see a specialist immediately, and that we move towards a guarantee that they will be diagnosed and given the answers within only seven days. That requires money, and it requires determination to spend the money in the right place. We are determined to do that, and I hope that no party seeks to abolish it.

Q5. [308859] Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): Given that technology is vital in allowing us to stay one step ahead of the terrorist threat, why have the Government cut spending on defence research by 23 per cent. over the past three years? Is not grasping at a couple of scanners and yet another review a case of too little, too late?

The Prime Minister: We have increased spending on security from £1 billion in 2001 to more than £3 billion, and we have increased counter-terrorism capability massively in this country as a result of making the right decisions. We have doubled the number of security staff, we have doubled the number of police who are associated with counter-terrorism work, and we are introducing the e-borders system, which is a means by which we can catch those people who are coming into this country. I do not think that any Government have done more to increase the counter-terrorism capability in this country, and that is right, because our first duty is the security of our citizens.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Given the somewhat disappointing finish to the Copenhagen conference, what action will my right hon. Friend be taking in order to keep up the momentum on this absolutely vital task of tackling climate change?

The Prime Minister: For the first time, the world was able to agree that we should not have a climate change policy that did not address the problems of rising temperatures, and the 2 per cent. limit was agreed by all countries. We also have agreement that countries will notify what they will do by 2020, and they have got to do so by 31 January. We are obviously pressing for countries to be in a position where they can reduce the amount of gigatonnes in carbon and greenhouse gas emissions from about the mid-50s in 2020 to the mid-40s. There has been greater transparency achieved, with every country agreeing to report what it is doing, but we have not yet got the international treaty that we need, and we have not yet got the announcement from all countries that they support the 50 per cent. reduction by 2050. That is work that is still to be done. I agree with my hon. Friend that we must now talk to all those countries that were reluctant to come into these talks with a view to getting a treaty to persuade them that a treaty is necessary. I think that she will see further announcements in the next few days about what we are going to do.

Q6. [308860] Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Bearing in mind the failure of Copenhagen and the current weather cycle, which clearly indicates a cooling trend—[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The more noise, the less progress we make. I want to reach other Back Benchers.

Ann Winterton: Will the Prime Minister reconsider the proposed wasteful expenditure of £100 billion on offshore wind farms, which will be incapable of delivering sufficient energy but will result in excessively exorbitant charges for electricity users?

The Prime Minister: The idea that the Conservative party could take a lead on climate change when they cannot even convince their own Back Benchers of what is necessary—[Laughter.] The Conservatives cannot make up their minds about nuclear. We are now the leading power in the world for offshore wind. We will soon be making announcements that will make it clear that massive numbers of jobs will come as a result of offshore wind. That is the right policy if we are going to have 15 per cent. renewables by 2020. I cannot understand where the Conservatives' energy policy comes from. If they take out nuclear and they take out offshore wind—and every Conservative local authority is opposing onshore wind as well—they have no policy whatsoever.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): It is now 27 months since people suffering from pleural plaques were denied compensation by the House of Lords. Can I ask the Prime Minister what work is being done across the whole of Government to redress this, and when we can expect some progress?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, a meeting of legal advisers took place in the past few weeks. I am meeting a group of MPs—I think he is part of it—in the next week. I hope to get a resolution to what is a very dreadful disease—asbestosis—and what we can do about it, and also to deal with the problem that arises from pleural plaques.

Q7. [308861] Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): Now that we face stagflation, what is the Prime Minister going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we are going to have the levels of inflation that we had in the Conservative years, he is completely wrong. Inflation is low in this country; we have kept it low for the past 12 years. The idea that the Conservative party is now going to run a campaign saying that our inflation is going to be the highest in the world is something quite ridiculous.

Q8. [308863] Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): Given the cold weather, yesterday's announcement of the boiler scrappage scheme is particularly welcome to the fuel-poor in my constituency and positively welcomed by companies such as Zenex which are at the cutting edge of such technology. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will not only promote that excellent scheme but encourage retrofitting, which companies such as Zenex can do, and do well, to reduce our carbon footprint?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The boiler scrappage scheme will help 125,000 households and is already showing that it is popular and will cut carbon emissions. Retrofitting measures such as insulation will play an increasingly important role.

I must also draw people's attention to the fact that cold weather payments are being made to people who are affected by the cold weather right across the country—in many areas, including London, from 4 January. Some 6.9 million payments of £25 a week have already been made. We are doing our best to help people through the difficult winter weather, and we will continue to do what we can to ensure that elderly people in particular will turn up their heating and not allow themselves to suffer from the cold.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Given that the severe weather, which has hit my constituency badly, is predicted to continue for the next five days, what action are the Government taking now to make sure that supplies of salt and grit—including the stockpiles held by the Highways Agency—get to where they are needed most?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady is absolutely right. I think the whole House wants to be assured that, in this difficult period of weather when some areas are more hit than others, those areas that need to grit roads will have the salt necessary to do so, and all the support that other local authorities that are not so affected, and central Government, can give them. I assure the hon. Lady that salt supplies have been built up as a result of what we discovered and did last year. At the same time, I can announce that there will be greater co-ordination of the distribution of salt, so that those areas that need that salt will not be denied it. I hope that I will be able to reassure her constituents that they will get the salt and the grit that are necessary.

House of Commons Reform

Q9. [308864] Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What recent representations he has received on bringing forward proposals arising from the report of the Select Committee on Reform of the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister: The Leader of the House has written to representatives of the other parties on this issue. The Government are keen to proceed on a consensual basis.

Mr. Allen: UK politics has become ever more the private playground of Governments and the media, and this place, Parliament, an ever more tatty backdrop, with little independence. Will the Prime Minister take the powers that he has to bring forward to our agenda—not for debate, but for decision—the proposals to reform this House? Will he please do that in the next few weeks?

The Prime Minister: It is in all our interests to say that both the standard of debate in this House and what is discussed in this House should reflect the views and values of the people of this whole country. All of us want in this new year to make sure that the House is discussing the issues that matter to people.

We welcome the Select Committee report. I know that my hon. Friend has taken a long-standing interest in these institutional reforms. The creation of a Back-Bench committee, a business committee and party ballots—all these are being looked at in detail. The Leader of the House has made it clear that we will have an opportunity to debate them in due course and to discuss the recommendations.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): In due course? We have been waiting for weeks. Is that not typical of this Government and this Prime Minister? He made a big announcement on 10 June last year that we were to have urgent reform of the House of Commons, but when it comes to action the Government act with all the dispatch of a particularly arthritic slug on its way to its own funeral. Will he tell us whether he is still committed to urgent action on reforming this ineffective and incompetent House, or are there people on his own Benches who are stopping that from happening?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman gives me a great deal of hope that the consensual approach will work! I think that he is part of the talks. The talks are taking place. The issues about the creation of a business committee, party ballots for Select Committee membership and ballots of the whole House for Select Committee chairmanship were recommended by the Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). We are now discussing these issues, and they will form the subject of a debate and decisions by this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should be grateful if Members who are leaving the Chamber would do so both quickly and quietly so that we can proceed with our business.

BILLS PRESENTED

Damages (Asbestos-related Conditions) (No.2)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, Mr. David Anderson, Mr. Michael Clapham, Mike Gapes, Rob Marris, Siobhan McDonagh, Jim Sheridan, Shona McIsaac, Mr. Chris Mullin and Judy Mallaber, presented a Bill to provide that certain asbestos-related conditions are actionable personal injuries; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 5 February, and to be printed (Bill 34).

Employers' Liability Insurance Bureau

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Mike Gapes, Rob Marris, Siobhan McDonagh, Jim Sheridan, Shona McIsaac, Mr. Chris Mullin and Judy Mallaber presented a Bill to make provision for the creation of an employers' liability insurance bureau comprising an electronic database and a fund of last resort; to make provision about employers' liability insurance; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 5 February, and to be printed (Bill 35).

Land Use (Gardens Protection Etc)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Shona McIsaac, Rob Marris, Mr. Virendra Sharma, Siobhan McDonagh and Mr. Chris Mullin, presented a Bill to make provision for the protection of gardens and urban green spaces; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 26 February, and to be printed (Bill 36).

British Museum Act 1963 (Amendment)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Mr. Edward O'Hara and Rob Marris, presented a Bill to amend the British Museum Act 1963 to permit the transfer of artefacts in the British Museum; to confer powers on the Secretary of State to require the transfer of artefacts in specified circumstances; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 26 February, and to be printed (Bill 37).

Sheltered Accommodation (Residents)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Judy Mallaber, Mike Gapes, Rob Marris, Mr. Virendra Sharma, Mr. Edward Timpson, John Austin and Shona McIsaac, presented a Bill to make provision for residents in sheltered accommodation to challenge certain local authority budget decisions which affect them; to ensure that funding provided by central government to local authorities for sheltered accommodation warden services is not allocated to other services; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 5 March, and to be printed (Bill 38).

Human Rights Act 1998 (Meaning of Public Authority)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Mike Gapes, Rob Marris, Mr. Virendra Sharma, Shona McIsaac, Mr. Chris Mullin and Judy Mallaber presented a Bill to clarify the meaning of 'public authority' in section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 5 March, and to be printed (Bill 39).

Illegally Logged Timber (Prohibition of Sale)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Mike Gapes, Rob Marris, Mr. Chris Mullin, Judy Mallaber and Barry Gardiner, presented a Bill to prohibit the sale in the United Kingdom of timber and wood products that were obtained or produced illegally in their country of origin; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 12 March, and to be printed (Bill 40).

Torture (Damages)

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin, Rob Marris, Siobhan McDonagh and Mr. Chris Mullin, presented a Bill to make provision for actions for damages for torture; and for connected purposes.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 23 April, and to be printed (Bill 41).

Armenian Genocide Remembrance Day

Presentation and First Reading (Standing Order No. 57)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Clive Efford, John Austin and Rob Marris, presented a Bill to introduce a national day to learn about and remember the Armenian genocide.

Bill read the First time; to be read a Second time on Friday 30 April, and to be printed (Bill 42).

Point of Order

12.36 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may have heard the rather dramatic news just now that a former Secretary of State for Defence and a former Secretary of State for Health have called for an immediate ballot on the leadership of the Labour party and the future of the Prime Minister. Do you consider that this might affect the order of the business for the rest of the day?

Mr. Speaker: The short answer is no. If memory serves me correctly, the hon. Gentleman will fairly soon be marking 18 years in the House of Commons as the Member for Lichfield, and I therefore feel sure that he knows as well as I know that that was not a point of order.

Video Recordings Bill (Allocation of Time)

12.37 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Siôn Simon): I beg to move,

That the following provisions shall apply to the proceedings on the Video Recordings Bill—

Timetable

1. Proceedings on Second Reading, in Committee, on consideration and on Third Reading shall be completed at today's sitting and shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption.

Timing of proceedings and Questions to be put

2. When the Bill has been read a second time—

(a) it shall (despite Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of bills not subject to a programme order)) stand committed to a Committee of the whole House without any Question being put;

(b) the Speaker shall leave the Chair whether or not notice of an Instruction has been given.

3. (1) On the conclusion of proceedings in Committee, the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without putting any Question.

(2) If the Bill is reported with amendments, the House shall proceed to consider the Bill as amended without any Question being put.

4. For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1, the Speaker or Chairman shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed;

(c) the Question on any amendment moved or Motion made by a Minister of the Crown;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded.

5. On a Motion so made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

Consideration of Lords Amendments

6. (1) Any Lords Amendments to the Bill shall be considered forthwith without any Question being put.

(2) Proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.

7. (1) This paragraph applies for the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 6.

(2) The Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question already proposed from the Chair.

(3) If that Question is for the amendment of a Lords Amendment the Speaker shall then put forthwith—

(a) a single Question on any further Amendments to the Lords Amendment moved by a Minister of the Crown, and

(b) the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown that this House agrees or disagrees to the Lords Amendment or (as the case may be) to the Lords Amendment as amended.

(4) The Speaker shall then put forthwith—

(a) a single Question on any Amendments moved by a Minister of the Crown to a Lords Amendment, and

(b) the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown that this House agrees or disagrees to the Lords Amendment or (as the case may be) to the Lords Amendment as amended.

(5) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown that this House disagrees to a Lords Amendment.

(6) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question that this House agrees to all the remaining Lords Amendments.

(7) As soon as the House has—

(a) agreed or disagreed to a Lords Amendment; or

(b) disposed of an Amendment relevant to a Lords Amendment which has been disagreed to, the Speaker shall put forthwith a single Question on any Amendments moved by a Minister of the Crown and relevant to the Lords Amendment.

Subsequent stages

8. (1) Any further Message from the Lords on the Bill shall be considered forthwith without any Question being put.

(2) Proceedings on any further Message from the Lords shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.

9. (1) This paragraph applies for the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 8.

(2) The Speaker shall first put forthwith any Question which has been proposed from the Chair.

(3) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown which is related to the Question already proposed from the Chair.

(4) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown on or relevant to any of the remaining items in the Lords Message.

(5) The Speaker shall then put forthwith the Question that this House agrees with the Lords in all the remaining Lords Proposals.

Reasons Committee

10. (1) The Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for the appointment, nomination and quorum of a Committee to draw up Reasons and the appointment of its Chairman.

(2) A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons shall report before the conclusion of the sitting at which it is appointed.

(3) Proceedings in the Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion 30 minutes after their commencement.

(4) For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with sub-paragraph (3), the Chairman shall—

(a) first put forthwith any Question which has been proposed from the Chair, and

(b) then put forthwith successively Questions on motions which may be made by a Minister of the Crown for assigning a Reason for disagreeing with the Lords in any of their Amendments.

(5) The proceedings of the Committee shall be reported without any further Question being put.

Miscellaneous

11. Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply so far as necessary for the purposes of this Order.

12. (1) The proceedings on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour after their commencement.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply to those proceedings.

13. Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee) shall not apply in relation to any proceedings to which this Order applies.

14. (1) No Motion shall be made, except by a Minister of the Crown, to alter the order in which any proceedings on the Bill are taken or to re-commit the Bill.

(2) The Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

15. (1) No dilatory Motion shall be made in relation to proceedings to which this Order applies except by a Minister of the Crown.

(2) The Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

16. The Speaker may not arrange for a debate to be held in accordance with Standing Order No. 24 (Emergency debates) at today's sitting before the conclusion of any proceedings to which this Order applies.

17. (1) Sub-paragraph (2) applies if the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before the conclusion of any proceedings to which this Order applies.

(2) No notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

18. Proceedings to which this Order applies shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

19. (1) Any private business which has been set down for consideration at 7 pm, 4 pm or 3 pm (as the case may be) on a day on which the Bill has been set down to be taken as an Order of the Day shall, instead of being considered as provided by Standing Orders, be considered at the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill on that day.

(2) Paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply to the private business for a period of three hours from the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or, if those proceedings are concluded before the moment of interruption for a period equal to the time elapsing between 7 pm, 4 pm or 3 pm (as the case may be) and the conclusion of those proceedings.

This is a short Bill designed to repeal and revise the provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984, including the offences under the Act. The offences were made unenforceable because of a failure to notify the offences and other provisions of the 1984 Act in draft to the European Commission in accordance with the technical standards directive.

Until the Video Recordings Act is repealed and revived, no new prosecutions can be made under the Act. This means that publishers of video games and DVDs can distribute their goods free of classification requirements, and retailers can sell or supply adult material, including explicit pornography.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): This matter was discovered some weeks ago. Have the Government caused an investigation to be held to find out why the European Commission was not informed about the draft?

Mr. Simon: The failure to notify the draft was in 1984, under the previous Conservative Administration, about whom I do not want to make cheap political points today. None of the Ministers or officials serving at the time is still in post. It was an unfortunate oversight, and we believe it to have been an isolated incident. What is important now is to rectify the situation, so that the current anomalous loophole, whereby inappropriate material can be sold to children without classification, is closed as soon as possible.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Minister accepts that it was down to a previous Administration. The practical cost to the House is an afternoon's business. He said that it was an isolated incident. Is he satisfied that it will not happen again, and that we will not waste hundreds of person-hours of this Chamber's time making the same mistake?

Mr. Simon: The Cabinet Office is looking to see whether this kind of thing might have happened on other occasions and, as far as we are aware, this is an isolated incident. As I say, the important thing is for the loophole to be swiftly closed today in this House, so that the protections that have been afforded to the public for 25 years by a very successful piece of legislation introduced under the previous Administration are enforceable once again—they have not been enforceable since August, when this oversight was discovered. I am sure that the House will agree that there is an urgent need for the legal protections to be reinstated.

[Mr. Simon]

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Minister says that there is a loophole and he talks about trying to make the law enforceable. According to the House of Commons Library, there were 81 successful prosecutions for offences under the Act in 2006 and 139 in 2002. Is he saying that those prosecutions were not valid at the time? Would they—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It pains me greatly to interrupt the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) but, as always, I am trying to be helpful. I listened with great interest to what he said, but I would not want the Minister to be diverted from the path of righteousness, and what has just been said over the past couple of minutes bears very little relation, if any, to the allocation of time motion.

Mr. Simon: I shall take your guidance, Mr. Speaker; I would be happy to discuss that matter with the hon. Gentleman later in our proceedings, but it behoves me to take the guidance from the Chair. May I say—this is in response to the hon. Gentleman's point, but I am attempting to keep my remarks to the motion—that this is the first use of the fast-track procedure, as recently recommended by the relevant House of Lords Select Committee? We are dealing with what used to be called an "emergency piece of legislation". This Bill does not change, in any way, the existing 1984 Act; it simply repeals and then revives it quickly in two short clauses, in order to make the existing Act enforceable, which is why we are seeking to deal with this quickly today with the minimum of delay.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): We agree.

12.42 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I do not wish to disagree with the motion, but I want to make a point on procedure. It is not good procedure for this House to proceed with Bills in a single day unless there are overwhelming reasons to do so. Such reasons are sometimes associated with national security and sometimes with urgent circumstances outside the House. There is a reason for our procedures in this House and a reason why we have a delay between Second Reading, Committee and Report: to enable matters to be properly considered in order and to ensure not only that Members who wish to contribute to the debate can do so, but that those outside the House are able to make observations on the Bill as it proceeds. I have no doubt that this is a simple tidying-up provision, and there is every indication that it will be supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It could therefore have been dealt with simply over the normal time period and in two chunks to enable us to maintain the principles of parliamentary procedure; I do not entirely understand why it should be dealt with in a single day. That is an exceptional way of doing business and there does not seem to be the exceptional need for such an approach on this occasion. We had several days prior to the Christmas recess when we could easily have slipped in the Bill's Second Reading and then proceeded in the normal way. Perhaps the Minister could tell me why that did not happen.

Mr. Simon: That could not have been done because the situation was caused by a failure to notify under the technical standards directive. In order for the provision to work, we had to notify it in draft under that directive. We did that three months before 15 December. The first day on which we could have had the First Reading was 15 December, and we did so. Today—the second day back after the recess—is the first opportunity that we have had to deal with this on the Floor of the House.

There are two very important points to make on why we are dealing with the Bill so urgently in one day. First, we are not changing the law in any way. The existing law has been debated using all the full procedures and has been in force for 25 years—it is only the enforceability that turns out not to have been enacted, and we need to address that.

The second point that I want to stress is that the lack of enforceability has serious consequences. Almost any kind of serious, explicit, violent, brutal, nasty DVDs and video games can be supplied at the moment to anybody—[Interruption.] I am sorry; that was a long intervention.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the Minister for that long intervention, which was helpful. I am grateful to him for explaining the constraints on First Reading. I am simply making the point that this is not an approach that I think the House should readily accept from the Government. It is not my intention to divide the House on this issue, or to do anything of that kind. However, we need to make the point that procedure exists for a purpose. If we can improve procedure so that we take less time on things that do not need a lot of debate, I am all for it—it is part of the modernisation of the House that we spoke about in Prime Minister's questions. However, we need the delay between Second Reading and the completion of the passage of a Bill in this House if we are to make good law, and making good law is what this House is about. It sometimes achieves very little in the way of that because of the curtailing of procedures. That is the only observation that I have to make and I hope that we can now proceed.

12.46 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I, too, shall be brief, Mr. Speaker, because of the guidance that you have given. I want to be reassured that when it comes to the substantive debate the Minister will deal with the points of substance to do with what has happened over the past 25 years, including the point made by the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies)—issues such as what has happened to those who have been prosecuted and whether they will be entitled to compensation. If the Minister will deal with those points, I shall be happy to support the motion.

12.46 pm

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): You are a reasonable man, Mr. Speaker, so I can only presume that your necessary intervention earlier was caused by my not explaining myself sufficiently. I shall try again to overcome the difficulty that there seemed to be the first time around.

I take the points made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath): we should not be having Acts of Parliament made in one day, with all stages debated on that day, unless it is absolutely necessary. The purpose of my initial intervention on the Minister, which I hope I shall be able to clarify in my short speech, was that, given that there have been hundreds of prosecutions under the 1984 Act as it stands, can we satisfy ourselves that the Bill is so necessary and urgent that it must go through all its stages in one day? I urge the Minister to clarify where we are with the prosecutions under the 1984 Act. If they are no longer valid and therefore need to be rescinded, I should have thought that that would be important.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I understand entirely the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, but will he bear it in mind that every day that we wait to bring the legislation back into force, people will legitimately be able to sell inappropriate material to minors? Local authorities are being prosecuted because they have sought, apparently erroneously, to prosecute people for doing what we would all agree is wrong. We need to get on with it very quickly. Does he not agree?

Philip Davies: I absolutely agree. In effect, that was the point that I was trying to tease out from the Minister in the first place. We need to know where we stand with existing prosecutions, because if they all have to be rescinded and if none of them now has any basis in law, we would need to do this all in one day. I hope that the Minister can explain that to our satisfaction so that we know the urgency of this matter.

12.49 pm

Mr. Simon: I shall construe your silence on the matter, Mr. Speaker, as consent that I might reply to the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) within the terms of this part of the debate. Prosecutions that occurred since the error was discovered in August will not have been able to proceed and will not be able to be instituted retrospectively. That is why—I think that this is what he was getting at—it is important to pass the Bill. As the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, not only does the situation continue with every day that goes past, but evidence from around the country shows that it is reasonable to assume that the problem will grow. The more people are not prosecuted for supplying very inappropriate material, the more people will see an angle through which they can make what one might call an evil buck. Over the past few years there have been between 100 and 200 prosecutions a year, on average, and a great deal of other activity, which might [illegible] prosecuted, is deterred by the enforceability of th[illegible]. I hope that I have answered the points raised by the hon. Member for Shipley.

On the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), we will deal with the substantive issues in greater detail in the Second Reading debate on this short two-clause Bill. It does not in any way change an existing Act. It simply repeals and revives. On that basis, I commend the allocation of time motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Video Recordings Bill

Second Reading

12.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Siôn Simon): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I thank the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and others for their encouragement. We live in an age where videos, DVDs and more recently Blu-ray discs constitute a hugely important part of every family's entertainment. Figures compiled by the British Video Association show that a record 258 million DVDs, Blu-ray DVDs and videos were sold in 2008, with a total market value of £2.3 billion. A further 79 million videos, DVDs and Blu-ray DVDs were rented in 2008. The number of films sold on video has more than trebled in the past 10 years from 61 million units in 1999 to 196 million last year. According to the British Video Association, 6.5 million DVD players were sold in 2008, taking cumulative DVD hardware sales since launch to 55 million—the equivalent of two players for every household in the UK.

Videos and DVDs are an essential element of domestic life in the 21st century, yet they are a relatively recent part of our cultural experience. The video recorder was invented in the 1960s and began to take off as a mass market phenomenon only in the late 1970s. In 1979 there were 200,000 video recorders in the UK but by 1984, when the original Video Recordings Act was introduced, over 4 million had been sold. Looking to the future—I am sure that hon. Members will make this point later—there is a definite shift in how we consume both video and video game content. The online distribution models are developing and will no doubt continue to do so at an increasing pace.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Is the Minister aware of any convictions that are currently being challenged or are the subject of an appeal as a result of what appears to be a defective process?

Mr. Simon: Certainly, there will have been prosecutions that were pending or in process when the defect, to echo the right hon. Gentleman's phrase, was discovered. Those will have had to be stopped once it became apparent that the law was no longer enforceable because of its non-notification. We have heard of a handful of putative—usually putative—appeals or claims for compensation against previous convictions, although all our advice tells us that such speculative attempts to exploit the loophole further are likely to be unsuccessful.

Although the online environment is clearly the future and is going to grow, we must not be dismissive of the traditional boxed product. Only yesterday, senior executives from Nintendo, Microsoft and Sony were all reported as saying that digitally distributed product is unlikely to overtake the boxed product for some considerable time to come.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): It is very nice to hear about the contribution that the industry makes to the British economy. Does the Minister intend, in his speech, to touch on the Byron review and the Government's commitment to prevent violent video games from falling into the hands of young people? Are the Government still committed to the conclusions of Byron? Will the recommendations be implemented in full? When will the Digital Economy Bill come before the House? It deals with all the other issues that the Minister cannot deal with in the context of the present Bill.

Mr. Simon: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, who is a tireless advocate of his views on the subject. Yes, the Government are committed to Byron and to child safety. The work of the Internet Watch Foundation and the Department for Children, Schools and Families-led group that has been set up in an unprecedented way across Government to look at all child safety issues online is very important, groundbreaking and central to what the Government are doing. As my right hon. Friend knows, those are matters not for today, but for the Digital Economy Bill, which is now in another place.

Keith Vaz: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way to me a second time. He talked about the boxed games. One of the concerns is that when people buy video games, there is not sufficient notice on those games that they have adult content, which is central to what the Video Recordings Bill hopes to do—to ensure proper enforcement. Is there anything in the proposal or in any measure that the Government propose to introduce in the near future that will ensure that when retailers sell such games, it is clear that they have adult content—that is, by increasing the very small notification on the box that it is an adult game?

Mr. Simon: As my right hon. Friend knows, child safety, boxed games, and good information that is readily understandable by the public when adult content is included in games or DVDs are central to our approach and to the Byron recommendation that content should be clearly labelled and that content unsuitable for children should not be made available for children.

However, that is not a matter for today. None of the provisions that we are discussing today in this short two-clause Bill will affect that in any way. The size of the rating symbols on the boxes is a subject which I know my right hon. Friend and I will discuss at length in the Committee stage of the Digital Economy Bill. I look forward to that, but it is not something that I should be diverted into discussing today.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): The Minister will be aware, as many of us are, that because of the length of time that it now looks likely the Digital Economy Bill will take in another place, there is a real possibility that time will run out to complete its passage through both Houses before the forthcoming general election. Given the importance of the specific issue raised by the Chairman of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, will the Minister give an assurance to the House that if time ran out, measures would be sought to find agreement so that at least that aspect, on which there is all-party agreement, could still get on to the statute book?

Mr. Simon: We have every intention of getting the Digital Economy Bill in its entirety on to the statute book although, as the hon. Gentleman knows, in order to do that, we will be partly reliant on the good will of members of his party and of the official Opposition—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Simon: I think I have made the point. We intend to get the legislation through before the election. If the hon. Member for Bath and his hon. Friends, and right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches, will help us with that, that would be the best approach for all concerned.

I shall make progress. As I said, we should not be blinded by the online future and discount the importance of the massive volume of boxed products that will continue to be sold in the UK.

The early 1980s saw the introduction, largely from America, of what became known as video nasties: videos that depicted acts of gross violence and violent sexual acts—acts so extreme that they caused concern about the potential effects of watching them on young people and vulnerable adults. In response, Parliament passed in 1984 the Video Recordings Act. That Act introduced a system for classifying video films and some video games according to their content, and a series of offences for supplying classified videos and video games to people under the age restriction. The 1984 Act also stopped the distribution of video nasties by ensuring that such films did not receive a classification and making it an offence to supply unclassified material.

Some 25 years on, it is clear that the provisions of the 1984 Act have worked to remove the worst material from circulation. For example, the British Board of Film Classification, the body appointed under the 1984 Act to classify videos and DVDs, recently refused to classify the highly controversial Japanese film, "Grotesque". The BBFC explained that > "the film has running themes of sexual assault, humiliation and extreme torture…and…presents the audience with…an unrelenting and escalating scenario of…sadism…(including sexual sadism) for its own sake."

The 1984 Act was introduced to remove such films from general circulation, and I am sure that all hon. Members will congratulate the BBFC on its often unpleasant work.

It is also clear that the system of classification that the 1984 Act introduced is well understood and well regarded by the public. Independent research conducted on behalf of the BBFC shows that 71 per cent. of adults make use of the classification ratings of films to guide their purchasing decisions at least some of the time, and that 46 per cent. do so before purchasing video games. In addition, out of a total of 3,900 film viewing occasions, those surveyed agreed 99 per cent. of the time with the BBFC's classifications. It is a good organisation, implementing a good piece of legislation that works, and it was with considerable regret, therefore, that we discovered in August 2009, during our preparations for the Digital Economy Bill, which, as hon. Members will know, is in another place for consideration, that the 1984 Act was no longer enforceable under UK law. The situation arose because of a procedural failure in 1984 to notify the European Commission of the Act's provisions in draft under the technical standards directive. I keep stressing "in draft" because we have to repeal the 1984 Act and revive it so that it can be notified in draft; we cannot notify an existing Act.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): In case anyone wishes to make a party political point about the issue, it may be worth noting that the legislation was not notified in draft because it was a private Member's Bill, not a Government Bill. Will the Minister elaborate on how the error was discovered in 2009 and, to return to the point, on when the Cabinet Office intends to conclude its audit of all Acts passed since 1984 in terms of their compliance with the technical standards directive?

Mr. Simon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, and I do not want to make a party political point out of the issue. That would be silly, and I am not going to do so. Nobody involved with the legislation then is a Member now, but I think that another reason why the error might have occurred is that the technical standards directive came in early in 1984 and the Video Recordings Act came out slightly later. They almost overlapped in their inception.

Mr. Vaizey: If I can help the Minister, I should say that the directive came into force on 28 March 1983 and the Bill was introduced on 11 November 1983, meaning that it had to be notified to the European Commission in about August 1983. The directive was therefore very new, and I think that Graham Bright, who introduced the Bill as a private Member, might be forgiven for not being completely à point with European law.

Mr. Simon: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his extraordinary parliamentary erudition, and for his help on the matter.

Mr. Don Foster: May I further help the Minister? While he is being extremely generous to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) on the Conservative Front Bench in relation to what happened in 1983 and 1984, will he also bear in mind that in 1993, many years later, the 1984 Act was considered again in great detail, when it was amended by the then Conservative Government, whose current party leader was at that time an adviser to the then Home Secretary? Surely by 1993 the omission should have been noticed.

Mr. Simon: The hon. Gentleman makes a very fair point, and he makes it more difficult for me to resist making cheap party political points at the expense of the Opposition. Nevertheless, I shall resist.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Just to be helpful, I might point out that the mover of the amendment to the Act in 1993 was of course Mr. David Alton, so perhaps the conclusion is that we all bear some responsibility.

Mr. Simon: I shall move on to answer the question from the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) about how the omission was discovered last year. The answer is that, as part of our preparation for the Digital Economy Bill, we were involved in a similar process of notifying to the European Commission the Bill's amendments to the 1984 Act—a similar process to that which the hon. Member for Bath suggests one might have thought would have happened in 1993 and 1994. On this most recent occasion during that process, it was noticed that the original Bill had not been notified.

Mr. Vaizey: Will the Minister help me? I think that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, has inadvertently been helpful, which is not a phrase that I often like to use—but we are all in the process of engaging with the Liberal Democrats. If the 1984 Act was amended in 1993, was the amendment notified to the European Commission; and is that aspect of the Act, therefore, still enforceable?

Mr. Simon: My understanding is—I am pretty clear—that none of the Act is enforceable, because the original legislation was not notified to the Commission in 1983-84.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): After everyone has been so helpful, I do not want to be unhelpful, but I am still puzzled, because the Library research paper on the Bill before us states that

> "the Government's legal advice appears to be that previous convictions under the 1984 Act are safe."

If there is a loophole and the 1984 Act is unenforceable, I do not understand how previous convictions under it can be safe. Will the Minister explain that point, please?

Mr. Simon: The convictions are safe in the sense that any attempt to seek any restitution against them would almost certainly fail in court. For instance, any appeal would be an out-of-time appeal, after 21 days, and therefore, although it would be technically possible to mount an out-of-time appeal, it would be very unlikely to succeed. If a criminal mounts an appeal because they have discovered a brief loophole in the law, they are pretty unlikely to receive a sympathetic hearing from a court. All our advice suggests that for a range of reasons like that, it is very unlikely that criminals and disreputable people will be able to exploit the loophole by seeking such restitution.

The purpose of the Video Recordings Bill, therefore, is very simple. It is designed only to repeal and revive the provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984 in order to make the criminal offences in the Act enforceable again. Until that has been done, no new prosecutions can be made under the Act and prosecutors cannot oppose appeals made in time against convictions. This means that publishers of videos, DVDs and 18-rated and R18-rated video games can distribute their goods free of any classification restrictions. Retailers can sell classified and unclassified adult material to any person, regardless of age, with limited statutory powers to stop or prosecute them. There is also a danger—although we think it slight—that past convictions may be challenged.

To their credit, the reputable makers and distributors of videos and DVDs have continued to submit their films for classification voluntarily, and reputable retailers have continued to abide by the age classification restrictions. Trading standards officers throughout the country, however, are coming across more and more cases of people seeking to exploit the loophole. Officials are uncovering more and more cases of unscrupulous people selling unclassified material or age-restricted material either by post or in outlets that are not licensed sex shops.

For example, law enforcement officials in Milton Keynes have had to return 550 seized unrated DVDs to a seller who is now free to supply them until the Act becomes enforceable again. To be clear, unrated means beyond the R18—potentially very unpleasant material. In Bournemouth, trading standards officers were unable to prevent a newsagent selling R18 and unrated hard-core sex videos, while in Conwy, law enforcement officers were unable to deal with seven cases of supplying 18-rated videos to children. In Edinburgh, five outlets supplying adult material could not be pursued by trading standards officers. These examples are just a few of the many being discovered by trading standards officers and law enforcement officers in every part of the country.

The longer this legal loophole is allowed to exist, the greater risk of harm being caused to the public by the unrestricted circulation of this kind of material and the greater the potential for the most extreme material to be supplied to children. It is therefore vital in helping to restore the public's faith in Parliament and the video classification system that we act quickly to restore the important public protections contained in the 1984 Act.

The Bill was notified to the European Commission on 10 September 2009 and the three-month notification period expired on 11 December 2009. The fact that we introduced the Bill on 15 December—the earliest possible date after the expiry of the notification period—and are using the fast-track procedure is a measure of how important the Government view the need for the VRA to be made enforceable again.

I know of the concern in this House and in the other place about the use of the fast-track process for legislation and the dangers involved in it, but the Video Recordings Bill provides a classic example of why fast-track legislation still has a role to play. There is a real problem that needs to be dealt with quickly in order to restore important public protections. The Bill does not introduce any new provisions beyond those with which we are all familiar and that have been successfully enforced for 25 years.

The Bill could hardly be simpler, consisting of only two clauses and a schedule. Clause 1(1) repeals the provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984 and then immediately revives them. Clause 2 refers simply to the short title of the Bill, its commencement and extent. The schedule contains transitional provisions that are designed to ensure that the repeal and revival of the VRA provisions do not change their effect or the effect of other documents that refer to them—in other words, it ensures that all administrative decisions taken previously under the Act still remain valid in law. This is needed to ensure both that all films do not need to be submitted for classification again and a seamless transition once the 1984 Act is revived.

In order to close the period during which offences cannot be prosecuted as soon as possible, the Bill is intended to come into force immediately on Royal Assent. Thus, in summary, the Bill does not introduce any new provisions or offences into the 1984 Act; it simply restores a system of classification that has been in operation for the last 25 years, which has worked to stop the circulation of the worst kind of video material. It is a system that is well understood and liked by a clear majority of the public and the industry. The Bill is essential to ensure proper protection of the public from the inappropriate supply of violent and sexual video material by making the offences under the 1984 Act enforceable again.

In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I hope that I can call on the support of the whole House to ensure its speedy passage through all its stages in the House of Commons today.

1.13 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): I am grateful for this chance to support the Government in seeking to pass the Video Recordings Bill. As the Minister noted in his opening remarks, we are here for some very peculiar reasons. In theory, we are debating a Bill that was enacted as long ago as 1984. The then Video Recordings Bill was introduced by Graham Bright, the then Member for Luton, South, who rose to become an extremely successful Parliamentary Private Secretary to an extremely successful Prime Minister, John Major. He introduced the Bill on 11 November 1983.

As is well known, the Bill was intended to address the problem of what were then known as "video nasties". Because videos were unclassified, it was perfectly legal to sell any kind of video without any restriction whatever. As the Minister noted, in the mid-'80s, video recorders—and therefore videos—were becoming all-pervasive, so there was a need to act because videos showing all kinds of unmentionable acts were freely available.

The approach adopted by Mr. Bright in dealing with this problem was ingenious. He introduced a system of classification, and what became illegal was not the selling of an obscene video but the selling of an unclassified video, or a classified video to an inappropriate audience. The test of whether somebody was guilty under the Act was extremely clear-cut. Before the Act was passed, the problem had been that the only available sanction to stop a video nasty was the Obscene Publications Act 1959. Almost by definition, that was a subjective and difficult test to pass. In fact, there were cases of juries clearing people who were accused of selling an obscene video because the jury clearly took the view that it was not obscene. Under the Video Recordings Act 1984 it was made clear that one could not sell an unclassified video. I shall go on to explain why the Act has been so successful—largely because the British Board of Film Classification, to which I pay tribute, has been extremely successful in implementing its provisions.

If any hon. Member has the time over the weekend—or perhaps they will have had time over the Christmas break—it is worth revisiting the debates on the Video Recordings Bill in 1983 and 1984. I am extremely grateful to Mark Taylor from the Library, who pulled out the Committee stages for me to have a look at. The Minister and I were both doing our O-levels at the time, so we may not have been that focused on the debates then taking place.

As the Minister said in his opening remarks, there is a salutary lesson here about how quickly technology changes and moves on. It almost quaint to read those debates, with people referring to the video recording industry as a "new and dynamic" industry; I suspect that most video recorders are now discarded or hidden away in attics. The Minister says that it will be a considerable time before film downloads overtake box sets, but I suspect that in a few years' time, DVD machines will be going the same way and we will be downloading films directly on to our televisions. I will come back to that problem in a few minutes.

The debate on the Bill took place at a time when the technology revolution was just beginning. It is breathtaking to see the changes that have subsequently taken place in our lifetimes.

It is worth reviewing some of the arguments for and against the Bill at the time. For example, there was a proposal to license video stores, which was rightly rejected as bureaucratic. There was also a debate about—[Interruption.] There are noises off, Mr. Speaker, which are distracting me from my carefully drafted speech. It is interesting to note—well, it is interesting to me, if not to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster)—that there were also calls for self-regulation of the video recording industry and suggestions that it should be given time to come up with its own system of regulation. I view that as interesting, because there are echoes of our current debate as the Digital Economy Bill goes through the other place and we are debating whether it is appropriate for the Government to regulate on internet piracy or whether there should be self-regulation by the internet service providers. As the Minister knows, we support the Government in bringing in legislation to crack down on internet piracy.

The debate was notable for other contributions, notably a maiden speech by a new Conservative Member for Norwich, which brings to mind the excellent maiden speech recently made by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Chloe Smith). The highlight of the Second Reading debate at the time was a fine and intelligent speech by one Matthew Parris, the then Member for West Derbyshire, who showed the flair and imagination that have been such a hallmark of his subsequently glittering career in journalism. I say all this in the full expectation that I will be written up in exceptionally glowing terms in his column in The Times this Saturday. While this House was sad to lose Mr. Parris, its sorrow was tempered by the election of his successor, who I may say has served the people of West Derbyshire, and this House, exceptionally ever since.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's very blatant tribute to his own Chief Whip is of great interest to the House but of no relevance to the Video Recordings Bill.

Mr. Vaizey: I would never dare to argue with you, Mr. Speaker, but I am a little hurt that you have stolen my punchline. I was, of course, referring to my Chief Whip, but there we go. There goes the joke. I had asked for the entire Committee stage of the previous Bill to be photocopied for me, and I was going to refer in some detail to those proceedings in 1983 and 1984. However, I shall take my lead from you, and pass over what I intended to be an extensive discussion of them.

As the Minister has made clear, someone forgot to tell Europe—or, more accurately, the European Commission—that the previous draft Bill should have been referred to the Commission under Council directive 83/189/EEC of 28 March 1983. That directive is more colloquially known—and referred to in my local pub, where we speak of little else—as the technical standards directive. That failure to refer the Bill to the Commission meant that the legislation became unenforceable. This was an error of Keystone Cops proportions, although part of me would like to think that it was a deliberate attempt to subvert the European project. I like to think of the Act standing alone, redoubtable on the white cliffs of Dover, saying something colloquial to the European Commission, such as, "We'll deal with our own pornographers, thank you very much." Sadly, however, this one last redoubt that has stood against Europe for the past 25 years is to be snuffed out today, because somebody told the Commissioners that we had not referred it to them.

Mr. Don Foster: I might have misheard the hon. Gentleman. Will he confirm that his understanding of the Bill that we are about to pass is that it does not involve Brussels imposing something on the UK, but instead achieves a position in which we can prevent the importation of material from other EU countries that does not have the certification that we require? Is this not therefore a case of the UK imposing things on other EU countries, and not the other way round?

Mr. Vaizey: No, that is not my understanding of the Bill. As I understand it, an Act passed by a sovereign Parliament is not an Act unless it has been approved by Brussels.

Mr. Simon: I want to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Act remains an Act: an Act of this Parliament is an Act of Parliament when it is an Act of Parliament. All that is in question is the enforceability of the Act, which remains on the statute book.

Mr. Vaizey: We are in danger of descending into sophistry. It is an Act of Parliament, but it is a toothless one unless it is referred to Brussels. That is the situation that we are in, but we are not having a debate on Europe and its encroaching powers. Through interventions on the Minister, we have asked how many other Acts of this British Parliament might be toothless, and we look forward to him telling us when the Cabinet Office will report on its audit of every single Act passed since the technical standards directive was put into force.

Keith Vaz: I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest—but he has not yet told us what grades he got in his O-levels.

Mr. Vaizey rose—

Keith Vaz: That was a sort of rhetorical question. I am sure you would have something to say if we were to discuss that, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned an audit of all the Acts since 1984. Does he have information to suggest that other Acts of Parliament have breached the European rules, or is he just speculating that some might have done so? It would involve an awful lot of work if the Cabinet Office were to go through every single Act of Parliament.

Mr. Vaizey: The Cabinet Office would not have to go through every single Act of Parliament. It would have to go through only those that have an effect on trade and the free movement of goods. The hon. Member for Bath made the point that the Act restricts the trade in videos and therefore has to be referred to the European Commission. I hear what the right hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) is saying, however. I know that his Government are keen to save money to protect front-line services, as they say, and perhaps he thinks that the Cabinet Office exercise is a waste of money. Nevertheless, it is going ahead, as the Minister made clear. The Minister hesitated in his response, saying that as far as he knew, no other Act had breached the requirement for reference under the technical standards directive. However, the audit is taking place, and we would like to know when it will be completed.

I want to say a word about fast-track legislation. I said that we supported the Government's aim of getting the Bill through, but I take note of the remark made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) that they should not assume, simply because we agree that this Bill is suitable for fast-track legislation, that any other Bill that they decide to fast-track will receive the same assent. However, we agree that this Bill should be fast-tracked, for the reason that the Minister gave—that an important Act that protects the public from unpalatable video content remains unenforceable and is being breached up and down the country. People are aware of the loophole and, as the hon. Member for Bath said, if we delay any longer, the breaches will continue. The Minister said that this would be an effective piece of legislation that could be implemented quickly; it was also debated extensively when it was first introduced.

I paid tribute earlier to the work of the British Board of Film Classification, and it is worth spending some time explaining to the House how the board goes about implementing the legislation. It awards an appropriate classification to video works, it provides clear consumer advice, and when necessary it removes material from a work. In extremis, it refuses to classify a work. I think that about 4 per cent. of videos submitted to the BBFC are unclassified or have cuts made. That figure is down from a peak of about 12 per cent. when the Act was first introduced, which shows that the Act works not only through the direct intervention of the BBFC but by implication, in the sense that people are keen to comply with the BBFC's guidelines before submitting a work to it.

Philip Davies: My hon. Friend puts a positive interpretation on those statistics, but will he concede that they might contain a slightly less positive message? The fact that the number of cuts and rejections has gone down so massively in the past 20 years might mean that although the content of the videos is just as bad as it ever was, the BBFC is now less keen to cut them than it was then.

Mr. Vaizey: I certainly concede that point. One can look at this from the perspective that the glass is half full, or that it is half empty, because tastes have changed. An example is the film "A Clockwork Orange", which was originally banned but is now available on video.

Mr. Whittingdale: I hesitate to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I believe that "A Clockwork Orange" was not banned, but withdrawn by Kubrick, because he was publicly blamed for certain attacks that took place, which the press attributed to the influence of his film.

Mr. Vaizey: I take my hon. Friend's correction. I cannot think of another film off the top of my head, but perhaps "The Texas Chainsaw Massacre" might—

Mr. Whittingdale: "Straw Dogs".

Mr. Vaizey: "Straw Dogs" is one that I almost mentioned. I have not seen it, but it was in the BBFC's briefing to me. I shall come to that film in a moment, as it is covered in my speech.

Obviously tastes change, and some films and videos that were unpalatable 20 years ago are now more palatable. For example, "Straw Dogs", an X-rated 1971 film that was originally rejected for video release, was accepted uncut for video release in 2002 with an 18 classification. "The Exorcist" was released uncut on video in 1999, and "The Texas Chainsaw Massacre"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we have had enough of this—

Mr. Vaizey rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been in the House for four and a half years. I am sure he knows that he needs to resume his seat. I was sceptical as to whether we needed to go round the legislative course of 25 years ago, but I am absolutely certain that we need no further evidence of the hon. Gentleman's expertise in cinema.

Mr. Vaizey: I concede your point, Mr. Speaker, but, yet again, you have torpedoed my next joke. Depressingly, I was going to cite the example of "Bridget Jones's Diary", a DVD that was, surprisingly, censored by the BBFC. I was going to make the joke that unless we pass this legislation rapidly, Richard Curtis might start putting out unsuitable DVDs, but I now I shall not.

The BBFC works closely with law enforcement agencies by providing classification evidence to ensure successful prosecutions. That co-operation is necessarily on hold while the Video Recordings Act 1984 is unenforceable.

There were several notable interventions in the Minister's opening remarks about the effect of the unenforceability of the Act on previous prosecutions, which fills me with concern. As far as I am aware, something like 2,600 prosecutions have been successfully carried out under the Act. He says that his Department has received legal advice that if people seek to overturn convictions they are unlikely to succeed, but I do not share his confidence. It appears to be based on legal advice that he and his Department have received that an appeal against conviction would be out of time. However, I assert to him that an individual seeking to overturn a previous conviction would not simply appeal against it—by definition, they would have been prosecuted under a unenforceable Act, so there would be nothing to appeal against. Instead, they would seek to set it aside. I am concerned about that.

The House is not in the habit of passing retrospective legislation. The last Conservative Government passed one piece of retrospective legislation—the War Crimes Act 1991, which allowed people living in this country who were guilty of war crimes in the second world war to be prosecuted. It is not a habit that we want to get into, but I counsel the Minister that his legal advice appears to be extremely ropy. For example, if a person has been convicted under an unenforceable Act—we concede that the 1984 Act is unenforceable—what do they do about their Criminal Records Bureau file? A CRB check on someone could show that they had been convicted under the Act, but they might want to get rid of that and apply to have the conviction set aside. Is it appropriate that the CRB should put convictions under the Act on people's files? That concerns me.

I would also be interested to know what the legal advice on compensation is. Of course, if people seek to set aside their convictions, that is one thing, but seeking compensation from the Government is quite another. What advice has the Minister received about what compensation might be available to people who seek to set aside those convictions? My hope—I do not have the necessary expertise in such matters—is that compensation would be de minimis if it was given at all.

The key point that the Minister tried to get across in his speech, and which we support him on, is that the 1984 Act is very much a live Act: it works and it is effective. Unlike many of the Acts and Bills that we debate in the House—one thinks of the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, which we debated yesterday—the Act has a real impact on consumers every day. He cited the opinion polls that show that 71 per cent. of people make use of classifications under the Act. There is mandatory labelling on the front and back of cases and any other surface of 5 cm or more, and videos must carry the BBFC age rating in words in a prominent position and in a specific size. In the case of box sets that contain differently rated works in one package, the classification of the highest-rated work must be printed on the outer packaging. The vast majority of video distributors include consumer advice to provide additional detail about a work's rating to enable parents to make an informed choice about their children's video viewing, so the ratings empower the consumer, particularly parents.

Keith Vaz: I am delighted that the Minister raises the issue of children. Presumably he is fully behind the recommendations of Tanya Byron. Those over 18 may choose whatever video or DVD they want, but we need to have measures in place that will protect children and young people from having access to violent video games.

Mr. Vaizey: We need to protect children from access to violent video games, films, television shows and books. The issue is not the genre—be it video game, film or video—but the content. That is what we must protect children from. I am flattered that the right hon. Gentleman already considers me to be a Minister. If he is that worried about a future Conservative victory, I hope he will join the rebellion currently being instigated by a number of ex-Ministers for a secret ballot—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I believe the hon. Gentleman has enjoyed a fair amount of latitude already this afternoon, and I seriously urge him to stick to the confines of the debate before us.

Mr. Vaizey: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The 1984 Act has been effective in dealing with under-age sales, and it is a vital tool in helping to ensure that children and young people do not gain access to products that are harmful and detrimental to their safety and welfare. Picking up the point made by the right hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), it is interesting to note that in the past two years, more than 200 cases of under-age sales have been prosecuted. That is an example of how the Act is working, and in particular of how it is being implemented to protect children. We often talk about protecting children in the abstract, but the Act is a real, live example.

The Act helps to deal with unofficial and counterfeit goods, and it is used to prevent supplies of counterfeit or pirate works and as a means of detecting unclassified works. It is therefore effective against unofficial products being put into circulation, and therefore helps to protect legitimate businesses from unscrupulous trading. The BBFC frequently gives evidence to the Federation Against

[Mr. Vaizey]

Copyright Theft and the Trading Standards Institute on whether a seized work has been classified by it for distribution in the UK. Even if traders of pirated products are not prosecuted on behalf of rights owners for conspiracy to defraud, or for copyright or trade mark infringement, actions can still be taken for illegally supplying an unclassified work or a classified work to an under-age person.

The Act helps to deal with the problem of parallel imports of video works from other countries. Those are normally in breach of it because they have not been classified or labelled for UK distribution. That is extremely useful to UK retailers and distributors who have acquired licences for sale in the UK and who wish to protect their businesses from unlicensed imports. The point again is that often, prosecutions are the tip of the iceberg. The fact is that people who seek to import videos and distribute them illegally in this country are put off by the provisions of the Act.

The Act can be a gateway to the discovery of other serious offences. Often, investigations that begin with a breach of the Act unearth other criminality such as obscene images, the proceeds of crime or illegitimate business dealings. It can therefore help to uncover unscrupulous businesses.

As the Minister indicated, although the Act remains unenforceable, it is heartening that legitimate makers of videos continue to comply with its provisions. Responsible members of the home entertainment industry, which includes distributors belonging to the British Video Association and games publishers, have continued to submit their works to the BBFC for classification. However, the BBFC is concerned that others are not doing so.

Mr. Don Foster: I join the hon. Gentleman in his praise of the industry. Is he aware that in fact, the number of products that have been submitted for classification since the problem arose has dropped significantly? There must be a concern that material is being produced and sold inappropriately and unclassified.

Mr. Vaizey: Mr. Deputy Speaker, you were not in the Chamber when Mr. Speaker continued to anticipate my every remark. Now that he has left the Chamber, that role has been taken by the hon. Gentleman, because I was about to say that the BBFC is concerned that submissions have decreased significantly. There was an 11 per cent. reduction in September 2009 and 20 per cent. in October 2009. He is not even listening to me now, but there was a reduction of 38 per cent. in only the first half of November 2009. That is an extremely worrying trend.

There are numerous examples of distributors blatantly disregarding the law because they know that it is unenforceable. For example, in Bournemouth, trading standards officers cannot prevent a newsagent from selling R18 and unrated hardcore sex videos or two unlicensed sex shops from selling unrated DVDs. There are examples throughout the country: Brent, Cheltenham, Conwy, Dorset, the highlands, Havering, Islington, Luton, Manchester, Milton Keynes, Powys and Southampton have all reported examples of retailers distributing unclassified works because they know that the 1984 Act is not enforceable. As the Under-Secretary said, some local authorities are even being pursued through the courts for carrying out in good faith what they believed to be their statutory obligations.

We have made it clear from the outset that we support the Government's intention to pass the Bill as quickly as possible. Let me mention only two concerns on which, in a perfect world, we wish the Government had acted.

First, as the hon. Member for Bath said, the Digital Economy Bill will amend the 1984 Act and bring video games into a system of statutory classification using the European rating system known as PEGI—pan European game information. Broadly speaking, hon. Members of all parties support that. Everybody recognises that video games should be classified under a statutory system. The vigorous debate that took place between the British Board of Film Classification and PEGI about the appropriate rating system was played out and a conclusion, which Conservative Members support, was reached.

However, we assert that the Under-Secretary could have inserted relevant provisions in a draft Bill, which could then have been submitted to the European Commission in September and returned to the House to be enacted. To pick up on the point that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome made, although we support fast-tracking the Bill, we would have supported including provisions in a draft that was submitted to the European Commission and extending the debate on the measure. It need not have taken long—we could have had Second Reading today, Committee tomorrow and Third Reading next week.

I make that point because there is serious concern about the time available for the Digital Economy Bill. It is debatable whether we will even get a chance to discuss those provisions in this House. If the Under-Secretary responds by claiming that including those draft provisions in the Bill that we are discussing would have made a debate impossible, I say wait and see whether we even have a debate on those provisions, if and when they come before us through the Digital Economy Bill. I am not sending a hidden message. Conservative Members intend to co-operate on the Digital Economy Bill—although we take issue with some of it, it contains many important provisions that help the digital economy. However, in the circumstances, with the Prime Minister on the verge of toppling because of a rebellion by his—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I repeat my earlier remarks to the hon. Gentleman and remind him that we are dealing with one Bill at a time. At the moment, we are considering the Video Recordings Bill.

Mr. Vaizey: That is absolutely correct.

There is some concern that music and sports videos remain exempt from classification. Again, that exemption could have been removed in a draft submitted to the European Commission. There is overwhelming support for removing the exemptions. There is not a shred of logic or intellectual credibility to keeping music and sports videos exempt. Why should something be exempt just because it is of a particular genre? As I said to the right hon. Member for Leicester, East, we are worried about inappropriate content being distributed to minors and adults. Whether it is in a video game, DVD, film, a music video or something related to sport is irrelevant. The exemption is bizarre. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman agrees—he is nodding.

Keith Vaz: I do not agree that we are talking about the same thing. A film with inappropriate content is not interactive. The point about video games, which is backed up by research from America, is that the player is part of the process. Players shoot and stab people in a video game, and that is different. I accept that inappropriate content is wrong, wherever it is found, but video games are different.

Mr. Vaizey: I continue to assume that the right hon. Gentleman is against hard-core pornography and offensive content. For example, a video by the band Slipknot, which includes self-mutilation by teenagers, remains unclassified. Before we get into a debate on censorship, I am not saying that that content cannot be viewed by responsible adults, or that the video by Mötley Crüe, which depicts a George Bush lookalike with a prostitute, could not be viewed by responsible 18-year-olds. However, I think that all hon. Members agree that it should not be viewed by a 10-year-old, and should therefore be classified so that parents know, if their 10 or 11-year-old comes home saying, "I've got the latest Mötley Crüe video," exactly what it could contain. It is extraordinary that music and sports videos are exempt. We will continue to press for the removal of that exemption. However, we are where we are; the Bill has been introduced in its current form and we do not intend to stand in its way.

I end with a wider point about what the Bill omits, and ask whether we are closing the stable door after the horse has bolted and whether, by considering a Bill that applies to a venerable Act—25 years old—we are missing the point. I ask that because of the advent of the internet and convergence. Although the Under-Secretary said in his opening remarks that experts who retail such products believe that it will be "some considerable time" before the download of film overtakes the purchase and rental of DVDs, I counsel that that "considerable time" could be considerably shortened when one considers, for example, YouTube, which grew from nothing to being a global company in 18 months.

To pick up on the comments of the right hon. Member for Leicester, East about the Byron report, which focuses on keeping children safe in a digital world, I am genuinely interested in the Under-Secretary's thoughts about how and whether content should be regulated online. As he knows, an increasing number of video distributors submit their films for classification to the BBC for an online rating, but obviously more unscrupulous dealers do not do that. The legislation does nothing to ensure that there are any sanctions against people who distribute videos online.

The opportunity to respond to a Second Reading debate for the first time from the Front Bench has been thoroughly enjoyable. It has been a rollercoaster ride. There were a couple of clashes with Mr. Speaker, who took the punchlines of my best jokes, but I hope that I have covered the ground comprehensively and shown the reasons for the Opposition's support for the Government's fast-tracking the Bill today.

1.49 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey). I congratulate him on his maiden Second Reading speech from the Front Bench. It was fascinating and I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you were not present for the whole contribution. I feel—and I am sure the House feels—that we know so much more about the hon. Gentleman, especially his encyclopaedic knowledge of all the films and videos that have been produced in the past 25 years.

It must be a Minister's worst nightmare to arrive at his desk in Whitehall to be told by civil servants that an important Act is effectively illegal. An Act is an Act, as the Minister has said, but the news in respect of this Act was that it had not passed through the necessary European legislation hoops and that therefore the prosecutions under it for the past 26 years were, in effect, invalid. I do not know whether the Minister who is present was the Minister who was told that news, but if so, I would love to have been in his office as he received the advice. I must commend him, however, as I think he has dealt with this situation in an extremely calm and cool manner throughout, from how he responded to the first announcements just before Christmas to the way in which he has presented the Bill to the House. It is right for the Government to use this special method to try to get the legislation through the House, because the worst possible thing to do on discovering that an Act of Parliament is not, in fact, enforceable would be to allow that Act to remain on the statute book and individuals and companies to be prosecuted, and then to try to work out at a later stage exactly what to do about that very unfortunate circumstance.

The Minister has given us an assurance that the Government have brought the matter before the House as best they could in the circumstances. We will therefore deal with all the Bill's stages this afternoon, and, judging by the number of Members attending this debate, we should deal with them speedily. By doing so, we might provide more time for discussion of the Digital Economy Bill, as the hon. Member for Wantage said.

In common with every other Member who has spoken thus far, I of course agree that we need to correct the error made 26 years ago, and I commend the Minister on not seeking to make party political points about why it occurred, as this could have happened to any Minister. We do not expect Ministers to have encyclopaedic knowledge of how the European Union works. Ministers operate in accordance with the advice given to them, and clearly over the past 26 years advice was given to Ministers suggesting that the legislation was fully in keeping with European law and was therefore enforceable.

I hope that when the Minister sums up he will tell us in greater detail precisely what will happen to those who have been prosecuted; he alluded to that during the discussion of the allocation of time motion. The question of compensation has been mentioned, and when this was announced I received a telephone call from the home affairs editor of The Times telling me what had happened. There is genuine concern among those who have been prosecuted over the past 26 years as to whether their convictions were valid, whether the sums paid in fines will have to be repaid to them and whether they might be re-prosecuted as a result of the new legislation. I am sure that it will not be retrospective legislation. We cannot say that everybody who has been prosecuted under the 1984 Act will have to be re-prosecuted—we do not know. It is extremely important that there is clarity on such issues if the House is to give the Government the benefit of the doubt and allow them to pass the Bill in the space of one day—or a few hours, in fact.

[Keith Vaz]

Let us be clear about what we wish to know. Will those who have been prosecuted be entitled to compensation, and if so, how much will they get? Will they be re-prosecuted? Do their convictions still stand, or are they expunged? What is the precise legal nature of this situation? I am sure that the Minister will have sought the advice of the Attorney-General and that she will have been very clear about where the Government stand in respect of an Act of Parliament that is found to be unenforceable. When the Minister sums up, I hope that he will tell us the answers to those questions.

My second point is about the general debate concerning video games. I am keen not to stray beyond the measures of the Video Recordings Act 1984, but there were some very interesting comments from the Front Benches about their commitment to ensuring that the thriving and innovative video games industry in the United Kingdom, and particularly in London, survives. I am not against what is being proposed, and I have never been in favour of censorship; I have always been very clear that those who are aged 18-plus should be able to buy and watch whatever video games they want. Those who are not sufficiently old should not be able to do so, however, and those retailers who are prosecuted under this Act must be dealt with very severely indeed.

I say that because I disagree with the hon. Member for Wantage, in that I do not believe that watching a film is the same as participating in a video game. I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have very young grandchildren, and I have children aged 14 and 12. A huge amount of research has been done on the issue, and it has been found that half of all eight to 11-year-olds use the internet without adult supervision. I do not know how many Members present have children or grandchildren aged between eight and 11, but it is a real worry that a half of those in that age group are not supervised by adults when using the internet.

Some parents take the home computer out of their children's rooms and put it in a room where everyone has access to it so that they can watch over what their children are doing online. Parents have different ways of dealing with that issue, but the fact is that watching a violent film is different from participating in a video game. If a young person gets hold of "Modern Warfare 2", for example, they will be asked to participate in a terrorist attack; they will be asked to shoot at civilians in Moscow airport as part of the game. That is why the Russian Government have banned "Modern Warfare 2": they felt that in an age when we are trying to educate our children about the need to understand the dangers of extreme violence, we should not place in their hands, under the guise of entertainment, games that allow them to act in a violent way.

I am grateful to the Minister for what he said about the Digital Economy Bill coming before this House soon, and it is always the hope of Ministers that such Bills will come to the House from the other place quickly, but I have counted that we have just 35 working days from now until 31 March. Nobody knows when the next general election will be held, of course, but there are only 35 complete working days in which legislation can be addressed in this House.

Mr. Whittingdale: The right hon. Gentleman refers to "Call of Duty: Modern Warfare 2". It is already rated 18 and therefore it is already illegal to sell it to somebody who is under age, without the Digital Economy Bill needing to be passed. I do not disagree with the right hon. Gentleman on the necessity of passing that Bill, but there are already provisions in place that prevent children from playing that game.

Keith Vaz: Absolutely, and I would be the last person on earth to question the expertise of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport. The hon. Gentleman is right, but there are certain bits of that Bill that it would be helpful if we could implement. That is a recommendation of Tanya Byron. There is absolutely no point in the Government setting up an inquiry and receiving an excellent report from Tanya Byron if they do not then implement the report as a matter of urgency.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on this matter. I know that some people believe that the Liberal Democrats exist to provide consensus, but he is true to type, and he has made it clear that if there are bits of the Digital Economy Bill that we can all agree on, we should go ahead and get on with implementing them. If we can implement the Bill currently under discussion as quickly as we are doing, why should we not do so in respect of other measures? That would be far better than leaving decisions on which Bills will get through to an end-of-Session barney behind the Speaker's Chair between the Chief Whips of both sides. That is not the right way to make legislation. I hope that we can move forward on the issue.

The Byron recommendations must be implemented in full, as doing so will help to strengthen what the Government are trying to do enormously. As far as video recordings are concerned, I pay tribute to what the Government have done over the past few years. There has been a huge leap forward since I first took up this issue, along with others, after young Stefan Pakeerah, from Leicester, was stabbed to death in a park in Leicester in circumstances similar to those found in a video game watched by his killer, Warren Leblanc. I know that the judge in that case said that there was no connection, but the mother of the young boy stabbed to death felt very strongly that there was. Following subsequent meetings with two Prime Ministers and many Ministers, the Government have pushed forward on the matter.

I welcome what the Government have done, but it remains the case that any Member of the House can walk into any video store subject to the Video Recordings Act 1984, pick up a box set and see a tiny—it is still tiny—reference to the age limit for those playing the game. Through various campaigns involving people on all sides, we increased the 18 certificate sign from about the size of a 1p piece to probably the size of a 10p or, possibly, 50p piece. Actually, we have always said that, as with cigarette packets, splashed across the front of a violent video game should be the fact that it has adult content—and good luck to over-18s who wish to buy it! That would bring the fact to the attention of retailers who might, sometimes inadvertently, sell the game to someone under the age of 18.

I was interested to hear the statistics put forward by the hon. Member for Wantage on the number of stores that have been prosecuted. I have been after those statistics for some time. They are good news. The last time some mystery shopping was done—Trevor McDonald on one of his ITV programmes sent in a load of under-18 mystery shoppers—they were sold video games for over-18s, but the stores were not prosecuted. I welcome the fact that the figures are quite high. We are going through the bother of trying to get the Bill through quickly, and we should send out a message that legislation passed by the House will be implemented and that those who break the law will be prosecuted.

Through no fault of the Minister, we find ourselves in the position of trying to repeal and re-enact a law originally passed 26 years ago. That is the fault of neither the Minister nor any other individual. The fact is that the Bill is before us today. I hope that we can make rapid progress and, in the near future, discuss the substance of video games and hear from the Minister on Second Reading of the Digital Economy Bill.

2.2 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): It is a great honour and privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), who serves with such distinction as the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee and has a clear personal interest in one of the key issues being debated today—video games. I was particularly delighted that he went out of his way to praise the video games industry. He is absolutely right in doing so: it is a vital part of this country's creative economy, which many people believe could be, with the relevant support, as important to the country's economy as the financial services industries have been. Many people have believed him to be interested only in condemning individual video games—he has gone on several crusades in that respect—so it was good to hear him praising the industry, as well as chastising it for some of the projects it has produced.

I was also pleased that the right hon. Gentleman picked up on a point that I made in an intervention on the Minister. Like the right hon. Gentleman, I have done the calculations on the Digital Economy Bill, which makes amendments to the Video Recordings Act 1984, and given the recent announcement that the time allocation in another place will be longer than originally anticipated, it seems highly unlikely that we will be able to get through all the stages of that Bill in this place before the likely date of the general election. Given that there is cross-party support for much of Tanya Byron's excellent report, I hope that the Minister can find ways to ensure that areas on which there is such agreement can be brought forward and put on to the statute book before the election.

I was also pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman pick up on a point made by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), to whom I shall turn in a second, about the successful prosecutions of those who have been selling inappropriate videos to under-age people—to children. It is right and proper that we praise, for example, the many excellent trading standards officers in local authorities around the country who have brought those prosecutions so successfully—if only other cases of under-age sales, such as those of alcohol, were prosecuted with such vigour! However, I am delighted that that is happening in this case.

I am always delighted to be involved in debates in which the hon. Gentleman has participated. I confess that it came as a complete surprise to hear that this was his maiden Second Reading speech as a shadow Minister. He seems to have been in his place as a shadow Minister for so long; it demonstrates how scarce is the legislation on matters within the portfolio of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. Had we been allowed, many of us would have liked to see legislation such as the Heritage Protection Bill, which would have given him an earlier outing on his party's Front Bench.

The hon. Gentleman occupied the crease for 36 minutes, during which he did a great deal, rightly, to praise the British Board of Film Classification for its work. However, he failed to praise it also for its work in speech writing—I recognised quite a large chunk of his speech from the excellent briefing notes that the organisation provided to all hon. Members likely to be taking part in the debate. However, he raised some important points, and I do not wish to repeat many of them, given that he occupied the crease for so long. We know why we are here and we know what the problem is.

As the right hon. Gentleman said, the Minister was generous in not seeking to gain party political advantage on where the error occurred, whether in 1984, in 1993 when the first revisions took place, or in 1994 when the second revisions took place. One might have expected the concern now discovered—about the provisions not having been reported to the European Union—to have been discovered at that time. Nevertheless, let us praise the current civil servants in the Minister's Department for finding the problem and helping the Minister and his predecessor to find a way to deal with it swiftly.

Swiftness is the essence of why we are here today. It is vital that we get back on to the statute book, as quickly as possible, legislation that provides protection against the sale of inappropriate material to children, and counters the ability of people to sell pirate DVDs and so on. We have all made it clear that we are keen to support the Minister in his desire to fast-track the legislation back on to the statute book and then, if there is sufficient time—I am increasingly concerned about that—to make subsequent amendments to it in light of, for instance, the introduction of the PEGI system for video games. There is support for that on both sides of the House.

Reference has been made to the case for amending the Video Recordings Act itself, something that we could have done today. It might have delayed proceedings, but it could have been an option. The hon. Member for Wantage made a point about some of his party's proposals for changes to the legislation. I would like an assurance that the issues raised will be dealt with in the Digital Economy Bill, so that there will not be a need to amend the Bill that is before us.

I share the concern expressed by the current shadow Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt), about DVDs and videos relating to sport, religion and music that do not carry ratings but which often contain material that many of us would think inappropriate, in particular for sale to young people. Such videos include self-mutilation, erotic dancing, sex toys, drug use and so on.

The Minister's officials have made clear a point that was not picked up by the hon. Member for Wantage. They have said:

> "Music, sports or religious videos lose their exemption from classification if they depict sexual activity, mutilation, gross violence or other practices likely to cause offence."

[Mr. Don Foster]

and that in those circumstances,

> "it is for the appropriate enforcement authorities to take action."

The implication is that there is no need for an amendment, because other bits of legislation could be used to prosecute people distributing such material. I would be grateful if the Minister could clarify that issue, because it is one that those in probably all parts of the House want to be resolved. My concern is to find out the means by which it is going to be resolved, or whether the Minister believes, as his officials appear to be saying, that there is no problem and that action can be taken under existing legislation.

I will not dwell on my second point for any length of time, because it has already been raised by the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies), who is no longer in his place, despite the fact that the race meeting to which he was hoping to go today has been cancelled because of bad weather. The hon. Gentleman rightly raised the issue of the degree of complacency—I choose my words carefully—that the Minister appears to have about people who have already been prosecuted under the Video Recordings Act 1984, which we now understand was not correctly enforced.

The Minister seemed to imply that the reason why he had been advised that there would be no redress was that people would be too late to make an appeal. However, as the right hon. Gentleman made clear—I think that the hon. Member for Wantage made a similar point—if the legislation was never enforced correctly, we are not talking about an appeal; rather, I suspect that we are talking about a very different legal process. Others have asked, and I, too, would be grateful if the Minister could give us clearer assurances about why he and his officials are correct in this matter.

Keith Vaz: If the law is logical—the Minister will know more than we do about that, because he will have consulted the Attorney-General—and there was, in effect, no conviction because there was no proper legislation, the money from any fines would have to be handed back. If anyone received more than a fine—I am not sure what the penalties are—there would have to be additional compensation.

Mr. Foster: The right hon. Gentleman makes a compelling point. Indeed, I noticed some months ago that he was reported in one newspaper as saying that > "if the act has never been brought into force, prosecutions under it are void. You cannot prosecute someone and convict them on the basis of legislation that has never been in force".

That seems very compelling indeed. I confess that I have so far heard nothing from the Minister to assure me that the right hon. Gentleman, with his great experience as Chairman of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, is wrong.

Mr. Vaizey: The right hon. Gentleman is also a distinguished lawyer.

Mr. Foster: The right hon. Gentleman is distinguished in many regards, but we will leave it to the equally distinguished, relatively new Minister to come up with an answer to those questions.

I want to pick up a point that I mentioned in an intervention and to take it a stage further. As I have said, the Minister rightly praised the many responsible retailers and producers who have continued to behave as if the 1984 Act were still in force. I add my congratulations to them. However, he also pointed out that there are some problems developing. The first, which I mentioned earlier, is that the number of firms seeking classification has fallen dramatically. Year on year to September last year, the reduction was 11 per cent., bearing in mind that for most of the year it was assumed that the 1984 Act was in force. It is therefore not surprising that by October the figure was 20 per cent. or that by the middle of November it was 38 per cent. There was therefore a significant reduction in the number of people who wanted their material classified.

Mr. Vaizey: Is the hon. Gentleman reading from the BBFC briefing?

Mr. Foster: Indeed, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because when he made that very point earlier, I looked at the briefing and intervened on him. He is absolutely right.

The other point, which has not been touched on so far, is that as I understand it—from the same, excellent brief from the BBFC—a number of councils and their trading standards officers are being pursued through the courts for carrying out what they thought in good faith were statutory obligations under the VRA. Clearly they were wrong: if the VRA was not in force and they were seeking to prosecute people for breaches of a non-existent Act, one can understand that those people might be aggrieved and seek redress from them. My question for the Minister, therefore, is, what assistance are the Government providing to local authorities in that position?

The third point that has already been touched on—again, by the Minister and others—is about the large and growing number of examples of places around the country where breaches, as they would have been if the law had been in force, of the VRA are taking place. The Minister cited Bournemouth, Conwy and Milton Keynes, while the hon. Member for Wantage referred to a number of other places. In Cheltenham, for example, law enforcement officers cannot pursue a newsagent selling R18 and unrated porn DVDs that are displayed above an ice cream display cabinet. In Manchester, trading standards officers have dropped three VRA cases involving 3,000 videos.

However, there are two examples that I want to draw to the Minister's attention in particular. The first is from Powys, where trading standards officers are unable to pursue seven cases of under-age video games sales. The other example is from Brent, where trading standards officers are unable to prosecute three high street stores for selling age-restricted video games to children. In both cases, as the right hon. Gentleman said, we are particularly concerned about the sale of inappropriate material to under-age young people.

Where those prosecutions have been dropped, I wonder whether the Department has taken note of its own explanatory notes, which point out that, even with the 1984 Act no longer on the statute book, there are other bits of legislation, such as the Obscene Publications Act 1959, that in certain circumstances could be used in respect of the sale of material to under-age people. Being interested in that point, I looked at the equally excellent briefing produced by the Library. In paragraph 2.2 of that briefing, the Minister will find the following reference to how the 1959 Act might be used in such circumstances:

> "The 1959 Act proscribes the distribution, circulation, sale, the giving or loan of obscene material. A point to make here is that at least some successful prosecutions under the 1984 Act could well have been made under the 1959 Act: pornographic material that might be legally supplied to an adult could be obscene if given to a child."

The briefing then quotes the case law on that issue, but my question is, given that there are, and will continue to be, outstanding cases where prosecutions could not now be taken forward under the re-established VRA, will the Department seek to provide support to those local authorities concerned, to see whether they could use other bits of existing legislation on the statue book to help bring prosecutions against those who have sought to abuse the loophole created by the error made back in 1984?

I made it clear—I repeat the point now—that the Minister is absolutely right to get the Bill on to the statute book as quickly as possible, in order to return the protection that the VRA brings and enable the BBFC and all the enforcement authorities to continue their excellent work to date. For that reason, we give the Minister our full support and hope that we get the Bill through quickly today.

2.19 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow all four previous speakers in what has been a remarkably harmonious debate. I do not intend to change that. This is an important measure, and I welcome the fact that the Government have moved so swiftly to close the loophole that has been identified. I will not dwell on how it came about, but I merely observe that the Government are very fond of blaming almost every ill in society on the actions of the previous Government, and this is one of the very few examples where there may be some merit in that claim.

I hope that the Minister will address the questions raised by the previous speakers about the consequences of the loophole, because I share their concern about the status of those who have been convicted over the course of the past 25 years and the possibility of their bringing actions for what now appear to have been unlawful convictions. I hope that he will spend a little more time on that subject when he responds.

I wish to make a few observations about the Video Recordings Act 1984. I always approach any such legislation with some suspicion, as I am fundamentally opposed to censorship. I believe that in a free society it is up to adults to choose what they wish to see, but there are two important qualifications to that. The first is that there will always be some material that is so unacceptable in its violent or explicitly sexual content that it is deemed to be damaging to people to view it. I accept that, and some examples have been given in the debate.

I shall return to that matter, but perhaps more important is the fact that while adults are free to choose, we have always accepted that children require protection. I join right hon. and hon. Members in paying tribute to the work of the BBFC. It is in the area of age classification that some of the most difficult decisions have to be taken. The film that required perhaps more cuts than any other, some time ago now, was "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles", because the distributor was keen that it should be given a certificate that meant children were able to see it. The BBFC felt that it contained inappropriate material, and there was lengthy negotiation. A lot of the controversy about films such as "The Dark Knight" and "Casino Royale" is about whether they should appropriately be 12 or 15.

The virtue of the 1984 Act was that it extended that protection, which already existed in cinemas, to viewing in the home. The Minister gave the statistics on the extent to which viewing in the home has taken off in the past 20 years. When the Act was originally introduced back in 1984, it was accompanied by a degree of what one can only call hysteria about video nasties, and it is worth reflecting on what has happened to some of the most notorious examples of films that were widely cited at that time.

The then Minister, Mr. David Mellor, named three films in the course of the debate. The first was "The Driller Killer", which was banned after the passage of the 1984 Act but then released uncut in 2002, and last night I checked and found that it is available on Amazon for £3.98. The second was "Zombie Flesh [illegible]s". That, too, was banned under the Act but then released uncut in 2005 and can now be found on Amazon at £5.98. The third was "I Spit On Your Grave", which was also on the list of prosecutable movies until 2001 but was then released, although with substantial cuts made by the BBFC, and is now widely available. Perhaps the most remarkable example is a film that was on the Director of Public Prosecutions' list of films that were banned, Sam Raimi's "The Evil Dead", which at the time was regarded as wholly unacceptable but, indicating how tastes change, two years ago was given away free with copies of The Sun as a promotional move.

There is no question but that tastes change and we have become more liberal, which I welcome. However, as I said, there will always be films that go beyond what is generally regarded as acceptable. The Minister mentioned one particular film, "Grotesque". Two films were banned by the BBFC in 2008. The first was "Murder-Set-Pieces", described as having scenes in which > "a psychopathic sexual serial killer…is seen raping, torturing and murdering his victims".

The second has the unlikely title of "The Texas Vibrator Massacre"—I leave its contents to the imagination of hon. Members. I shall return to those two films in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) made the important point that there are loopholes in the existing legislation, which existed for good reasons at the time. It was not regarded as possible that a video concerning music or sport could be unacceptable. That loophole has undoubtedly been exploited. I hosted a dinner that the BBFC gave in the House just before Christmas, at which it showed us examples of some of the material that is now available in music videos and sports games that does not require certification because of the loophole in the 1984 Act. I understand why the Government did not feel able to address that matter in the Bill, but I share the wish that has been expressed that the loophole should be closed, and I hope that it will be in the Digital Economy Bill.

[Mr. John Whittingdale]

The second main point that I wish to make is that at the time of the passage of the 1984 Act, the world was completely different. Mr. Graham Bright, the Member who moved Second Reading, said that he defined a video recording as

> "a video tape or video disc. It is thus a physical product."—[Official Report, 11 November 1983; Vol. 48, c. 525.]

Of course, it is now not necessarily a physical product. More and more video is being made available through online distribution, which at the time perhaps could not even have been conceived. We are seeking to address that through moves such as those by the BBFC to impose a voluntary system of regulation, but the films that we are concerned about are now very widely available. I return to the two that I mentioned, "Murder-Set-Pieces" and "The Texas Vibrator Massacre". I checked last night and found that both those films are widely available through file sharing sites. An internet search for either with the words "download" or "bit torrent" will bring up any number of sites from which one can obtain them. Equally, they are available through cyberlockers. Both are on Megaupload and RapidShare and can be accessed without any attempt to verify the age of the person downloading them. There is serious concern about how we can continue to protect young people when it is now so easy to obtain such films.

We will debate the matter at greater length when we come to the measures against piracy through illegal file sharing that the Government are proposing to take in the Digital Economy Bill. It is worth remembering that it is not just protection of copyright that is at stake when we consider file sharing. There is equally the concern that it is being used to circumvent the protections that the House has put in place. In the most extreme cases, as I am sure the Minister will be aware, child pornography is being widely distributed through illegal file sharing. That is another reason why I share with other hon. Members the view that it is important that we get the Digital Economy Bill on to the statute book.

Having said that, I agree with the Minister that the majority of distribution of video content will still be through physical product for the foreseeable future, so it is certainly important that the Bill should be passed today and that we should reinstate the protections that we thought were already in place. However, there is a danger that we will be seen to be bolting the front door when the back door is wide open, and we will have to consider that in future.

That leads me to the more general conclusion that I suspect that there is nothing that this House can do to legislate to prevent the distribution of material online from sites that may be located on the other side of the world. When we consider what it is appropriate for people to view, we must remember that that is a matter for adults to decide. The most effective means that we can have to protect children is for parents to exercise responsibility, watch carefully what their children are doing and ensure that they are not obtaining access to content that could be damaging to them. I support the Bill, but I fear that it is beginning to look increasingly old-fashioned and outmoded given the extraordinary pace of development throughout the video sector.

2.30 pm

Mr. Simon: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate—and what a pleasure it has been. What a bijou gathering of wisdom and experience this is. Two Select Committee Chairmen, the venerable battler from Bath and my old friend from Wantage have all, in their different ways, made valuable, insightful and often entertaining contributions. Would that it were always thus.

We have already congratulated the British Board of Film Classification on the job that it does, by which we meant the job of classifying films, but I think I ought also to congratulate it on the job that it does in lobbying Members of Parliament and providing briefing for these debates. Rarely can the entire participating body in a debate have been so thoroughly and extensively briefed by a single organisation. I visited the BBFC's offices fairly recently and heard its arguments about one or two aspects that we may not see in exactly the same way, but I think we are in accord on most of the issues that Members, in their different ways, have discussed today: that is, the central issues. Let me deal with a few of them, hopefully not leaving out too much but also not using up too much time.

The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) could not quite resist making the anti-European point that the 1984 Act was clearly a single market liberalisation measure leading up to the Single European Act of 1985—that crowning, triumphant, extraordinary piece of Thatcherite European legislation that is the rock on which the European single market is founded, and the basis on which it continues to exist and derive so much prosperity for our countries and our Union. He mentioned several times—and other Members mentioned it as well—that the Cabinet Office had been looking into the issues. I cannot give him any more detail of who in the Cabinet Office has been doing what, but I can tell him that the need to ensure that the omission was an isolated incident and will never happen again is being taken very seriously.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who praised the zeal and efficiency of the DCMS officials who finally discovered the omission and set us on the road to where we have arrived today. If we are not keen—as I am not—to get into the business of allocating blame for causing the problem in the first place, I am sure we can all unite in wholehearted praise for the people who identified it and are helping us to solve it.

The issue of appeals and past convictions is a difficult one. It is not as simple as some Members seem to think. None of the questions involved has been tested in court. To date, the courts have dealt with no attempts to set aside past prosecutions. Successful prosecutions issued before the failure to refer the 1984 Act to the Commission were dealt with through due process, and as such they still stand. The courts are very reluctant to set aside convictions made years ago when the offence was proved and the defendant found guilty under an Act of Parliament passed by the House, only the enforceability of which has been invalidated by a technicality. The Act remains an Act of Parliament. It remains in force. Only the ability of the authorities to enforce is affected by the failure to notify under the technical standards directive.

We think that claims for compensation are very unlikely to succeed. There is no automatic right to compensation, and any legal right to it in these circumstances would be unprecedented. I understand the prism through which Members have viewed the issue. The hon. Member for Wantage claimed that I had been given bad advice. He described the move from the current boxed physical product world to the online world, and said that he was minded to give me better advice on that than I was currently receiving.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend has taken definitive legal advice from the Attorney-General, has he not? The fact that the granting of compensation in such circumstances is unprecedented does not mean that it is not right. Will he confirm that he was given that advice?

Mr. Simon: I have taken a great deal of my advice from my officials. I cannot tell my right hon. Friend from whom—in which other parts of Government and which parts of the Government Legal Service—they took advice, but their advice to me has been very clear. Although it is impossible to be certain, there is very little doubt on the issue.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend's officials may not be legally qualified. They may be the greatest people in the world, but my hon. Friend is a Minister in the Government and the Attorney-General is the chief Law Officer. I am not trying to trip my hon. Friend up; I am merely trying to establish the facts. If there were a problem relating to legality, surely the Department would have contacted the Attorney-General. It is not a secret. A question could have been tabled to the Attorney-General. Did the Government go to the Attorney-General and ask for her advice?

Mr. Simon: As I have just told my right hon. Friend, I took advice from my officials. By "my officials" I mean the legal officials in the DCMS. As I have said, their advice was very clear. They also made clear to me that they had taken plenty of legal advice from many different parts of the Government, and that, although there could not be certainty when there was no precedent, there was very little doubt. I am sorry, but I cannot tell my right hon. Friend whether the officials questioned the Attorney-General personally and specifically.

I am not sure whether I have fully covered the question of appeals and compensation, but in the absence of further interventions, I shall proceed to answer the questions about the potential for insertion of what might be described as the PEGI clauses of the Digital Economy Bill, which introduce the PEGI European classification system for video games in this country into this Bill.

One of the fundamental reasons why the House has considered the Bill, and why Opposition parties in both Houses have indicated that they consider it appropriate to fast-track it, is that we are not amending an existing piece of legislation which has been in force for 25 years. If the two main Opposition parties had come to us in advance and said "We think it important to include the PEGI clauses", we might have been able to discuss the matter, but I do not think that that happened. We needed to act swiftly, and, legitimately, to use the special fast-track procedure. Part of the reason for concertina-ing the House's usual precautionary procedures was that we were making no change whatsoever. The point is that we need to get the legislation repealed and revived so that it can be amended during the passage of the Digital Economy Bill.

Mr. Don Foster: I apologise for asking a question the answer to which I should really know. I accept the Minister's point as to why the Government have not adopted the PEGI system amendment in this Bill so that we could fast-track it, but can he give me an absolute assurance that, if necessary, the appropriate consultation with the EU is taking place in respect of the PEGI amendment that is being discussed in another place?

Mr. Simon: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance—that is happening, for sure.

Mr. Whittingdale: Is it the Government's intention to accept the other amendment that has been tabled to the Digital Economy Bill, which would remove the exemption for sport and music videos?

Mr. Simon: As things currently stand, we are not minded to accept that amendment, although I am not averse to talking about it. I take note of the uniformity of view on that matter, on the Labour Benches anyway. However, I know from my recent visit to the BBFC that it takes the strong view that we should make this change, and the BBFC is very influential in these matters.

Mr. Vaizey: I should remind the Minister that on Tuesday one of his own Back Benchers, the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), is introducing a ten-minute Bill that would bring about this exemption, so there is all-party support for it.

Mr. Simon: I take that point. I do not have a strong, dogmatic view on this. I have considered it, and on balance I have come down on the side that says that given that it is about where we draw the line, the vast majority of content in music and sport videos does not need to be classified in this way, to the extent that it would be an intolerable burden. That is a reasonable position, and that is where I stand. We are not currently minded to accept an amendment to the Digital Economy Bill to that end, although I do not take a dogmatic view on it.

Mr. Don Foster: During my speech I asked the Minister to clarify whether he believes that if such an amendment is not tabled there is still scope for prosecution of that type of material under other legislation.

Mr. Simon: The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) kindly referred to that. There is still scope for prosecution under the existing legislation because the exemptions apply only up to a certain level. There are several categories of content, at a certain point of which the exemption lapses. Roughly speaking, something like an 18-level content in a music video would need to be classified.

Hon. Gentlemen mentioned one or two examples of what seem like misclassifications. However, that is the road of argument by second-guessing, anecdote and example, and it does not take us very far. The issue would be about whether the video had been classified appropriately. The power already exists to classify extreme or 18-ish-rated music videos. Their comments are reasonable, but the fundamental point is that the place for us to have this discussion—I have no doubt that we will do so at great length and in considerable detail—is in the Committee proceedings on the Digital Economy Bill.

[Mr. Simon]

Several hon. Gentlemen—including the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford, with particular erudition and wisdom—talked about the internet and a future in which it will be incredibly difficult to regulate and legislate for these things. I take all those points but merely restate what I said in my opening remarks. The boxed market is still huge and will be so for a considerable period of time, and that is why it is so important that we use this procedure to close the loophole so that we protect the public in general, but particularly children, from the irresponsible retailing of unsuitable and inappropriate material.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time; to stand committed to a Committee of the whole House (Order, this day).

Video Recordings Bill

Considered in Committee (Order, this day)

[Sir Michael Lord in the Chair]

Clause 1

Repeal and revival of provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

2.45 pm

Mr. Simon: If the House will permit me, I will omit, in these circumstances, the usual courtesies attached to the beginning of a Committee stage, and move straight on to speak to the clause, which is at the heart of the Bill.

The purpose of the clause, as stated in subsection (1)(a), is to repeal all the provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984, which should have been notified to the European Commission in 1984. Subsection (1)(b) then immediately revives all those provisions, which have now been notified to the European Commission. As a result, it makes them enforceable again in law. The Bill and the 1984 Act were formally notified to the Commission in accordance with the technical standards and regulations directive, and it is necessary for the 1984 Act to be repealed and revived in this way to ensure that all its provisions are fully enforceable again. The failure to notify the 1984 Act was a procedural error under the terms of the directive. The purpose of the Bill is to correct the procedural irregularities arising from that omission and to restore the important public protections that the 1984 Act contains and that the public have come to expect regarding the sale of videos and DVDs.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 accordingly ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

Short title, commencement and extent

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Simon: Clause 2 merely sets out the short title, commencement and territorial extent of the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2 accordingly ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule

Transitional provision

Question proposed, That the schedule be the schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Simon: The schedule sets out the transitional provisions whereby a bridge is built between the 1984 Act spanning the lacuna of the time when the Act has not been enforceable, and into the future, when the status quo ante is restored. It also ensures that all consequent legislation and administration is kept in balance with the new legislation and the previous Act.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule accordingly agreed to.

The Deputy Speaker resumed the Chair.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Third Reading

2.49 pm

Mr. Simon: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[Interruption.] Understandably, I am being ribbed from sedentary positions by Opposition Members about what I might say about the Bill on Third Reading, given that we have considered it in so many stages so recently.

Mr. Don Foster: Will the Minister use this opportunity to answer the questions asked on Second Reading in respect of advice and support being given to local authorities?

Mr. Simon: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that; I did fail to answer that question, although not intentionally. Considerable advice and support are being given to local authorities. The Crown Prosecution Service has produced comprehensive guidance on all the relevant issues for local and trading standards administrations, and we are confident that that guidance will equip them to deal with the situation appropriately.

This Third Reading is a conclusion to the Bill. I need only repeat my gratitude to Members on both sides of the House, and particularly to the Opposition parties, which have supported us wholeheartedly as we have used this procedure to get the measure through the House very quickly. We have done that to restore the safeguards for people of all ages, but young people in particular, so that they are not harmed and outraged by the unscrupulous sale of offensive and inappropriate material.

In conclusion, as the Bill moves to the other place, I add a plea to Members there: debate on this Bill is not the appropriate time for discussion of the Digital Economy Bill, or even the detailed provisions of the Video Recordings Act 1984. This is an emergency, fast-track measure that, by its nature, could not be fast-tracked if it were amended. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) looks quizzical. In case he was "quizzicaling" at me, I should say that if the Bill were amended it would have to be renotified in draft again, and that would take another three months.

We need to do this quickly. We are grateful for the support that we have had across the House in getting it done quickly. I commend the Bill to the other place in that same spirit of urgency and seriousness.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed.

Sittings of the House

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business) shall have effect for this Session with the following modifications, namely:

In paragraph (4) the word 'eight' shall be substituted for the word 'thirteen' in line 42 and in paragraph (5) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 44;

(2) Standing Order No. 90 (Second reading committees) shall have effect for this Session with the following modification, namely:

In paragraph (2) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 21; and

(3) Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 29 January; 5 and 26 February; 5 and 12 March; 23 and 30 April; and 7 May.—(David Wright.)

2.52 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I beg to move amendment (a), line 1, leave out from 'That' to end and add—

'Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 8, 15, 22 and 29 January; 5 and 26 February; 5, 12, 19 and 26 March; 23 and 30 April; and 7 May.'.

It is a great pleasure, at long last, to get to this debate. I was rather surprised by the abrupt manner in which the Government moved their motion, which it has been clear for a considerable length of time that they do not want to discuss. Now that they have eventually been forced to discuss the matter, it has been moved formally. That is an extraordinary abrogation of their responsibility.

Getting this motion to the Floor of the House has taken an enormous amount of time and effort. It was originally listed on the Order Paper on 23 November 2009. On 30 November 2009, my amendment was on the Order Paper, and since that day the motion has been listed at the end of business every day with no chance of debate; it has been objected to by Members across the House each and every day.

Why on earth have Members had to object every evening to force this lame-duck Government to debate something so important to Parliament? What we have on the Order Paper today is an alteration to Standing Orders, particularly to Standing Order No. 14. I shall briefly remind the House what that Standing Order is about—the allocation of time in the House. Principally, it refers to the time that the Government have to organise business. Paragraph (1) says:

"Save as provided in this order, government business shall have precedence at every sitting."

So except in relation to the other business referred to by two parts of Standing Order No. 14, the Government always control business in the House. That is why we have not been able to debate this motion before.

Standing Order No. 14(2) relates to Opposition days. That has no particular bearing on private Members' business except in one respect. It says:

"two Friday sittings shall be deemed equivalent to a single sitting".

In other words, a Friday is looked on as a half day. In theory, business on Fridays starts at 9.30 am. However, in effect, right at the beginning of the day there is always a motion that the House should sit in private; on occasion I have been responsible for that myself. That involves a Division, which takes up 20 minutes, so we are probably talking about only four and a half hours of business on a Friday. It is that four and a half hours, mentioned in the Government's motion and in my amendment, that I want to discuss today.

[Mr. Peter Bone]

The Standing Order protects Parliament and Members of the House by giving 13 Fridays for private Members' business. There is no dispute about that; Standing Order No. 14(4) states:

> "Private Members' bills shall have precedence over government business on thirteen Fridays in each session to be appointed by the House."

There are no ifs, buts or ands: 13 Fridays in each Session are to be appointed for that purpose by the House. The problem is that at the moment the House does not have the power to do that; only the Government can bring those 13 days to this House.

There is no mention of applying a pro rata principle to those 13 days because there may be a general election in a particular Session.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of the Leader of the House of Commons (Barbara Keeley): I understand that the hon. Gentleman was elected in 2005, as was I, so he may not remember that it has been standard practice, during parliamentary terms that run to a fifth Session, to pro-rata or reduce the number of days for private Members' Bills. Motions with a similar effect were agreed by the House in both 1991-92 and 1996-97, having been proposed by the then Conservative Administrations. Does the hon. Gentleman want to comment on the fact that that has historically been the case since that time?

Mr. Bone: I anticipated that that would be the only reasoned objection put forward by the Government. Of course, to say that precedent is the reason why we should do everything the same is to make a pretty hopeless argument; according to that principle, there would be no point in our turning up at all. The hon. Lady has failed to mention the fact that Parliament's situation is totally different now from what it was a year or so ago. Parliament has fallen in the esteem of this country, and one of the reasons for that is the all-powerful Executive. The hon. Lady talked about private Members' business in previous years. I was going to talk about that later, but it seems appropriate to mention it now.

The House of Commons Library has produced a helpful booklet called "The Success of Private Members' Bills", which discusses the number of private Members' Bills that have gone through the House and actually become law. As the House will be aware, in the House of Commons there are three ways in which a private Member may get a Bill into law. One is through the ballot, another is by presentation under Standing Order No. 57, and the last is through the ten-minute rule.

In the period that the hon. Lady referred to, under the last Conservative Government—I am not trying to make a party political point here, but she did refer to it—49 private Members' Bills became law. So far, according to the Library, just eight have become law in this Parliament. That indicates that the Executive are exerting more and more control to get less and less private Members' business through the House. In fact, since the 2005-06 Session no presentation Bills and no ten-minute Bills have become law, whereas under the Conservative Government seven presentation Bills and seven ten-minute Bills became law. That shows that over that period there has been a dramatic decline in the level of success of private Members' Bills in this House.

That is because the Executive have become increasingly powerful, increasingly dominant and increasingly determined to get their own way, which is one of the things that people have objected to. Many people have said that Parliament is not relevant any more because the Executive just steamroller through what they want. Those statistics are a clear indication of that tendency.

One way to redress the balance is to have more time in Parliament for private Members' business: time has to be provided for it. I have already argued that the Standing Order says that 13 Fridays must be provided per Session for such business, which, as I have also argued, equates to six and a half normal days' debate. However, the motion before us, quite unnecessarily, reduces the number of days available in this Session for private Members' Bills. My point is that there is no need to do that.

My amendment would restore the 13 days that the Standing Order says the Government have to provide. It does nothing more than that; it just provides the 13 days, which are all Fridays. It does not adopt the Wright report suggestion of moving some private Members' days to Wednesdays. I have not suggested that any of the sitting Fridays should be in the spring recess—or, for that matter, in the anticipated Easter recess. Of course the Government have not told us when the Easter recess will be, and I am looking to the Deputy Leader of the House to see whether she wants to intervene and enlighten us.

Barbara Keeley indicated dissent.

Mr. Bone: The Government are deliberately and unnecessarily restricting the voice of individual Members of this House in speaking and getting legislation on to the statute book. As far back as 1949, private Members' Bills went through this House. In that year ballot Bill No. 21 got on to the statute book. So the situation has not always been what we have become accustomed to in the last few years—that only the first couple of Bills have any chance. In 1949 Major Simon Ramsay got the Slaughter of Animals (Scotland) Bill into law, and he came 21st in the ballot.

I know, however, that this Government believe that everything started in 1997, so let us see whether we can find anything in that era that was low down in the ballot but still got on to the statute book. Interestingly, a Bill in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) got on to the statute book, even though it was No. 19 in the ballot. That cannot be done if the House does not provide time for debate. That was in the 1998-99 Session, so it was in the era since "history" began. In 1999-2000 the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas)—No. 20 in the ballot—got the Protection of Animals (Amendment) Bill on to the statute book.

What we have today is complete chaos, and an unprecedented situation. The Government have refused to announce the days on which private Members' Bills will be heard. On 16 December, we therefore had the ridiculous spectacle of the Members presenting their Bills having no idea on what dates the Second Reading of their private Members' Bills would be allowed to take place. That is unprecedented, and a complete rejection of Parliament by this Executive, who think they can always get their way.

Barbara Keeley: The Members who presented their Bills may have had some idea, because they had seen the dates in the motion tabled by the Leader of the House day after day after day. Those dates were, with I think one exception, the ones that they took forward for their Bills.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Lady is right—and that was the behind-the-scenes skulduggery. That was the Executive exerting power over Members, saying "You will take these dates," even though this House had not agreed to that.

One Member—the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who is in his place—opted to take the next available date, and he was very sensible to do so. If my amendment is approved, his Bill is printed tonight and he lets the Table Office know that he wants to reinstate it, he will have Friday to debate it. So it is not quite correct for the hon. Lady to give the impression that this was a done deal. Yes, other Members were put under pressure. Through that procedure, which is very unfortunate, Members who have chosen their dates cannot move them back. In other words, if my amendment is accepted, Members who have opted for a later date cannot move back to an earlier one.

I have given some thought to that issue, and it seems clear that under Standing Order. No. 57, on presentation of Bills, it is possible for Members to bring very similar Bills that are already known to this House to the back of the Chair. They could then fill the dates that will become available if my amendment is passed.

My amendment does not remove any of the dates that the Government have provided, so people who are satisfied with the date they have can stick to it. However, those who want an earlier date would have an opportunity to take one.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Just to make the situation clear to those who will read this debate, my hon. Friend is suggesting that three spare Fridays in January—before the first one that the Government have proposed—are available, along with two in March. Is it not fair to say that the Government could easily have tabled a motion to suspend the rule, and taken a vote on it and on my hon. Friend's amendment, at any stage since Parliament returned for the new Session?

Mr. Bone: Indeed; I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention.

Let me address this issue in a little depth. It has not been sprung on the Government. They proposed this change in the Standing Orders—the motion before us—on 23 November.

A number of hon. Members, including me, have outlined the problem that the motion causes. On 26 November, I raised the matter in business questions, pointing out that on that very day the ballot for private Members' Bills was taking place, although nobody knew what dates had been allocated, and that the number of days allocated was set to decrease from 13 to eight. I argued that, in effect, the number had decreased to six because some of the dates that the Government had chosen were so late that clearly the general election would be upon us before they were reached.

On 10 December, the shadow Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who is in his place, brought up the issue in business questions when he asked why we were not having a debate on it. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, who speaks for the Liberals on business of the House matters and who is also in his place, has also raised this question. He has also raised the issue of the Wright Committee report, which has a number of things to say about the allocation of time for private Members' Bills. I might touch on that issue later, if I have time to do so. At the same business questions, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) brought that matter to the House's attention. I must pass on his apologies for not being here today. He would like to be participating in this debate, but the Government have clearly organised the business so that this debate is occurring at the exact time when he is leading a debate on immigration in Westminster Hall. I hope that he will have an opportunity to participate in this debate later.

I have also raised a couple of points of order on this issue; on 16 December, I pointed out that with the exception of that in respect of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, the Second Reading dates that were announced were not confirmed. I asked how Members were to know that they would be able to debate their private Members' business on the given day. I also took the opportunity—there seemed to be no other way of bringing this to the House's attention in any form of debate—to raise the matter in the Adjournment debate on 16 December. I was hoping that that would provide the Deputy Leader of the House with the chance to argue the Government's case on this matter, but again they did not take the opportunity to make a defence of their reason for cutting down the voice of Back Benchers. Today, when they had an opportunity to comment on it at the beginning of this debate, all we heard was "I beg to move". The situation is ludicrous. There is no defence for it and the Government should be ashamed. They should withdraw their motion, but I doubt whether they will do so.

Some people must be wondering whether I have some hidden motive, whether I am secretly hoping to get a Bill through or whether I am down the list on the ballot—I am not in the top 20. They might be wondering whether this is a political thing and whether the Tory party wants to get something through. That is hardly the case because only three of the first 12 private Members who came up in the ballot are Conservatives. There is nothing political about this; this is about Parliament having the opportunity to discuss private Members' Bills.

I am attracted to one or two Bills. I am attracted to the anti-slavery Bill put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) and to his work on tackling human trafficking, but that is not the issue here; the issue here is the time available. I am also attracted to a couple of the proposals relating to the Lisbon treaty.

[Mr. Bone]

That leads on nicely to why we must have ample time for debate. There are two reasons to introduce a private Member's Bill. The first is that a Member wishes to change the law. There have been numerous cases where worthy causes have been taken up and put on the statute book, but that can be done only when time is available. Time needs to be available for Second Reading, for the Committee stage and for Third Reading. I am afraid that if this motion is passed today, nobody will get any of their Bills on to the statute book.

Barbara Keeley: As the hon. Gentleman seems to feel so strongly about this allocation of time, can he tell us whether he is implicitly criticising the two previous Conservative Leaders of the House of Commons, who also reduced the number of sitting days in their fifth Sessions? In the 1996-97 Session, the number of sitting days to discuss these matters was also reduced to eight.

Mr. Bone: I am certainly not criticising any past Executive or any past political party. This is not about whether there is a Labour Leader of the House or a Conservative one; it is about the power of the Executive to stop private Members getting a say and getting their business through—that is the issue here.

Barbara Keeley: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can tell me what the difference is between reducing, on a pro rata basis, the number of days for considering private Members' Bills to eight in the 1996-97 Session, as proposed by the previous Conservative Leader of the House, and this motion. I see no difference.

Mr. Bone: I do not wish to criticise people who were in Parliament when I was not if I have no idea about what the situation was at the time. However, as I have said, a lot more private Bills got through under the Conservative Government; the relevant figure is 49. In 1996-97—the period during which the Deputy Leader of the House claims the time available was shortened—14 balloted private Members' Bills got on to the statute book. Whatever arrangements were in place then, there was plenty of time for private Members to get their business through and for Bills to obtain Royal Assent. That just will not happen under the current arrangement. I have outlined the figures, which show that the situation has been hopeless under this Government—I believe that two private Members' Bills got through last year.

Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend has dealt with the Deputy Leader of the House's point in a very fair way. What we have not heard from those on the Government Front Bench, either in an intervention or in a speech, is that the issue is whether 8, 15 and 22 January and 19 and 26 March could usefully be provided for the consideration of private Members' Bills. Perhaps it would be worth my observing that having listened to her I find that she is part of a Government—again, I am not being party political—who have claimed that the historic negatives should no longer rule. Most of their claims have not related to something that did not or did happen in the past; they have said that they have looked at new things. What my hon. Friend is suggesting is a new thing and she has not produced a reason why those five days should not be made available.

Mr. Bone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, with which I agree entirely. The Government would lose nothing by accepting my amendment, which would merely increase the amount of time that private Members would have available to them to bring business to this House. There are two reasons why private Members bring Bills to this House. As I have discussed, one is to get them into law. I am sure that some of the private Members' Bills that have been proposed by Labour Back Benchers have much merit, but I am worried that those Members will not have enough time to get the Bills into law and that this House will not have an opportunity to discuss them fully.

The other reason why private Members' Bills come before this House is so that an issue can be debated and the Government must respond on a substantive motion. We hold useful debates in Westminster Hall—I have referred to the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering is leading one at this moment—and very useful Adjournment debates, but they are not on motions that could become law. In addition, such debates are short and the half-hour debates tend just to have the relevant Minister and the Back Bencher speaking, so no real debate takes place. By comparison, when a private Member's Bill is considered there is a proper debate in this Chamber and everybody takes part.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I agree with my hon. Friend wholeheartedly, and he is doing a tremendous job, as ever, of defending the interests of Back-Bench MPs. Would he agree that one such private Member's Bill that is tabled for discussion in the next few weeks is that promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Carswell), the European Union Membership (Referendum) Bill? That is an issue about which many of our constituents are concerned. If the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) does not succeed today, the chances of that important issue being debated will probably be lost.

Mr. Bone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his helpful intervention. I will not be led down the path of arguing the merits or otherwise of being in this horrendous European Union. It would be wrong of me to do that. However, he is quite right to point out the problem about the debate. He talked about the European Union Membership (Referendum) Bill, promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Carswell). It is listed provisionally for Second Reading on 26 February. There is no problem with that, except for the fact that it is listed as motion 4 on that day and will never be reached.

More interestingly, and to be non-party political, let us take another Bill as an example: the Lisbon Treaty (Referendum) Bill, which also has much merit and is promoted by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds). It is also listed on 26 February; it is motion 3. Again, that will not be debated, or at least is unlikely to be reached.

Many issues are brought up by Members who want a debate rather than necessarily to get the law changed. They need time for the debates and on occasion the debates are embarrassing for those who sit on the Front

Benches of the political parties. I dare say that the Lisbon Treaty (Referendum) Bill will certainly be embarrassing for the Government—

Philip Davies: And the Lib Dems.

Mr. Bone: It will be very embarrassing for the Liberal Democrats and it will be interesting for those on my Front Bench.

Irrespective of the issue, we could consider in such a way all 20 Bills that have been proposed. The Debt Relief (Developing Countries) Bill sounds like a pretty important Bill and is listed as the first to be discussed on 26 February. Why not debate that Bill this Friday? Why not allow the time for the arguments to be heard and, if it is the will of the House, for it to get its Second Reading; to go to Committee and to come back to the House for Third Reading? I just do not understand why the Government have taken this view—

Barbara Keeley rose—

Mr. Bone: I am going to learn.

Barbara Keeley: I think that the hon. Gentleman is challenging the principle of having some non-sitting Fridays. On this side of the House, we believe that Members need time to discharge their duties in their constituencies as well as in this House. The system of non-sitting Fridays was introduced, I understand, on the recommendation of the former Conservative Chief Whip, Lord Jopling, and has been widely welcomed since its introduction by Members in all parties as they have that time to discharge duties in their constituencies. Given the difficulties that have gripped our constituencies—certainly mine—over the last couple of days due to the extreme weather, it is pretty important that Members should have the chance to get back there.

Mr. Bone: Fridays are important for constituency work, but I do constituency work every day of the week. We are talking about 13 Fridays a Session, and, basically, only the mornings of those days. I do not think that the hon. Lady's argument washes. She failed to say that on a Friday it is only Members who are interested in a particular Bill who turn up, and not the whole House. If the hon. Lady can guarantee that the whole House will turn up on the eight days that she has suggested, so it would be her motion that would give them the other Fridays off, I might be inclined to think again about the motion. Of course, that is not at all what the motion is about. The motion is about restricting the voice of this House.

The hon. Lady's helpful intervention leads me to "Rebuilding the House", the first report of the 2008-09 Session by the Select Committee on Reform of the House of Commons. It talks about the timing of private Members' Bills and states:

> "The House should be responsible for ensuring that merely procedural devices cannot obstruct Private Members' Bills, and that they are brought to a decision."

The Government are using the procedural device of suspending Standing Orders to obstruct private Members' Bills.

The shadow Leader of the House also argued that there is a problem with Fridays. "Rebuilding the House" suggests in paragraph 193 that Wednesday evenings could be used for private Members' Bills. I have not sought to go that far, but it would overcome entirely the hon. Lady's objection that too many Fridays will be used up. If I could have a guarantee from the shadow Leader of the House before the end of the debate that instead of using the Fridays that are free, they will put the extra five days' business on Wednesdays, I would more than happily withdraw my amendment and accept the shadow Leader of the House's words—

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): She is the Deputy Leader of the House.

Mr. Bone: I apologise. Because of her ability, I just assumed that she was Leader. As Deputy Leader of the House, she might want to take some advice before responding. I hope that at some stage we will hear the Government's view on the motion. To say that they have been silent is not quite correct, but "I beg to move" is hardly a good enough argument for a motion that has been on the Order Paper since 23 November and has been objected to by Members of the House on every single evening since.

I have not gone as far as the Committee, but have accepted the current situation, because for some reason the Committee's report has not been debated by the House.

Let me move on to my amendment. It is straightforward and restores the 13 days. It says that

> "Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 8, 15, 22 and 29 January; 5 and 26 February"— that suggests that I have not called for debate on every single Friday, as the hon. Lady suggested. In fact, I was very careful not to interfere with the spring recess. I also selected

> "5, 12, 19 and 26 March"

and I have not suggested another private Members' Bills day until 23 April. Although I do not know the dates for the Easter recess, I know when Easter is so I have allowed for those Fridays, too. I think the hon. Lady was being slightly harsh on me in suggesting that I had picked on every Friday.

I have not heard the argument, but perhaps it will be made at some stage, that there is not enough time for Bills to be printed and prepared for a debate on 8 January—this Friday. However, we already know that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome could get his Bill then and he could probably have a whole sitting on it, so it is possible. The reason that the Bills have not been printed is that the Government failed under Standing Order No. 14 to provide the dates that they said they would provide and which they are required to do by Standing Orders.

I take what might be an old-fashioned view that Standing Orders exist to protect Parliament—I am sure that is correct—and particularly to protect Back-Bench Members of Parliament and Opposition Members of Parliament against the power of the Executive. Year after year we have seen the Government—the Executive—take more and more power, no matter which party has been in control. This year is a turning point. Parliament has been brought into disrepute by what happened last year. People are demanding that Parliament assert itself and become more independent of the Executive. It is amazing that in a year when people are saying that, the Government propose to cut the time for Back-Bench debate.

[Mr. Bone]

The Government would lose nothing by providing those extra Fridays. All it would mean is that a Minister would have to turn up on a Friday five more times than is suggested by the Government. Although this is a small piece of the overall reform of Parliament, it is exceptionally important that the Government realise that cutting off difficult debate is not in their interest. They have made that mistake time and again since I have been in Parliament. By reducing the amount of time allowed through programme motions, debate has not carried on and parts of Bills have not even been scrutinised. That is a failure of the Government. The more an item is debated, the more the Government can put their point of view.

Barbara Keeley: I come back to the question that I have already put to the hon. Gentleman. Are members of his Front-Bench team in agreement with the points that he is making? He keeps speaking about cutting off debate and denying Back-Bench Members the chance for debate, but we have allocated private Members' Bill days pro rata in a short Session, exactly as was done in 1996-97 and 1991-92, under a Conservative Administration. If he chooses to condemn an Administration for that, I invite him to condemn earlier ones too, and to tell the House whether members of his Front-Bench team agree with what he is doing today.

Mr. Bone: If I stood up and said that my Front-Bench team agreed with me and that I had the approval of the Whips Office, with my reputation no one would believe me. It would be wholly wrong. I have no idea what members of my Front-Bench team will say on the matter. I hope my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire will have an opportunity to speak. He has made it clear in the House that he was amazed and dismayed at the failure of the Government to bring the motion before the House before Christmas so that we could have a debate.

In answer to the hon. Lady, I refer to Standing Orders. I have the 2009 edition, which has not changed in relation to Standing Order No. 14. It says that the House must allocate 13 days in each Session for private Members' Bills on Fridays. I shall read Standing Order No. 14(4), which in my booklet is on page 16. It states:

> "Private Members' bills shall have precedence over government business on thirteen Fridays in each session to be appointed by the House."

That Standing Order could go on and say, as the Deputy Leader of the House would like it to say, that that should be pro rata if there is to be a general election in that Session. Standing Orders do not say that. If the Government wanted to change Standing Orders to say that, they would have to provide that in the following Session, which would be a longer Session, more than 13 Fridays would be allowed. But that is not what the Standing Order says. Why not? It is because of the ballot. I have put in for the ballot every year since I entered the House and come nowhere near the top 20. If one is in that top 20, one expects to have an opportunity to get one's voice heard. That is what the Standing Orders are about, and that is what the Government just do not get.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): I apologise to my hon. Friend and to the House for having been at a Transport Committee sitting, but I have watched the annunciator screen with some admiration, thinking of the pearls of wisdom that my hon. Friend will have been delivering while I have not been in the Chamber. He rightly said that Standing Orders say that there shall be 13 sitting Fridays—not that if the Session is longer, there should be more than 13. They say exactly 13. I have been a Member for 20-plus years and have, therefore, sat through long Sessions and short Sessions. On every occasion that I have ever known a Session to go beyond its length of time, there never have been more than 13 such sittings. Not only do the Standing Orders not say that there must be more, there have not been any more. Is my hon. Friend aware of any occasion when there have been more than 13? That is the most powerful part of the argument: if it has to be 13, it has to be 13.

Mr. Bone: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, and that is exactly the point. Standing Orders are absolutely clear: 13 Fridays are set aside for private Members' business in each Session. They do not talk about reducing the number in a short Session or extending the number in a long Session. We cannot extend the number of Fridays for private Members' business unless we suspend Standing Orders, and I return to my original argument that Standing Orders exist to protect this Parliament and this House against the power of the Executive. I have yet to hear from the Deputy Leader of the House why the surplus Fridays that we are not using before a general election can be held cannot be used. She has been keen to pop up and down to intervene, but she has never answered that question.

I have said that our having had to wait until today to debate this motion is ridiculous, and that private Members have presented their Bills without knowing the date of their Second Reading. The elephant in the House, however, is that we know that there will be a general election, although not when that general election will be called.

If Standing Orders say that 13 Fridays should be set aside, it is surely logical, in a year when there will be a general election, to take the first Friday available and run things on from there. That would give more Members the chance of a Second Reading at which their Bills might be debated, and it would give their Bills more chance of going into and coming out of Committee. The hon. Lady keeps referring to previous Executives, saying, "They cut the number of sittings down," but if we look at the statistics we find that many more Bills got through: 49 in the final Parliament of the Conservative Government, against eight under this control-freak Executive.

I do not want to take up a lot of time on what I believe to be an exceptionally important matter, because I know about the adverse weather conditions.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): I apologise to my hon. Friend for not having been present at the beginning of his contribution; I was at a sitting of the Procedure Committee. I have the privilege of being a co-signatory to his amendment, however, and not having listened to the whole debate, I wondered whether he would be minded to put his proposed change to the vote. If he were so minded, I would be very supportive of it.

Mr. Bone rose—

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): A short reprise?

Mr. Bone: I am certainly not going to go over what I have said, because that would be to unfair on other hon. Members who want to speak. However, the issue is very simple: my amendment would restore the 13 Fridays. The trouble is that Standing Orders provide us with a problem, because they say that the House must bring forward 13 days. However, one cannot bring anything forward in this House; the Executive do so.

It may be that in future the reforms proposed in "Rebuilding the House" bring about a House business committee, and I sincerely hope that there will be such a committee and that this problem will never happen again. We have had to wait until today, however, and I think it was only the fact that the Government eventually realised that somebody would turn up at the end of every day's business to object that forced them to have a debate. If Standing Orders are to be changed or suspended on a matter so important as restricting the amount of time for private Members' Bills, we must have a little debate on it. We cannot just allow that to get through on the nod.

Here lies the failure of this Executive. This would never have happened under a different Executive. It would probably not have happened even with a different Prime Minister of the same party. It seems to me that we are making a grave mistake if we allow this motion to go through today.

In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), I do seek to put my amendment to the vote. Before closing, I just want to make it clear again to all hon. Members that supporting my amendment will comply with the Standing Orders and restore 13 Fridays for private Members' Bills, while in no way affecting Members who have already selected the days for their Second Reading, as all the days that they have selected are covered by my amendment. The amendment would add and free up five more days for ordinary Members to have a chance to instigate legislation and either hear the arguments debated or get the matter raised and eventually introduced into law.

Mr. Wilshire: I am very pleased to hear that my hon. Friend wants to put the matter to a vote. In reply to an intervention by the Minister, he quite properly said that he was a Back Bencher and did not wish to best-guess what any Front Benchers might think. If I understand it correctly, however, all three main parties have said that they hope to see more power for Parliament and more power and responsibility for Back Benchers in future. It is quite safe to say that all the parties' Front Benchers also think that. By putting his amendment to the vote, is not my hon. Friend offering the House an opportunity for Back Benchers to indicate that they support the view of their Front Benchers? In voting for the amendment, one is voting for more power for Back Benchers to have the time to which they are entitled. The vote is crucial; it provides a chance to see who agrees with their own Front-Bench team.

Mr. Bone: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, in which he makes a valid point. All the Front-Bench teams signed up to "Rebuilding the House", the Wright report, and it was the Government who drew up a motion for that report to come into being. What they have unfortunately not done is debate the report. That again is an amazing situation. A vote would be a little test, would it not, for the House today. I am sure that all parties are going to allow a free vote; I cannot believe that any party political matter is attached to the vote. It seems quite reasonable for MPs to say that they are going to restore the power of Parliament in a small way by having the voice of Back Benchers heard. As I said, the House needs to be aware of that point in considering my amendment.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): One of the problems we currently have with Fridays is the abysmal attendance. I am not quite sure how I am going to vote on my hon. Friend's amendment, but his answer to this question may well be the deciding factor. If his amendment is accepted, will he give an undertaking that he will be here personally on each of the Fridays listed in it?

Mr. Bone: I do not know whether this will encourage my right hon. Friend to vote for my amendment, but I would be here on each of those Fridays.

I thought that my right hon. Friend might be about to mention the suggestion in the "Rebuilding the House" report that we should have sittings to discuss private Members' Bills on Wednesdays. I have already said that I would not press my amendment to a vote if the Deputy Leader of the House, who has now had time to consider that offer, were to suggest that we should keep the Fridays listed in the Government motion and add five Wednesdays, which would bring more people to the debates. I would be more than happy not to press my amendment to a vote in those circumstances, and I wonder whether she would like to intervene to give me her view on that. So far, the Government have said only, "I beg to move".

Mr. Chope: Again, I apologise for not having been here at the beginning of the debate. Has my hon. Friend received any indication from the Government on whether, in the most unlikely event of their being re-elected in the general election, they would be minded to allow more than 13 Fridays for private Members' Bills in what would be the long first Session of that new Parliament?

Mr. Bone: My hon. Friend raises an issue that I touched on earlier, although in a slightly different way, when I said that Standing Orders do not allow for more than 13 such sittings per Session. The next Session will, however, be much longer than usual. If the general election is in June, the next Session could run until the November of next year. In a Session lasting a normal calendar year, one would have 13 such sittings, but one would expect more in a longer Session. I know, however, that Standing Orders would not permit that. It would therefore be necessary to table another Government motion to extend the number of sittings for private Members' Bills in the next Session to—

Peter Bottomley: Eighteen.

Mr. Bone: Indeed. My hon. Friend is slightly quicker at maths than I am.

I would certainly consider withdrawing my amendment if the Deputy Leader of the House were to pop up and say that the Government would table another motion on the timing of private Members' Bills, so that there could be 18 such sittings in the next Session. Again, however, there is a deathly silence—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman is repeating himself. He has done so twice while I have been in the Chair, and, on his own admission, he has also repeated something that he said earlier. We are not like a cinema in continuous performance for the benefit of people arriving late. I suggest that he speak strictly to the terms of his amendment, which he has now done for some considerable time.

Mr. Bone: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was, in fact, coming to my conclusion.

Mr. Greg Knight: Will my hon. Friend confirm what he was saying earlier about his willingness to withdraw his amendment if the Government responded positively? He mentioned taking private Members' Bills on a Wednesday. I assume that he means that those debates would take place after the moment of interruption on a Wednesday, and not as part of the main business—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) will not be distracted by the distinguished Chairman of the Procedure Committee on matters of that kind. We are not talking about Wednesdays in this amendment; we are talking about Fridays.

Mr. Bone: I want to be very clear that my amendment does not seek to change the precedent of discussing private Members' Bills on Fridays. I have deliberately not gone down that route, because it would involve a change to Standing Orders. My amendment simply seeks to make the House do what it says that it should do, which is to have 13 sittings for private Members' Bills. I have a problem, however, in that we have not heard the Government's arguments at all. The only words we have heard from them are, "I beg to move", and a few interventions. I am therefore trying to anticipate what they might have said in putting forward an alternative argument.

Mr. Wilshire: I am mindful of what you said about Wednesdays, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which is quite right, but can my hon. Friend tell us why he chose the Fridays in his amendment? What is the significance of those particular Fridays?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman, by his own admission, was unable to be here for a large part of the debate. Those points have been covered, and I shall have to invoke Standing Orders on repetition against the hon. Member for Wellingborough if he is tempted down that line.

Mr. Bone: I am certainly not tempted down that line, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My amendment does not break Standing Orders in any way. The Government could have chosen the Fridays that I have chosen. None of them will be in a recess, including the anticipated Easter recess. Between each, enough days are provided for the presentation and publication of Bills, and there are enough days for the House to consider them. That is why 18 January could and should have been used.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): I apologise to the hon. Gentleman and to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being in the Chamber earlier in the debate. Constituency work kept me away, as I sat here throughout yesterday.

In his commentaries on the amendment, has the hon. Gentleman been able to point out the comparison between this House and the US Congress? Congressmen make a very great merit with their constituents of legislation that they have personally got on to the statute book. Does not that emphasise the importance of the amendment, and of maximising the number of days available in the remainder of the time of this Parliament?

Mr. Bone: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making his point and that is on the record, but I do not want to be drawn into making comparisons with the US Senate. Clearly, the US Executive are outside Congress and the Executive here are in the House.

It is very good news that the Government Chief Whip has turned up to listen to and encourage debate in the House on more time for parliamentary business. I am really pleased to see him here and I hope he has an opportunity to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a little later.

Other hon. Members may wish to speak in the debate, and I shall take this opportunity to conclude my remarks. By supporting my amendment, the House would not demur from anything in the Government motion and it would not affect any Member who has already selected a day.

3.53 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of the Leader of the House of Commons (Barbara Keeley): The motion in the name of my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House provides for private Members' Bills to be considered on eight Fridays, rather than the 13 provided for in Standing Order No. 14(4), and appoints the days.

As I indicated earlier, we are, for the first time since 1997, in the fifth Session of a Parliament. That is key in the context of the motion. We know that the current Session must end no later than 10 May this year. That means that there could be a maximum of only 82 sitting days, including the eight Fridays proposed in the motion, which compares with an average of 158 sitting days per Session since 2001. The motion therefore reduces the number of sitting Fridays pro rata to match the length of the Session. As I have indicated a number of times in interventions, in 1991-92 and 1996-97, motions with a similar effect were proposed by the then Conservative Administrations and agreed by the House.

The remaining provisions of the motion are consequential on the change in the number of days. They bring forward from the eighth to the fifth Friday the earliest date on which a Bill may be referred to a Second Reading Committee, and the date on which Bills start to take precedence according to how much progress they have made rather than simply according to the order in which they were introduced.

The motion is not about restricting Members in any way. The Leader of the House tabled a motion, which announces dates pro rata to the length of the Session. The opposition of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) has so far prevented the dates from being set. We are considering a routine House motion, which is necessary to adapt the House's private Member's Bill procedures to the shorter fifth Session.

The motion will allow the private Members' Bill process to continue in an orderly and predictable manner for hon. Members who have been fortunate enough in the ballot to make progress with their measures. I commend it to the House.

3.55 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I am glad that the Government have finally allowed us to debate this matter—the motion and the amendment have been on the Order Paper since 23 November. I have raised the failure to resolve the matter in business questions, as have other hon. Members. Until today, there has been no certainty about the dates for discussing private Members' Bills. Again, the Government seemed to expect that they could assume Members' support when they timetabled House business. When opposition was expressed in the form of an amendment, which my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) tabled, the Government assumed that they could get the motion through on the nod at the end of the day's business rather than allowing proper discussion, which we are now having. That is not right and it has been raised in the report, which my hon. Friend mentioned, about allowing the House more control over its business. Under the Wright scenario, I suspect that we would not have had the problems that my hon. Friend described.

However, that is a debate for another day, together with whether we move private Members' Bills from Fridays to Wednesdays. I commend my hon. Friend's defence of private Members' Bills, which was made with no self-interest because I am afraid that he was not successful in the ballot. It is important that the House jealously protects private Members' time. I say that as someone who was successful in the ballot in 1997, when my main problem was not time, but Eric Forth. Getting the Bill round him was the major task, and, indeed, we did that.

Of course, I sympathise with my hon. Friend's desire to maximise the number of days for private Members' Bills. However, the Government's proposal to act pro rata and move to a lower number to reflect the shorter Session is right. As the Deputy Leader of the House said, it is in line with previous practice.

My hon. Friend made several compelling points, some more compelling than others. However, one of his more compelling points was that in a shorter Session, the number of days decreases, but in a longer Session, the number does not increase. The House may want to revert to that in the context of the Wright debate and allocating the future business of the House.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is making an excellent point. Can he, on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, say that if a Conservative Government were elected later this year, they would take account of the extra length of the Session and allow more private Members' Fridays?

Sir George Young: The short answer is no and the longer answer is probably also no, because the House has yet to debate the Wright report, whether we should have a business committee and how time should be allocated in future. I approach that with an open mind. I served on the Wright Committee and I have much sympathy with it, but I cannot today commit any future Administration to an increase in the pro rata number from 13 to 18 or a higher number, which my hon. Friend ingeniously tries to tempt me to do.

On this occasion, I propose to support the Government's motion.

3.58 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) had no personal interest in the matter. However, I have enormous personal interest, having been successful in the ballot, albeit in a lowly position this year—not that one's position in the ballot makes much difference to making progress with private Members' legislation, because some Government Whip need only shout "Object" for a measure to fall, as I found out in the previous Session. Nevertheless, were the amendment accepted, it would allow time to enable my important School Transport Bill, which would provide for a yellow bus system in this country—greatly to the advantage of children throughout the country and, indeed, the environment—to progress, or at least be debated.

However, the difficulty is typified by the debate. The Executive, not the House, prioritise the House's time for debate. The Executive decide what will happen and put that before the House, and only the Executive are allowed to do so. Answering on behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition, the right hon. Gentleman says he is unable to commit his party to taking a different position if it were to form the Executive in future, so the Executive would still have control of the business of the House. Back Benchers of all parties do not have as much control of the House's business as I think they should have.

All of that would be corrected if we could make progress on the proposals in the Wright Committee report. I do not intend to debate them today, because they are not the substance of the issue before us, but making progress on that would have the following two results: first, we would never in future have before us another such motion in the name of a Minister; secondly, we would no longer have rationing of days by the Executive. Instead, that would be determined by a committee of the House. It would consider the rationale of all of this and whether it is appropriate to make the abatement which is the substance of the motion, and we would have the option to consider whether Wednesdays are a better day than Fridays for the consideration of private Members' business.

[Mr. David Heath]

So much is wrong with the current procedures for private Members' business. So many obstacles are put in the way of making rational progress on what may be very commendable Bills, and it appears to me that the will of the House is the last thing to be considered in respect of both the time made available for Bills and whether a Bill goes ahead. It is too simple to scupper something from a sedentary position, rather than debating matters and allowing the House to determine the result.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to say to the hon. Member that although he said he did not wish to have a wider debate, he seems now to be indulging in just that. He must come back to the amendment before the House today.

Mr. Heath: The amendment and the motion, I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Of course, the motion sets out the Fridays on which private Member's Bills can be considered, and I was considering the procedure that would be applied on those Fridays were the House to agree to them. My contention is simply that the procedure is in desperate need of reform. That is one of the key reforms put forward in the proposals, but it is typical of this Government that we have these proposals and they never get debated. Week after week, we ask at business questions for them to be debated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is not being deliberately difficult, but he is now talking about the wider issue. He is perfectly correct to say that we are talking about the Fridays listed in the motion and the alternative Fridays in the amendment, but we should not be talking about the wider issues that may come out of the investigations of the Reform of the House of Commons Committee.

Mr. Heath: I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for being inadvertently obtuse by not responding more promptly to your very clear instruction. I was attempting to say that such behaviour is typical of the Government in respect of the motion before us, as it has some of the key features: it is a motion, take it or leave it, and it has not been debated by the House until now. We have asked week after week for it to be debated. On each and every occasion that it has been listed for debate, the hon. Member for Wellingborough or one of his hon. Friends has shouted "Object", and therefore it has not been debated. Had the Government wished to do so, they could have brought forward this debate at any stage in the last few weeks. It would have been in order for them to have done so. It would have been proper for them to have done so before the First Reading of private Members' Bills shortly before Christmas, but they did not do so. That is one reason why the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right.

When I was asked for the date of the Second Reading of my own private Member's Bill, I said, "Tomorrow," rather than name a specific date, none of which we knew at that stage because the House had not agreed to the timetable that is the substance of the Deputy Leader of the House's proposal. Because the House had not agreed that, I did not feel that I could assume either that the House would agree to the motion or that the hon. Gentleman's amendment would not be agreed to. I found myself in some difficulty, therefore, which is why I said, "Tomorrow," when asked about the date for the Second Reading of my Bill.

Mr. Pelling: Will the hon. Gentleman briefly remind me of the Bill for which he thinks it so important to provide time for discussion in the House?

Mr. Heath: At the risk of repeating myself and incurring the wrath of Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is the School Transport Bill, which in my opinion is a very important Bill, because it deals with matters affecting every schoolchild in this country, road-user safety and the inappropriate use of many vehicles on the morning school run. I am keen, therefore, that the Bill be given an opportunity, on one of these Fridays, to be debated, but I honestly do not believe that it will be if the motion is passed. But that is my misfortune. I should have arranged to be drawn No. 1 in the ballot, rather than No. 19. That way I would at least have ensured a Second Reading. However, it does not alter my view that private Members' business is important, that we should find proper opportunities to debate it and that we need to reform procedures of the House so that we do not get motions of the sort presented by the hon. Lady today.

I agree with an interesting point that the hon. Member for Wellingborough made. I do not think that Standing Orders currently provide for the procedure that appears to be accepted by everyone and which has been used previously. I do not think that the change proposed by the hon. Lady is provided for. Now, perhaps it should be. Perhaps there should be a provision in Standing Orders relating the number of days devoted to private Members' business to the length of the Session. That would be perfectly logical and is probably a view shared by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. There is logic in saying that there should be more days for a long Session and fewer for a short Session, and I do not think that any of us would disagree with that. However, if that is the intention, the House should decide and Standing Orders should provide for it, not for what on the face of it is the absolute opposite, which is an absolute number of days to be provided by the House—not Ministers—for the consideration of private Members' legislation.

I am glad that we have finally had an opportunity to debate this matter. I have no idea why it had to be delayed for so long, other than the normal cloth-eared intransigence of the Conservative Front Bench—[Interruption.] I mean the Government Front Bench. I am sure that the Conservatives will be just as cloth-eared and intransigent when, and if, they ever form a Government, but we shall see—let us give them the benefit of the doubt, for the moment. However, we should have debated the matter earlier, and I certainly shall advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to make their own decisions on whether to support the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Wellingborough, because this is a House matter, not one to be determined by Front Benchers of whatever complexion.

4.8 pm

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I am grateful to the Liberal Democrat spokesman for anticipating a possible result of the certain general election. The problem here is caused by the expiry of Parliament in May. The Government, who must have known that this was coming, ought to have suggested that there be two private Members' days in each sitting month. That would have solved the problem. It would give us roughly the 13 days that we want by working out the number of private Members' days in proportion to the number of weeks on which we are sitting.

That does not mean that all private Members' Bills would be either discussed or necessarily passed. In memory of Eric Forth, there is what I call the Chope-Dismore choke. Any private Member's Bill has to get through this little parliamentary interest. Many of the concerns of those who promote these Bills are not about the people who object sitting down but about those who discuss the merits of the Bills and their possibilities on their feet—clearing their throats, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) did with some distinction and effect this afternoon.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is not suggesting, is he, that he does not think it a good idea that such Bills should be properly debated in the House?

Peter Bottomley: I certainly think it right that such Bills should be discussed, and I admire the way in which my hon. Friend manages to do that so effectively and, often, so extensively.

Mr. Heath: If the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) were passed today, one of its inadvertent consequences would be that most of those days would be devoted to consideration of the nine Bills presented by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) earlier today.

Peter Bottomley: I will not deviate from what I intended to say, which is not as extensive as it would be if I followed every remark that the hon. Gentleman felt he ought to have made in his speech and that he has decided to put into mine.

The reason for supporting the amendment is a simple one. Liberty and responsibility are things that people take; they are not things that are given. We should be saying to the establishment, which is represented at the moment by the Deputy Leader of the House and rather elegantly by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), the shadow Leader of the House, who can see all the proper considerations, that if this House—that basically means those who are free to vote as they wish—votes as my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough suggests, we will be taking responsibility for our affairs and using the liberty of our votes to say that we want those days for ourselves. I believe that we should do exactly that.

I finish by making an observation that was made yesterday as well. It is rare that a Government motion, whether it be a motion on a Bill or a motion such as that which we are debating now, is discussed in the House—not put through on the nod, but discussed—and not a single Government Back Bencher speaks in favour of it.

4.11 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Very briefly, I should like to put on record my admiration for my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who ensured that we got this debate by persistently blocking the motion on the Order Paper and not allowing it to go through on the nod. His amendment is first class. I am delighted that I was able to support it, and I look fo[illegible] to voting for it soon.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The House divided: Ayes 78, Noes 254.

Division No. 30] [4.12 pm

AYES

Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Baker, Norman
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Sir Alan
Binley, Mr. Brian
Bone, Mr. Peter
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Davies, Philip
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Mr. Don
Gale, Mr. Roger
George, Andrew
Gidley, Sandra
Goldsworthy, Julia
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heath, Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, David
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Lamb, Norman
Laws, Mr. David
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Mason, John
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moore, Mr. Michael
Öpik, Lembit
Ottaway, Richard
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Pugh, Dr. John
Rennie, Willie
Robertson, Angus
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Short, rh Clare
Spicer, Sir Michael
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swinson, Jo
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Walter, Mr. Robert
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Williams, Mark
Williams, Stephen
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Christopher Chope and
Mr. Philip Hollobone

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Anderson, Mr. David
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Bain, Mr. William
Baird, Vera
Baldry, Tony
Balls, rh Ed
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Des

Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burt, Alistair
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byrne, rh Mr. Liam
Caborn, rh Mr. Richard
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Caton, Mr. Martin
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Clark, Greg
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Connarty, Michael
Corbyn, Jeremy
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, Mr. Dai
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Eagle, Maria
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Etherington, Bill
Fabricant, Michael
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, rh Caroline
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael
(Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez
(Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Garnier, Mr. Edward
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gilroy, Linda
Goodman, Helen
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harris, Mr. Tom
Hayes, Mr. John
Healey, rh John
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Hood, Mr. Jim
Howells, rh Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Khan, rh Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lammy, rh Mr. David
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lazarowicz, Mark
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, rh Mr. Pat
McGuire, rh Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morgan, Julie
Morley, rh Mr. Elliot
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
O'Brien, rh Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Pearson, Ian
Penrose, John
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, John
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Roy, Mr. Frank
Roy, Lindsay
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Seabeck, Alison
Selous, Andrew
Sharma, Mr. Virendra
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andy
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Angela E. (Basildon)
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, rh Mr. Stephen
Timpson, Mr. Edward
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, rh Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Twigg, Derek
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, rh Mr. Michael
Wilson, Phil
Winnick, Mr. David
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Noes:
Helen Jones and
Mr. George Mudie

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Ordered,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business) shall have effect for this Session with the following modifications, namely:

In paragraph (4) the word 'eight' shall be substituted for the word 'thirteen' in line 42 and in paragraph (5) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 44;

(2) Standing Order No. 90 (Second reading committees) shall have effect for this Session with the following modification, namely:

In paragraph (2) the word 'fifth' shall be substituted for the word 'eighth' in line 21; and

(3) Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 29 January; 5 and 26 February; 5 and 12 March; 23 and 30 April; and 7 May.

Election of the Deputy Speakers

4.25 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of the Leader of the House of Commons (Barbara Keeley): I beg to move,

> That this House approves the Fourth Report from the Procedure Committee of Session 2008-09 (House of Commons Paper No. 1080); endorses the principle that the Deputy Speakers should be chosen through a ballot of the whole House; and endorses the preparation by the Procedure Committee of detailed proposals for the election of the Deputy Speakers and the consideration by the Committee of the introduction of term-limits for the Speaker and Deputy Speakers.

The motion on the Order Paper has been brought before the House at the request of the Procedure Committee. The Leader of the House is therefore facilitating that request, which I believe has cross-party support. On 2 July last year, Mr. Speaker proposed that Deputy Speakers should be elected. The Procedure Committee then conducted an inquiry, and on 2 November published its report, "Election of the Deputy Speakers: Principles". In the report the Committee recognised that further work was needed, and before taking that work forward, it asked the House to endorse the principles that it has identified: that the Deputy Speakers should be elected; that they should be elected by the whole House in a way that ensures that the party balance within the House is respected; that the Procedure Committee should prepare detailed proposals for the House to consider at the start of the next Parliament; and that the Procedure Committee should examine the idea of adopting term limits for the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers, and make recommendations. I commend the work of the Procedure Committee in producing its report.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): In giving consideration to the acceptance of these principles, there are two important concerns. First, the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers clearly need to work as a team; therefore, although we have had the very successful election of a Speaker, there will be issues of compromising that teamwork if elections for Deputy Speaker take place. Secondly, on term limits for Speakers and Deputy Speakers, the House should give consideration to the impact that that might have on the ability of the Speaker's team of Deputy Speakers to be sufficiently independent of the House to be able to maintain its proper discipline and order.

Barbara Keeley: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's point, and I am sure that the Chair of the Procedure Committee, who is here with us, has heard it. However, it would not necessarily be appropriate for me to respond, as I am moving this motion on behalf of the Leader of the House, to facilitate the further work of the Procedure Committee in taking it forward.

Mr. Pelling: Will the Minister help me to understand this clearly? In her speech she said that we were accepting the principles; subsequently, in answer to my intervention, she said that this was purely a matter of process. Could she explain whether in supporting the motion we are accepting the principles of elections and term limits?

Barbara Keeley: As I said, we are accepting the idea that the Procedure Committee should examine the issue of adopting term limits. That is not to say that we are accepting term limits. We are adopting the principle as laid out but there is further work to do, and the Procedure Committee will be taking that forward. I hope that that is clear to the hon. Gentleman. If the House agrees to the motion the Procedure Committee will produce a further report. The motion simply asks the House to endorse this decision, and I commend it to the House.

4.28 pm

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): The motion reflects changing times, and Conservative Members support it. As the Deputy Speakers serve the whole House, there is merit in the argument that the whole House should have a say in who they are. Moreover, this is consistent with the arguments for reform of the House of Commons, in that there are proposals for the election of the Chairmen of Select Committees.

By passing the motion, we will allow the Procedure Committee to continue urgent work to create the mechanism required for the election of Deputy Speakers. It will not be an easy task, as there are several matters to consider, not least to ensure that the party balance is maintained with the final result. Given that the aim is to ensure that the proposals are in place for the start of the new Parliament later this year, I wish the Procedure Committee well with all its deliberations.

4.29 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I, too, support the motion. It is sensible for the Procedure Committee to be given the green light to proceed with its deliberations. I had the great pleasure of discussing these matters with members of that Committee this afternoon, and I know that they are taking great care in looking at all aspects of the issues. The issues are complex; deciding the details of the scheme that will be put before the House is not as simple as might at first be perceived, and the Committee members are taking great care to consider all the implications. Nevertheless, it is right that today the House as a whole should give its imprimatur to the direction of travel that the Procedure Committee is taking.

The one caveat that I enter is that there will be an impact on some of the procedure that will be needed in respect of the exact role of the Deputy Speaker. We are not, of course, discussing the Wright Committee today, but if its proposals for the future role of Deputy Speakers are adopted by the House in respect of giving the Chairman of Ways and Means greater influence over the programme and business of the House, that will have an impact on the eventual proposals put before the House. I am a little worried about the timing of those two factors and the impending general election. It would be greatly to the advantage of the House to have the matter determined before Dissolution, so that the new Parliament has the opportunity to elect the Deputy Speakers in good order at the start of the new Session. With that one caveat, I shall certainly advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the motion.

4.31 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I thank the Deputy Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara), her shadow, and the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), for their support for the motion. In answer to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, I should say that the Procedure Committee shares his view that this matter will best be settled as soon as possible—certainly during the lifetime of this Parliament. The Procedure Committee is currently meeting weekly to try to meet that goal.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

As has been said, the motion is an endorsement of the principle of election for Deputy Speakers. I say to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) that I suppose some academic might say that we already have a system of election in place, in that the motion that comes before the House for their appointment may be voted on, and is amendable. However, the last time such a Division took place was in 1962. The downside of our current procedure is that such a motion is tabled without notice, so no Member in any part of the House has any time to reflect on whether he or she wishes to support the names being put forward. Indeed, on the day when it normally occurs—the day of state opening—there is no Order Paper. Members do not even get five minutes' thinking time, because the motion is moved without any notice at all. Some may say that the nominations are cloaked in secrecy.

So the procedure is not transparent. However, I have to say that it has worked well in the past, and has delivered a number of excellent Deputy Speakers; I include the present incumbents in that description. However, I do think that it is now time to update our procedure to make it more transparent, and to give Members time to think about their choice.

I do not intend to dwell in detail on the proposals because, as the Deputy Leader of the House has made clear, the motion is an endorsement of principle. If the House supports the motion, it will have an opportunity to go into greater detail at a later date. The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) mentioned term limits; I should tell him that all the motion does is authorise the Procedure Committee to give "consideration" to the introduction of term limits. If the motion passes, the matter will not be concluded one way or the other today. The motion asks, and authorises, the Procedure Committee to look into the matter and make recommendations to the House.

Today is not the day for detailed debate. The motion merely endorses the work we have done so far and authorises the Procedure Committee to continue. I would like to place on the record my thanks to all members of the Committee, of all parties, for the excellent work they have done so far. I support the motion, and urge the House to do so.

4.35 pm

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): As a member of the Procedure Committee, I follow its Chairman in welcoming the fact that the Government have laid this motion before us today. I welcome this opportunity for the House to endorse, as I hope it will, the Committee's proposals, enabling it to continue to examine the ways in which we can make a reality of the election of Deputy Speakers, following and building on the considerable success of the House's new procedures for the election of the Speaker.

In response to the comments of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), I re-emphasise that a number of rather difficult matters of detail remain before the Committee. It is important that we continue, as the Chairman said, to meet weekly to deal with those matters, and we hope to bring some satisfactory proposals before the House in the not too distant future.

Of course, this issue is not unrelated to those dealt with by the Wright Committee; indeed, the issue was before that Committee, which referred it to the Procedure Committee for its consideration. I hope the House has an early opportunity not only to debate the Wright Committee's recommendations, which need to be seen alongside those of the Procedure Committee, but to decide on them in a positive way.

4.36 pm

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, for explaining the difference between the two parts of this process. The House will want to agree the specifics of the preparation of detailed proposals for the election of Deputy Speakers, and he is right to draw our attention to the fact that his Committee will be considering the introduction of term limits. My view is that that will be difficult to achieve successfully. I can see why it is in the interests of the House for there to be a voluntary change of Speaker. It should be in the middle of a Parliament, although I can see why a Speaker might say that it would be more convenient for a term to end at the end of a Parliament, so that the change of Speaker does not cause a by-election. There may be a way of resolving that that the Committee could consider. Generally, it is better to trust people's judgment.

My second caution is that although the question of having what is called gender balance has arisen in the Committee, I see no reason why, if this House is two-thirds male and one-third female, for example, we should not have two female Deputy Speakers and only one male Deputy Speaker. I see no problem with that. It would not be gender balance; it would be the consequence of the way people were chosen—or, under these proposals, elected. My gentle suggestion for the Committee to consider is that the first man and the first woman with the greatest number of votes could become Deputy Speakers, and that the third Deputy Speaker be the other candidate with the greatest number of votes, whether they get more or less than one of the other two. There are various ways of dealing with the matter, but having a rigid balance, or rigid proportions, strikes me as unnecessary.

The other issue in my mind—besides recognising, as others have, the dedication of those who serve as Deputy Speakers and Chairman of Ways and Means—is that the House has been very lucky with those who have been prepared to hold those posts. Each of those positions is a position of service, rather than of ambition. That is one of the things that make this House rather endearing, and rather more effective than if all of us tried to go for such positions because we thought we needed the prominence.

4.38 pm

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): I want to make just one brief point, which I hope will be listened to. We are accepting the principle of a more obvious democratic process—voting for Deputy Speakers—but I raise this one concern. It is difficult and dangerous to appear to be talking in this way about moving towards further democracy within the House, but I am concerned that the election of a Deputy Speaker could be used as a means of leverage—a means of punishment of, or expression of a lack of confidence in, a sitting Speaker. That is one possible danger.

Under the current process, although the appointment of Deputy Speakers is at the discretion of the House, they are very much part of a team. I can imagine that the stresses and strains of being part of a Speakership team are significant, and it is important not to get ourselves into a situation in which the House might elect a Deputy Speaker against the wishes of a Speaker with whom the House had fallen out.

Question put and agreed to.

Business without Debate

REGULATORY REFORM

Motion made, and Question put forthwith (Standing Order No. 18(1)),

That the draft Legislative Reform (Revocation of Prescribed Form of Penalty Notice for Disorderly Behaviour) Order 2009, which was laid before this House on 21 October, in the previous Session of Parliament, be approved.—(Kerry McCarthy.)

PETITION

Badman Report (Maldon and East Chelmsford)

4.40 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I wish to present a petition of behalf of Ms Katie Hiskett of Towers road, Heybridge and 26 other residents of my constituency. My constituents are extremely concerned about the recommendations of the Badman report and the impact that they will have on them and on others who wish to educate their children at home. The terms of this petition are similar to those of others that have been presented by many colleagues in the House, so I shall not read out the entire wording of the petition and shall merely say that I share the concern and support the petition.

Following is the full text of the petition:

[The Petition of persons resident in the Maldon and East Chelmsford parliamentary constituency,

Declares that they are concerned about the recommendations of the Badman Report, which suggests closer monitoring of home educators, including a compulsory annual registration scheme and right of access to people's homes for local authority officials; further declares that the Petitioners believe the recommendations are based on a review that was extremely rushed, failed to give due consideration to the evidence, failed to ensure that the data it collected were sufficiently robust, and failed to take proper account of the existing legislative framework.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families either not to bring forward, or to withdraw, proposed legislative measures providing for tighter registration and monitoring of children educated at home in the absence of a thorough independent inquiry into the condition and future of elective home education in England; but instead to take the steps necessary to ensure that the existing Elective Home Education Guidelines for Local Authorities are properly implemented, learning from current best practice, in all local authorities in England.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.]

[P000693]

Faith Buildings

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—(Kerry McCarthy.)

4.41 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to debate this important subject, which has been a pressing one for people in my constituency for many years. I have pursued it through a number of different avenues, so it was with a sense of frustration that I sought this Adjournment debate. I did so because of the troubling difficulties in obtaining faith buildings in Northampton to serve our multi-faith community. This is an issue not only for Northampton, because faith communities in other parts of the country face similar difficulties in accessing sites and, in particular, obtaining planning consent. A simple search on the internet reveals a host of different disputes about planning applications for mosques, temples and a variety of other faith buildings.

In some areas, lessons have been learned and there is some good practice. For example, in Birmingham there are proposals for needs assessments of faith communities in the city as part of regeneration work, and one borough in London has a unit to help faith communities to resolve their different issues in getting access to buildings in which to worship. However, I must tell the House that in Northampton faith communities have faced continuing difficulties in obtaining buildings in which to worship, despite the growth of those communities and the constructive role that they have played in our town for a good number of years.

The town contains a substantial and extremely diverse Muslim community; people from different parts of the world have settled in the town and played an enormously supportive and constructive role. That community is undertaking its own census, but it is thought that the population is about 5,000 strong and it is hemmed in to two small house mosques—a converted and listed house, which I believe was the town's first mosque, and a converted service station. Although that is being redeveloped in a constructive way, with classrooms and different community facilities, and it is doing a good job, it remains at heart just a service station. It is located on quite a busy street and good relations have been built up with the neighbours, but the parking and street access is not ideal.

The town also contains two substantial and successful Hindu communities. One has a planning application pending on a site for a multi-purpose building with community uses, which in the long run would include some nursery provision and sheltered housing. That would be a big addition to the disadvantaged local community but the planning application has run into difficulties, not least as objections have been made because bats apparently fly across the site.

There is also a small but very active Sikh community that has long since outgrown its premises, which are down a side street in quite a run-down part of town. It wanted to buy part of a former school site for a very inspiring multi-faith and community centre. The county council, which owns the site, would not deal with the community or with me, and referred the matter on to the estate agents, who, after initially saying that they did not have a mandate to subdivide the site, referred the matter on to the property developer who had by then bought the site, who put the price up to such an exorbitant level that the community felt that it could not really proceed. Given that the application from the Sikh community was very much in line with the needs of the wider community of the town and would also bring benefits to quite a disadvantaged area, the county council's actions were at least questionable under the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000.

It has been very impressive to see the way in which the different communities—I have listed just a few of them and set out some of the problems that they have experienced—have been prepared to jump over all the hurdles that have been put in their way. They have been very constructive in engaging with the local authorities and the development corporation to try to promote good relations and a good understanding between all sections of society and to work for the common good. Some have also joined together to work on joint projects. All the plans that they have put forward that I have seen include making available significant resources for local communities. The proposals have been outward looking, not inward looking.

Some years ago, because of all the difficulties, I contacted a former Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to ask for some duty to be put on local planning authorities to assess the needs of different faith communities when drawing up local plans for their areas. That was obviously particularly relevant for growth areas such as Northampton, which is part of the Milton Keynes and south midlands growth area. There is a real opportunity to get things right from the beginning in such communities by ensuring that there is an understanding of the needs of the existing community and of the areas from which people are likely to come into town, and that in the planning of an urban area proper provision is made for faith buildings that will meet the needs of a multi-faith society.

I was pointed in the direction of planning policy guidance note 12, which states that the diocesan board of the Church of England should be consulted about development plans and also refers to the needs of faith communities. As I recall, about half a sentence was devoted to the assessment of the needs of faith communities. This was the slightest reference that could conceivably have been given to faith communities—just enough to tick the "Done" box, but not enough to make any difference. Quite soon after that, PPG12 was replaced by planning policy statement 12, and any reference to faith communities completely disappeared. I have trawled through PPS12 several times and I have also asked the House of Commons Library to see whether it can find any reference in any of the planning guidance to the needs of faith communities. The Library says that it has not been able to find anything at all, and neither have I.

Some of the guidance in "Creating Strong, Safe and Prosperous Communities" says that faith groups should be key and respected partners of the local authority. That seems to me to be a way of paying lip service to the importance of faith communities without ensuring that they have the one thing that faith communities want—a place, with facilities, in which to worship.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing this important debate. Will she allow me briefly to give some perceptions from Croydon, an authority which supports faith communities in finding premises? There are some good examples of the benefits of local authorities playing such a role. An attractive church in Croydon is now used by the Jain community. Unfortunately, there are also examples of important faith communities, which can build strong communities, not being well cared for. Black churches end up in industrial buildings or find themselves being heavily opposed, as happened in Bromley in the neighbouring constituency, when a black church moved into an old cinema in Upper Norwood. Finally, the Shi'a community in Croydon finds itself without any faith building. It is important to support the various Muslim communities in times of great stress within society and show how well we respect different faiths.

Ms Keeble: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's point. He illustrates why I sought this Adjournment debate. Society has changed substantially. With an established Church and a range of different faiths, we need to ensure that the needs of all the faiths are respected, not by providing handouts, but by making sure that difficult issues are managed properly, recognising that there are disputes between faiths sometimes and that there are different expressions of the same faith. We cannot say that there is one Muslim community so it needs only one mosque. There are different patterns of worship and different ways in which people want to express their faith.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that for some communities, starting off in an old building and converting it may be adequate. One of the mosques in Northampton started off in a house which is listed. The community has long since outgrown it and, partly because the building is listed, there is nothing much that anyone can do with it. We should recognise that as faiths become more established and grow in numbers, the community will want to move somewhere else. One that starts in a back street might want a different type of building, and one that starts on an industrial estate might find that that is not an appropriate place and want to find somewhere else.

It is important that the local authority has ways to manage that. There is some good practice around the country, which the Government could examine and build on so that we ensure that people who come to this country and who bring with them their faith and their set of beliefs find that that aspect of their culture is respected and given its due place. Faith is an essential part of any community—an expression of its beliefs and values. I do not see how faith communities can be respected, as the guidance recommends, without ensuring that they are able to buy or build the facilities that they need for the pursuit and expression of their faith.

Let me give an example, which taught me many years ago about the importance of faith buildings. When I was a newspaper reporter in South Africa, I went to Ladysmith in KwaZulu Natal to meet a mosque builder. He was born in India and as a boy worked for a mosque builder there. He came to South Africa as an indentured labourer to work in the sugarcane fields of KwaZulu Natal. Years went by, and when the Indian community in the area became more established, its members wanted a mosque. Because of apartheid, they could not go abroad to find someone to design it. The man came forward and said that he had worked as a mosque builder as a boy, and he could still remember the designs for the mosque. He drew them, and from those plans the beautiful mosque in Ladysmith was built. Indeed, he went on to build others throughout the country. The old man was a contemporary of Mahatma Gandhi; he worked with him, and he had been banned by the apartheid regime. When I met him, he was very old and almost completely blind, but he had left a wonderful legacy of amazing buildings that celebrated his faith and were a focal point of the community. I do not understand how, in the middle of apartheid South Africa, the Muslim community could manage to build that absolutely beautiful mosque, yet in tolerant, multiracial Britain my constituents have to worship in a converted service station or in a listed building, which is probably a fire risk when crowded out, as it so often is, during Friday prayers.

The problem is not due to a lack of money, because nobody is asking for any handouts and, as the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) knows, the communities are all more than capable of raising money to construct such buildings. It is due to bureaucratic inertia, a lack of relevant guidance and procedures and a failure to understand the importance to faith communities of somewhere to worship. Our country has a great and historic legacy of cathedrals and other buildings that celebrate our faith. There have also been battles over the years for chapels and other Christian buildings. They are as important as the greatest cathedrals not only for tourism and worship, but for making a statement about large sections of our society. Unfortunately, however, we do not do the same for the other faiths that now make up our society.

There are funding issues, but I do not want to get into them. Religions do not qualify as charities, so they cannot access the same funding as voluntary organisations, which can register as charities. Although religious organisations and faiths can access charity funding for the non-religious parts of their buildings, such as any community or educational facilities that are attached to their place of worship, the point still remains that, for a faith, the key aspect is the ability to worship. There is a difficult issue about funding, however, and that merits further consideration.

My real request is for the Government to include in their guidance on local spatial planning a requirement for local authorities to assess the needs of religious or faith communities, and to ensure that relevant provisions are made to meet those spatial requirements. That includes proper funeral and burial arrangements. It is impossible to dictate what kind of building goes where, but I have listed a few examples of buildings, and the hon. Gentleman listed in his own area several that would meet the needs of different groups, including the number and type of mosques. However, space needs to be allocated, and faith communities need to be engaged in a process so that they can make the best and most appropriate use of those spaces. They also need to be assured that their contribution to community cohesion will be properly recognised in the planning process.

It seems complete nonsense that a former school site, which is therefore in public ownership, having been used for public service, should be sold to a property developer on which to make a profit, while a faith community, which would have provided social cohesion and facilities for a disadvantaged local community, should be denied the chance even to try to buy a small fraction of it. Particularly in growing towns like Northampton, there is an opportunity to get things right. We must ensure that as local authorities and development corporations plan the schools, hospitals and infrastructure that they need, they recognise not only that people bring along their faiths and their belief systems, which are an important part of their community, but that those needs, as well as people's educational, health and other social needs, must be met.

[Ms Keeble]

The former half-sentence included in PPG12 was certainly inadequate, but that half a sentence was better than nothing. I was extremely sorry that the already small recognition in the planning system of the needs of faith communities was completely deleted when PPG12 was cancelled. I was also sorry that when the Department was approached, rather than the requirement being built up, it was just deleted.

The Government do not need to go out to huge consultation before drawing up some guidelines, which I hope they will do as a result of this debate. They should make a commitment to include in the planning guidance a requirement for local planning authorities, in undertaking development plans for the spatial needs of urban areas, to be obliged to assess the needs of the faith communities and to make proper provision in those plans for those needs. Authorities should be required to have a proper structure in place and to undertake proper consultation with the faith communities. The Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 provides an example. Proper recognition could be made of the real contribution of faith communities to the material benefit of local communities. This should be properly recognised, progressed and protected.

I cannot tell my hon. Friend the Minister how important this is for the communities that have played such an active role in Northampton, and I am sure that the same applies to other towns throughout the country, which so far have not been able, despite their best and most strenuous efforts, to get what they perhaps want most of all—a place where they can meet as a community and worship. They need a proper landmark and tribute paid within their towns to the beliefs that they hold dear and that define their community.

5.3 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of the Leader of the House of Commons (Barbara Keeley): I hope that any hon. Members present and yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will not see me as a poor substitute for a Department for Communities and Local Government Minister; I shall try to do my best. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) for introducing this debate on faith buildings. I did not originally intend to be here, but I have found the debate to be fascinating. The issues posed crop up in many inner-city areas—mine as much as my hon. Friend's and others—so we need to look at them. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling), who contributed in an intervention, have raised the key issues.

The DCLG Minister was going to touch on the fact that this debate provides a rare opportunity to look at the issue of buildings owned or used by faith communities. In our short debate, we have considered the question of the interaction of faith groups with the planning system, and found it wanting. My hon. Friend made key points about that.

It might help if I refer to some of the points that the DCLG Minister would have made in the debate. In terms of the bigger picture, the Government ask local authorities to show civic leadership in how they look at such issues. Local authorities are encouraged to create visions for their community; they are the bodies that can tackle the issues raised.

My hon. Friend touched on planning policy statement 12, which is entitled "Creating strong, safe and prosperous communities through local spatial planning". She rightly said that access to an appropriate building for a new faith community or one that is in the process of becoming established is a key issue that every local authority should address. Perhaps one of the places in which it should be addressed is the local strategic partnership. Those partnerships are meant to bring together the public, private and third sectors, and to co-ordinate the contribution that each can make.

Ms Keeble: My hon. Friend is not in any way a poor substitute; she knows a lot about planning. However, P[illegible]2 contains nothing at all about faith communities. [illegible] absolutely right that there should be debates in the local strategic partnerships and elsewhere, but I have found that that is all that happens. There have been lots of debates in the development corporation, for example, but we need action. There should be a statutory duty in the planning process to consider and to provide for the needs of faith communities. There must be a clear requirement in the process that those needs be considered and dealt with.

Barbara Keeley: Those points have been strongly made, and I will ensure that DCLG Ministers take them on board.

It is clear that, even as the planning policy structures stand, they should be taking into account issues such as access for faith communities to land and buildings to allow them to follow their faith according to whatever form of witness they decide to adopt. There should be provision for places of worship, just as there is for child care, play and all the other things that are taken into account alongside the obvious factors such as industry, employment and the more standard parts of the national planning policy. The planning process is not meant to be one-size-fits-all, but local authorities—county and city councils—should be taking account of the needs of their own communities.

Mr. Pelling: Perhaps it is relevant that we are debating this on the night of Epiphany. I know that that is meant to be about the journey of the three wise men, but I can definitely see three wise women on the Labour Benches. I very much want to support what the Minister says. When members of communities such as the Shi'a community in Croydon have to move from one person's home to another to pray, it means that a great deal of the voluntary support that exists in the community is not delivered as well as it could be were there a place of worship in which they could base their community activities. The Minister makes an important point.

Barbara Keeley: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention.

The notes for the Minister's speech refer to various aspects of planning controls. I remember that when I was an elected member of local government and responsible for a town centre, I found dealing with planning controls to be one of the most frustrating aspects of that role. We constantly found ourselves battling with the system. Whatever the law says, it tends to be the planning officers who have a great deal of say over such matters.

Whether the existing law is helpful or not, it says that buildings such as schools and public halls should be able to be turned into places of worship, just as they can be turned into day centres, crèches, health centres or whatever. My hon. Friend highlighted a key aspect of the issue when she described the wider benefit of those measures to community cohesion. I recently attended the opening of a new building for the Methodist community in Boothstown in my constituency. It will be a genuinely multi-use building. In fact, funding was obtained for it on the basis that it would not just be a place of worship—useful though that is—but double up as a resource that would be of considerable benefit to the wider community. That was absolutely key. If that point is not getting across to the local authority in my hon. Friend's constituency, it should be. Her point is well made, because faith communities are not only providers of sacred and secular space for people, but a key resource in communities, particularly for newly arrived communities or communities that are working to establish themselves.

There have been publications recently on faith buildings, but the key thing is to take away the very strong point that in PPS12, we appear to have guidance that does not recognise, in even half a sentence, the need for regeneration bodies or other partnership bodies to take into account the needs of faith communities. We have heard some excellent examples in the debate of where PPS12 is falling down, and we should take my hon. Friend's points back to the Department.

Ms Keeble: I understand that my hon. Friend is in quite a difficult position because she is not a DCLG Minister. In her capacity as Deputy Leader of the House, could she, as a way forward, facilitate a meeting in that Department—perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to be party to it—to look both at the possibility of producing some appropriate guidance that would recognise this issue and at the need for strong guidance for local authorities, drawing on the good practice that already exists in some areas?

Barbara Keeley: Yes, indeed. My local authority is currently going through its strategic planning phase, as are many local authorities—I do not know whether my hon. Friend's local authority is doing so. My local authority is considering strategic planning up to 2026. That process, as well as the normal day-to-day planning applications to which she referred, is key. There is an indication that there is a very substantial gap or lacuna in the planning process. If my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman can cite examples where the guidance is not working at local level, it behoves the Department to start thinking about whether a duty should be placed on local councils to consider such things.

The situation is that it will be inappropriate to carry on using converted service stations, disused cinemas or that type of building, and the new faith communities, as they settle, will not continue to be prepared to use them. It is true that we have some wonderful church buildings in our communities—there are some wonderful old churches in my constituency—but more newly arrived faith communities deserve buildings that are useful for purpose, too.

I do not think that the Minister would have offered anything specific if he had responded to the debate, so my hon. Friend makes a very sensible suggestion. I am quite prepared, as if this were a pre-recess Adjournment debate, to take her point away and to facilitate a meeting for her.

Question put and agreed to.

5.13 pm

House adjourned.

House of Commons

Thursday 7 January 2010

The House met at half-past Ten o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

BUSINESS BEFORE QUESTIONS

CANTERBURY CITY COUNCIL BILL

Motion made, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be read the Third time on Thursday 14 January at Three o'clock.

NOTTINGHAM CITY COUNCIL BILL

Motion made, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be read the Third time on Thursday 14 January at Three o'clock.

BOURNEMOUTH BOROUGH COUNCIL BILL [LORDS]

Motion made, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be considered on Thursday 14 January.

MANCHESTER CITY COUNCIL BILL [LORDS]

Motion made, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be considered on Thursday 14 January.

LEEDS CITY COUNCIL BILL (BY ORDER)

Motion made, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be considered on Thursday 14 January.

READING BOROUGH COUNCIL BILL (BY ORDER)

Motion made, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.

Hon. Members: Object.

Bill to be considered on Thursday 14 January.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY AND CLIMATE CHANGE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Greenhouse Gas Emissions (Aircraft)

1. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Whether his Department has made an assessment of the effects on greenhouse gas emissions of the temporary grounding of aircraft following the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington DC on 11 September 2001. [308886]

The Minister of State, Department of Energy and Climate Change (Joan Ruddock): The Department has not made an assessment of the effects on greenhouse gas emissions of the temporary grounding of aircraft following the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington DC on 11 September 2001.

Mr. Allen: When all air traffic in the western world was grounded after the 9/11 incident, within three days the global temperature change was 1°, and when traffic resumed it went back by 1°. Is not that a very significant scientific statement? Will my hon. Friend ensure that the Department looks into why this happened, and the impact that it should have on our future policies? I asked this question of her predecessor five years ago, and I would appreciate an answer.

Joan Ruddock: I am grateful to my hon. Friend—and it has not taken me five years to dream up an answer. First, this is not a question of greenhouse gases. The scientific interest that followed the grounding of the aircraft was do with the issue of contrails, which are the evaporation and condensation trails emitted by aircraft. We do not know the science of contrails very clearly, but there are two possible effects: first, that they reflect radiation back beyond the earth, and therefore have a cooling effect—or, secondly, that they become cirrus clouds and trap radiation, and therefore have a warming effect. The phenomenon that was observed was thought possibly to be due to the absence of contrails leading to a heating effect. However, the Department has followed subsequent studies, and we now believe that there is no evidence that contrails, or the lack of them, were responsible for the temperature rise observed at the time, and that it was a natural fluctuation.

Carbon Capture and Storage

2. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What his most recent assessment is of progress in the competition to build a commercial scale carbon capture and storage power plant in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [308887]

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): We are currently evaluating two bids to select, which will receive funding from the £90 million set aside for the front-end engineering and design stage, with the result to be announced shortly. This is one of the four demonstration projects to which we are committed, funded by the levy for carbon capture and storage under the Energy Bill, which will ensure the largest investment in CCS of any country in the world.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his answer. He recognises, as does the whole House, the importance of this work in creating jobs, apart from anything else. However, he will also know that we have fallen behind China, Australia, Canada, Germany, Norway and Belgium because we have been so late in developing this technology. When are we going to start doing something?

Edward Miliband: This is a line that the Opposition like to peddle, but it is absolutely untrue. One need only look at what has happened since 2007. We have had the pre-qualification phase and the application phase for these projects. Hundreds of pages of applications have come into our Department and are being scrutinised, as one would expect in any procurement project. We have a CCS levy before this House; we have agreement in Europe for up to 12 demonstration projects, pushed by the United Kingdom; we have a commitment in this country to four demonstration projects, which we have not had before; and we have legislation in the Energy Bill for the storage of carbon dioxide from CCS projects. We are making progress. Indeed, there is as yet no post-combustion project in the world on the scale that we are talking about in this country.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The Secretary of State will know that burning coal cleanly is important both in his constituency and in mine. He will also know that there are plans to extend that process at Harworth colliery, but a loan from the European Investment Bank cannot be made until a guarantee of clean coal technology is available for that coal. What can he do to help the men at Harworth?

Edward Miliband: As my hon. Friend will be aware, we have been in touch with the European Investment Bank and continue to have dialogue with it about these matters, including the specific issue that he mentions. As we look forward to carbon capture and storage in this country, it is important to say that there is also a role for indigenous coal. My Department is very clear about that, and we do all we can, working with others, to support that process.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): The Secretary of State's fellow Ministers have heard the evidence given to the Public Bill Committee on the Energy Bill this week, with people describing the need for regulatory certainty if we are going to get investment in this new technology. Industry and environmental groups all agree that the terms for investment must be set for decades, not just the next few years, so will the Secretary of State agree that the Government should now take powers to set an emissions performance standard for a maximum level of emissions for new fossil fuel plant, as proposed by ourselves, the Liberal Democrats, many of his own parliamentary colleagues and many outside, to provide that regulatory certainty and show a real commitment to a low-carbon economy?

Edward Miliband: Obviously, we will look at any proposals that come forward, but I say to the hon. Gentleman—perhaps he has not followed the matter as closely as he might have done—that we have unveiled the most environmentally stringent conditions for new coal-fired power stations of any country in the world. We consulted on them and we have now put them into national policy statements. The proposals have been widely welcomed, both by the green groups that he mentions and by energy companies, as striking the right balance. A plant-level emissions standard could also have a role. As I understand it, the Environment Agency already has powers to introduce one, but we will examine any proposals that come forward.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that pre-combustion carbon capture has the advantage of producing chemicals, especially hydrogen, and that we ought to encourage commercial interests in that area as well as in post-combustion carbon capture? Has he had any negotiations with BP, which pulled out of the Peterhead experiment?

Edward Miliband: I think I am right in saying that the Peterhead proposal was for a gas-fired power station. Our concentration in spending significant amounts of money has been on coal-fired power stations. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that pre-combustion has an important role. We have said that of the four demonstration projects up to two will be pre-combustion, precisely because we recognise the importance of that technology. It is important to say that as we spend a significant sum on carbon capture and storage—as I said, it is the largest sum spent by any country in the world—we need to test all the technologies to drive it forward, including pre-combustion.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): In evidence to the Public Bill Committee on the Energy Bill, some witnesses have suggested that the 2014 target of having a demonstrator up and working is just one of the conditions and may be allowed to slip. Can the Secretary of State assure us that it will be a principal condition that the demonstrator must be up and working by 2014?

Edward Miliband: As I think I have said in previous answers on this matter, that was set out as one of the conditions for the demonstration project and remains one of the conditions, and we are certainly considering that closely as we consider the bids that have been put forward.

Fuel Inefficiency

3. Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): What recent assessment he has made of the contribution of fuel inefficiency to fuel poverty. [308889]

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): Fuel poverty is caused by three factors: incomes, prices and household energy efficiency. We are acting on all three, including through higher winter fuel and cold weather payments this winter, and through compulsory help with bills for the most vulnerable, which is being legislated for in the current Energy Bill. In the pre-Budget report, an extra £150 million was provided for the Warm Front programme next year, building on the 2 million households helped in the last decade.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that answer, but he will know that, especially in cold spells such as the recent one, it is those in the most energy-inefficient homes, which tend to be the hardest to treat, and those who use expensive sources of heating off the gas grid such as heating oil and liquefied petroleum gas, who suffer most. Despite the warm words about such homes and about the people who use those energy sources, precious little has been done to warm them up. They tend to come at the end of the queue. What can the right hon. Gentleman say to assure me that in future, people in hard-to-treat homes off the gas grid will come at the front of the queue?

Edward Miliband: I recognise that that is an issue to consider throughout the country, including in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and I shall try to explain our strategy to him. First, we have said that social price support will be focused on electricity bills, to ensure that everyone gets the benefit of it, not just those on the gas grid. Secondly, we have recently increased the amount that poor households off the gas grid can get under Warm Front to a £6,000 maximum grant for oil-based or renewable heating systems. Thirdly, the renewable heat incentive is being introduced, precisely to encourage the take-up of different forms of heating by those who are not on the gas grid, and fourthly, the community energy-saving programme will work in rural areas to see what can be done to provide whole-house efficiency. There is more that we can do, but we are trying to make a difference to the households that are difficult to reach.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend say something about the current Warm Front funding, and how long it is taking individual households, particularly those that do not have central heating or whose boilers have been condemned, to get action? There seems to be some concern that it is taking up to six months. In this weather, that is six months too long.

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend asks an important question. The amount of money allocated to the Warm Front programme was due to fall next year. Thanks to the Chancellor—in tough times—making the decision to allocate another £150 million to it, the amount of Warm Front money will be significantly enhanced next year. That should help with some of the queuing issues to which my hon. Friend refers. Warm Front is a very popular programme—lots of households want to take advantage of it—and it is good that the Chancellor recognises both its importance and its success, and has provided more resources for it.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Now that we have reached the 13th, and coldest, winter of this Labour Government, what excuse is there for the fact that according to Government figures, only one in 100 British households is properly insulated, when lack of insulation is the biggest contributor to fuel poverty in this country?

Edward Miliband: It is characteristic of the Liberal Democrats to blame the Government for the weather. On the hon. Gentleman's serious question about energy efficiency and insulation, there is more to do, but it is important to point out that under our programmes, 1.5 million homes a year are being insulated and getting the help they need. The Warm Front programme, which did not exist before, has helped 2 million homes since its inception. There is more to do. That is why we are planning a decade-long improvement in energy efficiency, including a pay-as-you-save mechanism, to make it possible to do more.

Simon Hughes: The Secretary of State has given us a piecemeal answer to a much bigger question. Before his Government are frozen out by the electorate, is he willing to commit himself today to a national 10-year warm home programme and to support the amendment to the Energy Bill that my hon. Friends and I have tabled, which would mean that the programme could start this year?

Edward Miliband: I will look at the amendment—but the last Bill that came forward from the Liberal Democrats was an uncosted shopping list, with no basis for paying for it. That is a luxury of opposition but not a luxury of government. We are planning, and I can commit to, a national energy programme over the next 10 years. We are consulting on it, and will have more to say about it in the coming weeks.

Derek Twigg (Halton) (Lab): Ofgem, the regulator, has a very important role in reducing fuel poverty, but the Public Bill Committee on the Energy Bill has just heard evidence that it does not necessarily have the confidence to know legally when it can intervene to force companies to do more. Will my right hon. Friend comment on that, and say how the Energy Bill will help to make it clear to Ofgem what responsibilities it has to help people?

Edward Miliband: I look forward to reading the report of proceedings in the Energy Bill Committee—it sounds as if many interesting things were said. One purpose of the Bill is precisely to strengthen Ofgem's powers in a number of respects and to make it a more proactive regulator—a regulator that not only relies on competition to help consumers, but realises that it has a duty to be proactive on their behalf. It has done more of that in the past year, including taking action on prepayment meters and other issues, but I am sure there is more to do.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Has the Secretary of State read the report on fuel poverty published in 2008 by the Select Committee on Business and Enterprise? It said that to keep fuel affordable, increasing gas storage

> "is now an issue of national importance and should be a high priority in domestic energy policy."

What increase in storage capacity has there been since then?

Edward Miliband: More gas storage is coming on line, including the Aldbrough gas storage project, which recently completed its first phase. The hon. Gentleman is going around saying that gas storage is a big problem for the UK and citing figures, but National Grid is quoted in the papers this morning as saying that his figures are meaningless, because they ignore the role of the North sea, which provides 50 per cent. of our gas storage, and the role of UK import capacity.

Greg Clark: The Secretary of State should listen to the Select Committee and note that North sea production is in decline, and he should listen to Lord Hunt of Kings Heath, his junior Minister, who said that the new storage capacity opened in the past year has been the equivalent of five hours' worth—which is about as much time as it takes the Secretary of State to decide whether or not to back the Prime Minister. Gas storage helps to offset fuel poverty by allowing us to buy supplies when they are cheap in the summer, to be used in the winter. Is he aware that if we had had just half of France's storage capacity, British consumers could be paying £1 billion less for their gas this winter? What is his policy on how much gas storage is needed?

Edward Miliband: We need more gas storage, and there are more projects planned. The hon. Gentleman has cited figures for gas storage, but The Independent this morning says that > "the National Grid dismissed the calculation as a 'meaningless number' because it ignored both the amount of gas imported and that nearly half of UK demand is met by North Sea production."

We do need more gas storage, but it is worth saying that at the beginning of this week gas storage was 80 per cent. full in the UK. The hon. Gentleman claims that gas storage is somehow an issue in this cold weather, but he knows that that is complete nonsense.

Greg Clark: Is it not clear that when fuel poverty is soaring, we have too little gas storage capacity, and the Government have said that they expect power cuts by 2017, they are—in this winter of discontent with, and within, the Government—taking us back, with every day that goes by, to a world that we thought we had left behind in the 1970s?

Edward Miliband: I do not know whether that was a question, a statement or something that the hon. Gentleman prepared in front of the mirror this morning. Frankly, he will have to do better. Playing politics with energy security and gas storage, and alarming people, is the wrong thing to do.

Fuel Poverty

4. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): How many households in the UK were in fuel poverty in (a) 2003 and (b) 2009. [308890]

5. John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): How many households in the UK were in fuel poverty in (a) 2003 and (b) 2009. [308891]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): The current exceptionally cold weather causes us all concern for the well-being of all households in fuel poverty. The Department for Work and Pensions makes cold weather payments as a contribution towards extra heating costs during a week of very cold weather in the area in which an eligible customer lives. This winter the number of cold weather payments made is estimated to be worth £185 million. Payments are made automatically, but if anyone has questions about the help available to them, they can access information on the directgov website—or if they do not have access to, or the inclination to use, the internet, they can always ask their Member of Parliament.

The estimated number of households in fuel poverty in the UK was around 2 million in 2003. The latest year for which figures are available is 2007, and they show that there were then around 4 million fuel-poor households in the UK.

Tony Baldry: I thank the Minister for that statement. My understanding is that last winter more than 5 million families were in fuel poverty. The Government have a statutory target to eradicate fuel poverty in vulnerable households by 2010. Will they meet that target?

Mr. Kidney: It is very frustrating to me that the figures for fuel poverty are two-years-old, so the figure that the hon. Gentleman gives is an estimate. There is no doubt that rising fuel prices between 2004 and 2008 have caused us great difficulty in meeting that target, but I have not given up trying to meet it. All our efforts are directed towards eradicating fuel poverty, as we are indeed required to do.

John Penrose: Will the Minister accept that during one of the worst cold snaps for years, when vulnerable people such as pensioners in my constituency and elsewhere are struggling to keep their homes warm, it is especially important that consumers can switch to the cheapest available energy tariff offered by their supplier? Does he therefore agree that energy companies should be obliged to publish information on each customer's bill showing whether they would be better off on an alternative scheme?

Mr. Kidney: I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman, and it is the Government's policy to encourage people to study the market and switch if possible. There is a new licence condition applying to every supplier from this month, requiring them to deliver to their customers an annual statement that includes information about their ability to switch and advice on how to do so. By the end of this year, every customer should have received the first of those statements.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): May I draw the Minister's attention to the needs, in this weather, of those who live in mobile homes, many of whom are on low incomes? They have a very limited choice of energy supply, and also lack options for additional insulation to improve the efficiency of their homes. I have raised this issue before, and the Government have so far done very little to assist that group of consumers to reduce the proportion of their income spent on energy bills. Is there anything that he can do now?

Mr. Kidney: My hon. Friend has indeed been persistent in pursuing this issue, and I am pleased to say that in response to his pressure, the Department has agreed that it wants to pilot some schemes for delivering greater energy efficiency measures to park homes. I am not in a position to announce at the Dispatch Box today what the schemes will be, but I will be able to do so shortly.

Severn Barrage

6. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth) (Lab/Co-op): What recent assessment he has made of progress on a decision on an option for the construction of a Severn barrage. [308892]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): The Government are currently carrying out a feasibility study to decide whether we could support a Severn tidal scheme, and if so, on what terms. All the evidence gathered will be published alongside a second public consultation, which is expected to be held later this year.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. This is an enormously exciting, but also enormously challenging, project: it has the potential to make a major contribution to the UK's renewable energy needs, but is complex in both engineering and environmental terms. As well as providing the public information that he mentioned, will he agree to draw together Members of Parliament on both sides of the Severn estuary so that we can be involved in an interim process and understand how the Government are taking the project forward?

Mr. Kidney: My right hon. Friend is right to say that there are great potential gains to be made from generating renewable energy from a barrier or similar scheme on the Severn. On the other hand, however, there are international and national nature conservation and biodiversity issues that also have to be considered. My noble Friend Lord Hunt, my fellow Energy Minister, recently wrote to all hon. Members updating them on the process and expressing a willingness to hold the sort of meeting that my right hon. Friend has just suggested. My noble Friend and I remain perfectly willing to meet Members of Parliament to update them on the scheme.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Could the study that the Minister mentioned cover the need for a grid connection for the Severn barrage project? At present, the National Grid wants to put in a new line of pylons across the Somerset levels, which will also affect the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose). That is controversial, and we oppose it. It would make sense to go for a submarine cable to take the energy away from Hinkley. That could be done as part of the study for the Severn barrage.

Mr. Kidney: I have heard the right hon. Gentleman make that point on behalf of his constituents before, and I congratulate him on his persistence and ingenuity in working it into the question before us. I assure him that every aspect of the development is being considered in the feasibility study, so my answer to his question is yes.

Copenhagen Conference

7. Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to tackle climate change following the outcome of the United Nations climate change conference in Copenhagen; and if he will make a statement. [illegible]

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): Despite the disappointment that Copenhagen did not succeed in the way we had hoped, we are determined to work with our international partners to build on the achievements of the Copenhagen accord, agreed to by representatives of 49 developing and developed countries. In particular, we will work with others to ensure that the deepest possible cuts in emissions are made, that we deliver on the financial promises made to the developing world, and that we redouble our efforts to secure a comprehensive, legally binding framework.

Sir Peter Soulsby: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply, and congratulate him and the Prime Minister on the part that they played in getting as far in Copenhagen as was achieved. However, will he comment on the impression that the problems in Copenhagen were at least as much those of the decision-making process as they were matters of substance? Will he say what action the Government are taking to try to reform the decision-making process to ensure that the frustrations of Copenhagen are not repeated in the future?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend draws our attention to an important issue that I talked about a bit in my statement on Tuesday. The process was unsatisfactory. I have talked to the executive secretary of the UN framework convention about how we can reform that process, and I am pleased that the UN Secretary-General, Ban Ki-moon, has said that he too will think about how the process can be reformed. We must ensure that we do not have a repeat of the process problems at Copenhagen, which obscured any differences over substance and prevented proper discussion of them. I think that the process needs to be reformed, and I think that that will happen.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Despite the disappointment of Copenhagen, there are still many practical things that we could and should be doing at home—on rain forests, for example. We will never halt their destruction if we do not choke off demand for illegal timber. Unlike the Prime Minister's approach, an Act to halt the import of such timber by making it a criminal offence to sell it here in the UK would command widespread support on the Labour Benches, as well as on ours. So will the Secretary of State support an Act to make the sale of illegal timber a criminal offence? If he does not act, a new Conservative Government will.

Edward Miliband: We now see the Conservative party trying to play politics with international climate change—exactly what happened on Tuesday, in response to my statement—which is deeply regrettable. We are working in the European Union to deal with the problem of illegal logging, but we will also look at any other proposal that is put forward.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement this morning that we should redouble our efforts following Copenhagen and not throw our hands up in despair, even though the result was depressing. Will the Government be pressing to go ahead with the EU's higher than intended carbon emissions savings budget, and will he ask the Committee on Climate Change to review as a matter of urgency the costs of doing so?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend draws attention to an important issue. Over the coming months we will need to work to use the EU's commitment to move from 20 to 30 per cent., to lever in higher ambition from others. The commitment that the EU has made is an important one. I will be working intensively in the coming weeks, before the 31 January deadline for commitments to be lodged in the Copenhagen accord, to see how far we can get in Europe on that commitment. We have existing advice from the Climate Change Committee on the costs and benefits of moving to a higher figure—and in fact, as a result of the recession, the costs of doing so have fallen.

Tidal Energy

8. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What recent progress has been made on developing tidal energy schemes; and if he will make a statement. [308894]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): A lot of progress has been made on developing tidal energy schemes. The Crown Estate leasing round for the Pentland firth is on course, and we expect the Crown Estate to announce the successful bidders by the end of March. There are three feasibility studies for tidal range projects currently under way, for the Severn, the Mersey and the Solway firth. Officials have now received the final report on the screening study for marine energy development in English and Welsh waters, which will inform Ministers' decisions on whether to proceed with a strategic environmental assessment for English and Welsh waters.

Dr. Pugh: I thank the Minister for that answer. However, given that something as modest as Peel Holdings' proposal for a tidal lagoon in the Mersey would generate 650 GW of energy a year—much more than wind farms—is it not time the Government got solidly behind such schemes, given our dismal record on renewables? We have had plenty of studies. We now need some action.

Mr. Kidney: I got sufficiently solidly behind that project by visiting it last year and giving it my personal support. Peel Holdings and the North West Development Agency are currently spending £3 million on the feasibility study to which the hon. Gentleman referred, which will conclude this year. I am enthusiastic about its prospects of leading to a suitable scheme that will be meaningful in producing renewable energy from the marine environment.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): As my hon. Friend rightly said, any scheme has to be a reasonable one that works. Does he therefore recognise the work of the Energy Technologies Institute, which he visited in my constituency some time ago, in ensuring that the technologies that we introduce are the most efficient and best for the country, and will make a genuine economic impact? What steps is he taking to ensure that some of the private sector partners required to make that £1 billion Energy Technologies Institute work are being involved, and can he assist in ensuring that that happens?

Mr. Kidney: I am solidly behind the Energy Technologies Institute too, having visited it. I congratulate the institute on its decision to invest in research and development, and deployment for marine technologies. My hon. Friend is so right that we are talking about an innovative collaboration between the public and private sectors. A number of key manufacturers in this country are subscribers to the ETI, and I would encourage more to join.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Feasibility studies, consultations, reviews and glossy brochures cannot mask Labour's total failure over the past decade to develop the huge potential of offshore renewable energy—not just tidal energy, but wind and wave energy, and other forms of harnessing the immense power of the sea. Will the Government now recognise that ambitious Conservative proposals for marine energy parks, supported by a green investment bank and new energy infrastructure offshore, is the way to realise the potential of our seas, rather than the piecemeal, short-term and ineffective approach that has characterised this out-of-touch Labour Government?

Mr. Kidney: I just cannot understand how the hon. Gentleman can be so out of touch. This country leads the world in connected electricity energy from offshore wind, and the recent announcement of the round 3 leases by the Crown Estate makes us by far the largest contributor in the world to that technology. On marine technology—which is what this question was supposed to be about—I do not think the work we have done on the banded renewables obligation, the marine renewables proving fund or the strategic environmental assessment can be dismissed as lightly as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Wind Energy

9. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South) (Lab): What estimate he has made of the number of wind energy projects approved by local authorities in the last two years; and if he will make a statement. [308895]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): Local authorities in England, Scotland and Wales have approved 76 onshore wind energy planning applications in the last two years. All planning applications for wind energy in Northern Ireland are determined by the Northern Ireland Planning Service. There is now over 3 GW of installed capacity of onshore wind operating in the UK.

Nigel Griffiths: Is the Minister concerned about the number of Conservative and Liberal councils that oppose onshore wind farms, and about the Conservative MPs who oppose offshore wind farming? Does he realise that their opposition is sabotaging the £1 billion investment in renewables by the Labour Government?

Mr. Kidney: The leader of the Conservatives says that we can judge what a Conservative Government would do by looking at their record in local government. They have an abysmal record of holding up and rejecting applications for onshore wind farms.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Although wind power can make a contribution to Britain's energy needs, does the Minister also accept that local authorities have an important role to play in listening to the desires of their local residents? [Interruption.] If wind farms are appropriately placed, yes, but if they are inappropriately placed, they do damage the future of the industry.

Mr. Kidney: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the planning laws are there to strike an important balance between nature conservation and biodiversity on the one hand, and, on the other, the vital need for more renewable energy.

Carbon Capture And Storage

10. Phil Wilson (Sedgefield) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the effectiveness of carbon capture and storage technology in reducing the level of carbon dioxide emissions; and if he will make a statement. [308896]

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): The International Energy Agency estimates that carbon capture and storage could contribute up to 20 per cent. of the cuts needed in greenhouse gases by 2050. Without CCS, the cost of emission reduction needed to meet climate change targets globally would increase by more than 70 per cent. The four demonstration projects we are planning and those around the world will provide more information on the effectiveness of the technology.

Phil Wilson: In evidence to the North-East Regional Committee's report on industry and innovation in the north-east of England, Andrew Sugden, a director of the North East chamber of commerce said:

> "The private sector can go so far in clean coal technology, but so much is experimental and this is being done on a scale that has never been tried before. There has to be a balance of risk."

What more can the Government do in this regard, and what kind of job creation can this technology achieve in the north of England?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the private sector can play a role in this, but the risks relating to this new technology—and, indeed, the gains—do not justify one company making the kind of investment required. That is why we are introducing the carbon capture and storage levy, which will provide a stream of funding for CCS over the next two decades. It is the largest such investment in the world.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): We have heard evidence in the Energy and Climate Change Committee of the great enthusiasm of some generators for connecting carbon capture and storage with extra production from the North sea to the tune of about 15 per cent. That has not been mentioned much, and I want to ask the enthusiastic Secretary of State whether he will get enthusiastic about this particular point. [Interruption.]

Edward Miliband: I am always enthusiastic, as one of my hon. Friends has just helpfully pointed out. We should look at all the technologies that exist. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman, because he, among others in the House, is a great advocate of carbon capture and storage and the role that it can play. Britain is uniquely placed in relation to CCS because of the North sea.

11. Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to encourage the use of carbon capture and storage technology; and if he will make a statement. [308897]

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): We are planning four demonstration projects funded by the CCS levy. We have also successfully argued for money to be set aside for up to 10 demonstration projects across Europe, and we are working with countries across the world on moving forward CCS technology.

Gwyn Prosser: What assessment has my right hon. Friend made of the overall job creation potential of CCS over the next five to 10 years? What will he do to ensure that such jobs are created right across the regions, and not just in the areas local to the plants?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend is absolutely right—across all regions there are opportunities relating to low carbon and, in a number of regions, relating to carbon capture and storage. We shall shortly look at where the CCS clusters can be, and how we can take proper industrial advantage of CCS. Estimates suggest that tens of thousands of jobs could be created in this area.

Nuclear Waste

12. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What progress his Department has made on the proposal of the Committee on Radioactive Waste Management for deep geological disposal of nuclear waste; and if he will make a statement. [308900]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): The Government accepted in 2006 the recommendations of the Committee on Radioactive Waste Management on geological disposal, coupled with safe and secure interim storage. Following public consultation, the Government published the White Paper, "Managing Radioactive Waste Safely: A Framework for Implementing Geological Disposal" in June 2008. The first step is an expression of interest from a community that may be interested in hosting a geological disposal facility. To date, we have received three expressions of interest relating to the Copeland and Allerdale districts in Cumbria. Officials are in discussion with these authorities, but it remains open for other local authorities to express an interest.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for his extensive answer. The Secretary of State said in an evidence session in the late summer that by late autumn we would have a statement on how to deal with nuclear waste and how to store it geologically. May we have this statement as soon as possible and why has there been a delay?

Mr. Kidney: My hon. Friend has great knowledge of, and speaks with great authority on, this subject, so I take to heart his request that we hurry up and make the statement he seeks. I cannot answer him today regarding the reason for the delay, but I can assure him that the work I described in my answer to him will go on, and that we are looking forward to the construction and operation of a facility that will be a multi-million pound project, providing skilled employment for hundreds of people over many decades.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Does the Minister accept that even those of us who are sceptical about the more exaggerated theories of global warming want to see rapid moves towards greater diversity of supply, less reliance on imported hydrocarbons and therefore the rapid development of nuclear energy? Is it not a disgrace that it has taken so long to get to any kind of resolution to this problem of the disposal of nuclear waste?

Mr. Kidney: No, this is the first Government who have got a grip on the decision about the long-term future disposal of nuclear waste. It is good, however, that there is common ground between us on the security of energy supply and its coming from diverse sources; on that we can agree. There has certainly not been any delay in planning or policy for new nuclear, as we have seen three consortiums coming forward with plans for about 16 GW of new power from nuclear.

Copenhagen Conference

13. Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to tackle climate change following the outcome of the United Nations climate change conference in Copenhagen; and if he will make a statement. [309901]

The Minister of State, Department of Energy and Climate Change (Joan Ruddock): The Copenhagen accord sets out a framework for international action to tackle climate change, in which the UK will play its full part. The UK has so far committed to cutting emissions by 34 per cent. by 2020; our low carbon transition plan sets out the pathway for achieving this.

Mr. Reed: I thank the Minister for her reply. Everybody will have noticed the splendid efforts of her Department at Copenhagen, but there was some disappointment at the United Nations framework. If these disappointments continue, will the Department consider pursuing separate bilateral negotiations with the biggest polluters, namely the US and China?

Joan Ruddock: I think we would not specifically do that; we would not seek to undermine the UN process. We have not lost our hopes that we can proceed from the Copenhagen agreement. This was a kind of success—not as much as we wanted, but the fact is that there is so much on the table and we need to get on with it. The most important thing the UK can do at this point is to push forward on what we have got. We must ensure, for example, that the fast-track financing for developing countries comes on stream and we are going to make our own contribution of up to £1.5 billion on that. We also need to establish the high-level panel to look at the $100 billion financing proposals for 2020 and beyond, and we need to support the Danes in getting a critical mass of countries to support the accord. Furthermore, we have just a short time to get the most ambitious commitments put into the document by the end of this month. We will do our utmost, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, to ensure that that happens so that we do not lose the dynamic that exists, despite the disappointments of Copenhagen.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): On the subject of the Government's leadership, will the Minister ask her colleague the Secretary of State to work in close association with his close friend at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to persuade our embassies to ask the United States Congress to support the initiative, and also to persuade the European Union not to be divided on the issue?

Joan Ruddock: Indeed. I pay tribute to the Foreign Office and all its staff for their enormous efforts in the run-up to Copenhagen, and we can be assured that they will continue those efforts. Our bilateral discussions are critical to progress, not least in the EU, where we continue to strive for the most ambitious possible target: a 30 per cent. reduction in emissions by 2020.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I welcome the $100 billion fund and the United Kingdom Government's leadership in that context, particularly given that part of the fund relates to adaptation to climate change. Will those moneys be in addition to, or a substitution for, development moneys that already go to developing countries?

Joan Ruddock: We have made it absolutely clear that there should be no question of countries' saying, "Because we give overseas aid, we do not need to make additional moneys available." We have suggested that no more than 10 per cent. of existing and promised official development assistance should be provided for adaptation or other climate-related purposes. We consider that limit very important. There are legitimate overlaps between development and adaptation to climate change, but they are limited, and we must make them so.

Topical Questions

T1. [309910] Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If he will make a statement on his departmental responsibilities.

The Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Edward Miliband): One of my Department's responsibilities is helping people to cut their bills and their use of carbon. That is why this week, following the allocation of £50 million in the pre-Budget report, the Government launched the boiler scrappage scheme, which will give 125,000 households a £400 reduction in the cost of replacing a G-rated boiler with a much more efficient A-rated one. Further details can be obtained from the Energy Saving Trust.

Mr. Bone: Can the Secretary of State give us an insight into what happens to his Department, and what delays are incurred, in the event of one of these coups—a Prime Minister scrappage scheme, if you will? How much time is diverted from the running of his Department? Conservative Members find the position very difficult to understand, because we are all united behind our leader.

Edward Miliband: That is a ridiculous question. It is clear from the launch of initiatives such as the boiler scrappage scheme that the Government are getting on with the business of government and helping people in these difficult times.

T4. [309914] Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What assessment has my hon. Friend made of the electric car trials in Coventry and elsewhere in the west midlands, and how does he intend to support those schemes?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change (Mr. David Kidney): I am glad that my hon. Friend has asked that question. This is a very exciting trial involving 100 electric vehicles in Birmingham and Coventry. We are observing the results keenly as we clearly need to move away from fossil fuels, given the volume of road traffic in this country.

T2. [308912] Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): In the context of tackling climate change, the Minister is doubtless aware of the key report produced in the 1990s by the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment for the Department for Transport, which demonstrated that providing extra capacity generates journeys that would otherwise not be made. Why are the Government bumping up carbon emissions unnecessarily by promoting a third runway at Heathrow and widening motorways for hard-shoulder running?

Edward Miliband: On the question of the third runway, I hope that the hon. Gentleman has seen the report from the Committee on Climate Change, which shows that we have a clear target for carbon emissions from aviation and explains how it can be accommodated within constrained demand from aviation. Our policy is not one of unconstrained demand, but nor does it assume that we will somehow freeze the amount of flying that people do. That is not realistic, and it would not be good for our economy. It would not be good for our society either, because many more people are emigrating to this country and will want to travel for business and other purposes.

T5. [308916] Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth) (Lab/Co-op): I have pointed out on a number of occasions that, while wind farm applications are often passionately opposed when they are seen to be imposed on the local community by big business, applications owned and promoted by the local community are often supported with equal passion. Will my right hon. Friend commit himself to making community ownership the norm for wind energy in the United Kingdom?

Edward Miliband: My right hon. Friend, who has been a great fighter for the co-operative movement, is entirely right. Community ownership plays a very important role. The feed-in tariff will also help to encourage communities to come forward with their own proposals for renewable energy.

T3. [308913] Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Will the Government stand by their pledge last year and include micro-combined heat and power in the forthcoming statutory instrument on feed-in tariffs?

Edward Miliband: We are in the middle of a consultation on that and the hon. Gentleman will have to wait for the results. The micro-CHP industry—we were looking at a micro-CHP boiler recently during the launch of the boiler scrappage scheme—is important and needs to be supported.

T8. [308919] Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Now that clean-coal technology looks to be a certainty, how many coal mines does my right hon. Friend envisage will be opened shortly?

Edward Miliband: It is hard to estimate how many will be reopened but it is important to say that that will provide important support for our indigenous coal industry, and that carbon capture and storage can make coal a fuel of the future and will provide the certainty that our indigenous industry needs.

T6. [308917] Mr. Edward Timpson (Crewe and Nantwich) (Con): Recently released figures show that just over one in eight households in Crewe and Nantwich are living in fuel poverty. In attempting to tackle that growing problem, energy suppliers have committed collective social assistance spending of about £150 million in 2010-11, but what commitment have they made beyond 2011?

Mr. Kidney: I encourage the hon. Gentleman to help such households in his constituency by referring them to assistance such as Warm Front and other energy efficiency measures, and to the energy supplier obligation. I also encourage him to seek to ensure that they have the benefits to which they are entitled and that they receive social tariff support from their energy supplier, if possible. The answer to his question lies yet again in the deliberations of the Committee that is considering the Energy Bill, about which we have heard so much today. We do indeed intend to put the voluntary agreement for social price support on to a statutory basis, and we propose to double the amount of support under that scheme.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I am encouraged by what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said about feed-in tariffs. Will he confirm that, if feed-in tariffs are not sufficiently high to encourage community-owned, small-scale green power schemes, they will not succeed in that respect? In the light of that, will he redouble his efforts to find a space in his diary to visit the Torrs hydropower scheme in New Mills, the country's first 70 kW community-owned hydropower scheme?

Edward Miliband: I am looking forward to visiting the scheme my hon. Friend mentions. Such schemes can benefit from the feed-in tariff and other measures that we are taking. It is important that in April, when the feed-in tariff comes in, many communities and indeed individuals take advantage of it.

T7. [308918] Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): As has been mentioned, those households that do not have the benefit of mains gas are more liable to suffer fuel poverty because of the cost of alternative fuel. Historically, the liquefied petroleum gas market has been very uncompetitive, but the Office of Fair Trading has now introduced regulations to bring more competition into the market. Unfortunately many consumers do not realise the opportunities that they now have to reduce the cost of fuel. Will the Secretary of State consider a publicity programme so that those consumers can understand the opportunities they have and reduce their fuel costs?

The Minister of State, Department of Energy and Climate Change (Joan Ruddock): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his suggestions. He is absolutely right. There is continuing concern about that matter and about people who are off the gas grid and do not have options. We are looking at ways of dealing with that, particularly through the Energy Bill and mandated tariffs, which could be of some help but not sufficient—I agree with him on that. He suggests publicising what is available to people, which is a good idea and we will certainly look at that.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State reassure domestic gas consumers that, even in extreme cold weather, good management of the grid, the use of North sea reserves and the interconnector mean that there is no prospect of their supplies being cut off?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend raises an important issue. We have seen, on successive days this week, record demand on the grid. Obviously, I am in regular touch with the National Grid about that. It assures me that supply can meet the demand out there, despite the quite extreme weather conditions we are facing. I maintain vigilance on that and talk regularly to the National Grid.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Given the confusion caused by energy companies having more than 4,000 different tariffs, many Opposition Members believe that in order to help people who are paying too much for their energy, and particularly those living in fuel poverty, energy companies should be obliged to publish on all domestic bills whether their customers are on their cheapest tariff. When I raised this issue with the Secretary of State last year—

Mr. Speaker: Order. For the avoidance of doubt, let me say that we do need brief questions. May we have a question now, please?

Mr. Baron: When I put this idea to the Secretary of State last year, he initially welcomed it, then backed away from it, and then said it would be included in Ofgem's annual statement. What—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I did give him a chance to ask his question.

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman has been a doughty fighter on this issue. My understanding is that Ofgem is introducing, as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary mentioned in an earlier answer, an annual statement that must be provided to customers, and which gives the information the hon. Gentleman wants. I am sure that if that is not the case, the hon. Gentleman will take the matter up with my hon. Friend or myself.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): The village of St. Margaret's in my constituency is working hard to become a low-carbon community. Can the Secretary of State assure us that the funding for the challenge scheme will continue, and will he join me in paying a visit to St. Margaret's to see the excellent work the community is doing?

Edward Miliband: I pay tribute to the community my hon. Friend represents and to the people of St. Margaret's for what they are doing. The low-carbon communities challenge has been a great success in terms of the number of applications received, and we want to help as many communities as possible to be trailblazers for low carbon, showing how the transition to it can make a difference to people's lives through the introduction of smart meters, insulation, renewable energy and a whole range of other measures. All this is part of the positive vision that we must offer for tackling climate change.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): The Under-Secretary made an important announcement earlier in respect of residents of park homes. When can he provide more detail on that, and will he consider using one of the parks in my constituency as one of the pilot projects, because we have more than 1,000 park homes in Christchurch?

Mr. Kidney: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that question. This issue has been under consideration for some time, so we are close to being able to give the detail he wants. I note his interest in his constituency being one of the pilot areas, and I shall take that on board as a representation.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): What support and encouragement are the Government giving to sub-aquatic marine energy generation—I am thinking of the plant off Northern Ireland, and we also had a United Kingdom plant off the coast of Portugal? This is the way forward for the future. What support is being given to it?

Mr. Kidney: Our country has the best testing facilities in the world: we have the New and Renewable Energy Centre—NaREC—as well as a facility in the Orkneys and the forthcoming wave hub in Cornwall. The specific technology to which my hon. Friend refers is either in place at, or being built at, the Orkneys facility, with some further testing and accreditation, and it is hoped that it will be the first applicant for assistance from the marine renewables deployment fund.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Amid the general failure at Copenhagen, there was at least positive discussion about mechanisms to reduce deforestation. Is the Secretary of State content that, among the mechanisms envisaged, there is sufficient protection for the rights of forest peoples, who are probably the best guardians of the rain forest? Could not the British Government set a very important precedent and make a valuable contribution to this process by ratifying International Labour Organisation convention 169 on the rights of tribal peoples, as other European countries have done?

Edward Miliband: Okay, I shall endeavour to look up ILO convention 169. The hon. Gentleman's general point about the importance of protecting the rights of forest people as we tackle deforestation is very important. One of the areas in which more progress was made at Copenhagen was the so-called RED—reducing emissions from deforestation—negotiations. Some important commitments were made by developed countries, and we need to move that forward.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): This House needs to be concerned about fuel poverty. Can the Secretary of State say how much the average electricity user is paying because of the subsidy relating to this Government's climate change policies being included in their bills?

Edward Miliband: From memory, I think we have said that by 2020 the climate change policies will add about 8 per cent. as a whole to energy bills. I say to the hon. Gentleman, however, that there is no high-carbon, low-cost future out there, because the truth is that if we want to have secure energy, we also need low-carbon energy—renewable and nuclear energy. So, yes, there are upward pressures on energy bills, and that makes life difficult for people, including those in fuel poverty, but it is right that we go down the low-carbon energy route. However, it is also right that we take measures to protect the most vulnerable.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Has the Secretary of State read "Sustainable Energy—without the hot air", the widely acclaimed and freely available book by Professor David MacKay? Is he aware of the following statement within that book:

> "if we covered the windiest 10 per cent. of the country with windmills…we would be able to generate…half of the power used by driving an average fossil-fuel car 50 kilometres per day."?

Does that not behove us to consider very carefully the viability of onshore wind power?

Edward Miliband: Our chief scientist is a very distinguished person and his book has been by my bedside for some time. I have certainly read parts of it, although I cannot promise that I have read it from cover to cover. It is a good and illuminating read.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about wind power, I am clear that offshore and onshore wind power are part of our energy mix, alongside nuclear power and carbon capture and storage clean coal. All those things are necessary to provide us with secure and low-carbon energy.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Will the Government press the United Nations to undertake an assessment of the extra carbon emissions caused by the failed Copenhagen summit, not least in terms of the number of flights from places throughout the world and all those gas-guzzling limousines that had their engines idling while they waited to pick up distinguished delegates?

Edward Miliband: I do not think that that would be a good use of United Nations or, indeed, taxpayers' money, and I dread to think what doing the UN conference by video conference would have produced. The serious answer to the hon. Lady's question is that progress was made during the past year, partly as a result of the Copenhagen deadline, and we need to build on that in the years ahead.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Kettering has a very successful wind farm, which has planning permission to expand by two thirds, but there are proposals for six further wind farms in my constituency. What mechanism can the Secretary of State give far-sighted local authorities so that they can zone areas for wind farm development while protecting other parts of the countryside?

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue. One of the things we are doing is a mapping exercise across the country to see which are the most appropriate areas for wind farms; that will help local authorities. I applaud local authorities that embrace renewable energy—those that say no to it everywhere are doing the wrong thing—but of course, local authorities need to be able to take decisions about the most appropriate places for wind energy facilities, and indeed they do.

Salt Reserves

11.32 am

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the country's salt reserves and any implications this may have on local government's ability to maintain the road network.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Sadiq Khan): During this period of exceptionally prolonged severe weather, staff across the transport industries and national and local highways authorities are working extremely hard to minimise the disruption caused. The Highways Agency has its fleet of 500 salt spreaders and snow ploughs out in force and has been successful in keeping the vast majority of the major road network running, helping to prevent the formation of ice and build-up of snow.

Following the severe weather in February 2009, the UKRLG—the UK Roads Liaison Group—recommended good practice of having at least six days of heavy salting capacity in the winter period, alongside a package of wider recommendations to improve resilience. The UKRLG noted that the Highways Agency was already holding a minimum of six days' continuous heavy salting capacity in winter periods. The Highways Agency entered this winter period with 13 days' capacity, and we regard this as the right response following last year's events.

For the local road network, it is the responsibility of local authorities to decide how to respond to the UKRLG recommendations. We have kept in close contact with local authorities across the country to check how they are dealing with their own local road networks. Local authorities have told us that they increased their salt stocks at the start of the winter season compared with last year. The Local Government Association estimates that the equivalent of about 600,000 miles of road have been gritted by council gritting teams in the past 14 days, using about 38,500 tonnes of salt.

The Department for Transport and devolved Administrations have been regularly monitoring salt supplies and stock levels across the country with the help of their agencies, local authorities and the companies that supply salt. Alongside this, mutual aid arrangements between local authorities and the Highways Agency can help to relieve areas that are experiencing particularly tight stocks of salt. The Government and the devolved Administrations have also decided that owing to the exceptional weather affecting the country, they should work in partnership to advise salt suppliers on priorities for deliveries. The LGA will assist with that process. A group started the national prioritisation work this week. That will help to ensure that stocks of salt are supplied to where they are most needed.

We will continue to do everything possible to keep disruption to a minimum during this period of exceptionally prolonged severe weather.

Mrs. Spelman: Thank you for granting this urgent question, Mr. Speaker. It is so topical that I think people would quite rightly have expected the Government to have made a statement on the subject by now, but we are grateful for this opportunity.

Councils reviewed their own contingency plans in the light of their very bad experience of the snow as recently as February last year, and sent the report I have here, "Weathering the Storm", to the Minister's Department in August. Why, then, did it take until 15 December for Ministers to respond to that vital report? Does the Minister accept that with only 48 hours to go before the first predicted heavy snowfall in the south-east, councils' ability to implement the recommendations in full was compromised?

Does the Minister consider that the advice that he received to increase the stockholding capacity of six days' worth of salt supplies is adequate, given the prospect of at least another week of sub-zero temperatures, or will he revise the guidance to take account of the figure that he gave in his first response, which was more like 13 days' worth? If so, how soon will he change that guidance and when can councils expect to receive it? Does he accept that if the report's recommendations had been accepted earlier than 15 December, it might have been possible to avoid the gridlock of lorries around the salt mine in Cheshire that are trying to collect salt on behalf of councils? As the Minister will know, in February of last year one of the learning experiences came from the difficulty to do with the flexibility of drivers' hours. At what point did the Government act on the recommendation to provide for flexibility in drivers' hours?

Finally, do the Government intend to revise any of the guidance they have given to councils? If so, when can councils expect to receive this and will a copy of the revised guidance be placed in the Library of the House of Commons so that Members from all parties, whose constituents are experiencing considerable difficulty, might be able to see those changes?

I am sure that all Members would like to pay tribute to the work being done by their councils to try to keep essential roads open. They are working around the clock to keep Britain moving.

Mr. Khan: I pay tribute to all those who are ensuring that this country does not grind to a halt, whether they work for councils, for airports, for the rail sector or for the emergency services. They are doing a tremendous job to keep our country moving.

The hon. Lady has asked a number of questions, which I shall try to answer in turn. If there is anything that I do not deal with, I am sure it will be taken up by other colleagues. I can also write to her or speak to her afterwards if I do not take up all her points in my short response.

The hon. Lady is right to refer to the report made by the UKRLG in July. It was open to local authorities to follow the report's recommendations in July, rather than to wait for us to endorse it in December. She will be aware that many local authorities lived through the bad weather last February and March. I was surprised that she suggested that central Government should prescribe to local government and tell it what to do. Some might say that one of the reasons she is pointing the finger at central Government is that many of these local authorities are Conservative-run. Many constituents will want to ask questions about how their councils have performed in this difficult time.

The six days' worth of supply is a recommendation of good practice. Some might decide to hold salt to cover much longer periods. We have examples of some local authorities that have salt for up to 69 days, so they have clearly not merely followed the good practice but decided that they should stock more. Indeed, we have stocked 13 days' worth with the Highways Agency. I am not sure whether the hon. Lady is suggesting that I, as someone with no expertise, should give advice on this issue, or that we should rely on experts to give advice. The UKRLG is made up of experts and they advised that the best practice was to stockpile six days' worth of salt.

The hon. Lady also talked about what local authorities and the Government should have been doing. We are responsible for ensuring that the Highways Agency has motorways and trunk roads cleared and running smoothly—and, in broad terms, it has been doing that. It is for local authorities to ensure that local roads run smoothly. I have spoken to the LGA this week, and the Prime Minister spoke to it this morning. We are doing all we can to keep the country moving.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I thank the Minister for his detailed answer, and I pay tribute to the hard work that has been undertaken by many employees of local councils and other bodies to try to keep our transport networks running effectively.

Does the Minister think it sensible for us to rely on just one mine in Cheshire for 90 per cent. of our salt supplies, and will he consider whether we need to diversify further to ensure that we have guaranteed supplies for future events? Was it not unwise, last February, to recommend that councils hold only six days' supply, given the current indication that there will be 10 days of extreme weather conditions, and will he consider revising that advice?

Is not one consequence of the current shortage of grit in many parts of the country that many side roads are not being treated in many areas? That leaves many elderly and vulnerable people effectively trapped in their homes, and is of great concern to them. Is not another consequence that pavements are not gritted at all in some areas? As far as I can tell, not a single pavement has been gritted by my Conservative council in East Sussex—not even those around doctors' surgeries, bus stops, supermarkets or anything else. A consequence of that, now and in December, has been that people have had to negotiate sheets of ice to purchase basic commodities and to do their normal work.

Finally, will the Minister make an assessment of the cost to business and the health service of the failure of some councils to keep essential transport systems working? I am conscious that in my local primary care trust area, and in the acute trust in Brighton, which has done very well, about 1,500 people have been through the system with injuries such as broken wrists that might not have occurred had pavements been properly gritted. As a public policy point, we ought to assess the cost to the health service of the failure of some councils to use grit properly.

Mr. Khan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his sensible points and the questions that he has raised. Let me deal with each of them, starting with salt supplies. As he is aware, there are two main salt suppliers in this country, and the supply is governed by where salt can be mined or excavated. I am not sure whether he is suggesting that I should nationalise the industry or start procuring or producing salt. I can tell him that the Prime Minister has spoken to the chief executives of both those companies this morning to impress on them the importance of trying to excavate as much salt as possible and to get it out from the factories. The Highways Agency has procured salt from Spain and from companies in the USA, and some local authorities have been innovative in procuring it. There is a problem with salt storage. Some local authorities have problems with salt barns and with the amount of salt they can store for a long period of time, and so are governed by lack of storage space rather than not being sufficiently geared up to get as much salt as they can.

On the hon. Gentleman's points about what has happened in his local communities, I must tell him that it is for local authorities and locally elected councils, which know their communities best, to decide where salt and grit should be laid down. The hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) suggested that perhaps we in Whitehall should have a map and decide which roads should be gritted. If there are problems in some areas, it is important that councillors make sure that the right parts of their communities are gritted. Clearly, there is a problem with the amount of grit available in relation to the extreme weather that we are having, and so priority assessments will need to be made. Those areas of the community that are a priority will need to be gritted.

The hon. Gentleman's final point is important. The cost to us of bad weather, not only in financial terms, to business, but in human terms, with operations being cancelled and school hours being lost by children, is immense. However, the weather is, on all objective assessments, the worst that we have had for almost 30 years, and so a sense of perspective is required.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): Is it not the case that a small number of politicians are sitting in their warm offices e-mailing press releases to create despondency, when many tens of thousands of public sector workers are out there keeping the country moving? Should we not be praising those workers, rather than moaning?

Mr. Khan: I thank my hon. Friend who, as ever, makes a really important point. The number of public servants out there shovelling away at grit to make sure that our pavements are clear and our roads gritted is immense. He will be pleased to know that the Prime Minister got in touch with the Highways Agency this morning to put on record his personal thanks for the hard work done by its staff in making sure that our country does not grind to a halt.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): The UK's largest rock salt mine is at Winsford in my constituency. The Minister has notably failed to praise the work force there—

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): He did.

Mr. O'Brien: He did not. The work force at the Winsford rock salt mine are working 24/7 to produce 30,000 tonnes per week, but it is also most important to bear in mind the forbearance of the people of Winsford. The restrictions on HGV movements have quite rightly been relaxed, but people there are finding that their town is hemmed in by queues of lorries waiting to be resupplied. Does the Minister agree that it is important to recognise the need to get stockpiles right in the autumn, in advance of winter? At the moment, we rely on the salt unit to produce the salt in an emergency.

[Mr. Stephen O'Brien]

Mr. Khan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments, and there is not much in what he said that I disagree with. Not only do I pay tribute to the hard work done by the people at the Winsford rock salt mine, but the Prime Minister personally rang the chief executive to ask him to pass on his thanks for the great work they are doing. I should also like to thank the hon. Gentleman's constituents, who are having to put up with lorries going through their communities literally 24 hours a day. He will be aware that there are conditions attached to lorries going through the town during working hours, but local residents have indulged the trucks. There are very good reasons for people to work around the clock, and many will have seen the photographs and images of the queue of lorries leaving the factory. Although it looks chaotic, staff are doing a very important job in ensuring that the right parts of the country are receiving much-needed grit.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): While I urge my right hon. Friend to look at the whole issue of distribution and access to salt supplies, may I add that there is a real issue with the nitty-gritty—if I dare say that—of all this? Local people cannot understand why their pavements are not being gritted. I urge him to see whether there is some way to make information available so that local people know what standard of service they can expect from their local council.

Mr. Khan: One of the things that I was keen to do when speaking to the LGA, the Prime Minister and some of my officials this morning was to make sure that local authorities use best practice and provide a sufficient standard of care for local residents. There are health and safety issues here, as we clearly do not want more people falling over and getting hurt than would be the case without this adverse weather.

I am reluctant to prescribe what local authorities should do, as clearly this is a matter of horses for courses. We need to make sure that the parts of communities most in need of having their pavements or roads cleared are having that done. I am happy to carry on working with the LGA and others to see whether lessons can be learned.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Will the Minister acknowledge the huge efforts being made at British Salt at Middlewich in my constituency, which produces salt from brine? Will he ensure that the LGA has better plans in future for getting roads in partially rural constituencies cleared more effectively than has been the case this time?

Mr. Khan: I appreciate that roads are essential lifelines in rural parts of the country, and I can understand why local authorities would want to ensure that they are cleared more swiftly in future. The hon. Lady is right to remind me that there is a company in Middlewich in her constituency that is doing a huge amount of work to provide salt and grit and to make sure that supplies reach the rest of the country. She also spoke about the need for the LGA to have better plans in future, but we have to be careful what we wish for. On the one hand, local communities elect councillors and local authorities do a very important job but, on the other, pressure is brought to bear on me, as a Minister in Whitehall, to tell local authorities what to do. I suspect that some of that could be because some of the local authorities doing a bad job are Tory councils.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that many people whinge at this time of year? As he said, this is the worst weather for 30 years, but the fact is that many local authorities are doing a very good job. The authority in Huddersfield and Kirklees is doing a very good job, even though we have had real problems with obtaining more supplies of salt and grit. Is it not the truth that the men and women who have been keeping our roads clear have the essential qualities of grit, determination and courage—something that some politicians could learn from?

Mr. Khan: I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend's comments and echo his tribute to the public servants, men and women, who have done a huge amount to ensure that our roads and pavements are cleared. Public servants and council workers in Huddersfield, Kirklees and elsewhere are doing a huge amount, and that is one reason why I am reluctant to stand here and criticise local authorities—when I know that so many are doing such a good job.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I commend the efforts of public sector workers in Hampshire and Basingstoke who, as the Minister knows, are doing the best they can to keep our roads open. He said that salt deliveries are already being prioritised so that they are sent where they are needed most. What criteria are used when those decisions are made? The lack of transparency in that process was a key criticism in the UKRLG recommendation, which the Minister said he accepted in full.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Lady has written to me because of the concerns in her constituency, and I am responding to the points she made in her letter, which highlighted a number of her worries. Several criteria are looked at: the amount of available stocks; whether there are mutual aid facilities, with different local authorities able to provide assistance; how recently deliveries were made to local authorities; and weather conditions. Importantly, we do not decide where the priorities lie; the LGA does, working with the Highways Agency, the devolved Administrations and the suppliers. What is important is that the regional resilience centres receive as much updated information as possible from local authorities, which can then determine which parts of the country receive the salt quickest.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): My local authority, Durham county council, has been working around the clock to try to keep our major routes open, including all bus routes; and it has been doing so continuously since 16 December, putting down as much as 1,400 tonnes of grit each day. As a result, we have now had to put pressure on the mine in question, and I had to contact it myself to ensure that it delivers the necessary stocks to Durham. What pressure is being applied to mine owners? They are doing a really good job, but during this difficult period it would help if they opened at those weekends when it is necessary to make deliveries.

Mr. Khan: That point refers to a previous question about the stocks leaving mines, and I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that the mining companies will be working not only around the clock, but seven days a week, which is very important. She rightly refers to the fact that some councils—most of them, indeed—have been working around the clock since 16 December, and further bad weather is predicted over the next period, so we should bear that in mind. Alongside the pressure that I have brought on mining companies and my hon. Friend has brought on her local authority, the Prime Minister this morning also spoke to the two biggest salt procurers to ensure that we impress on them the need to try to excavate as much as is humanly possible.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): In East Dunbartonshire a severe shortage of salt has left many roads and pavements in a treacherous condition, and earlier this week parts of Scotland ran out of salt completely. What specific requests have the Scottish Government made for assistance in securing additional salt; and what has been the result of those requests?

Mr. Khan: One reason why we are working with the devolved Administrations in Scotland and Wales is that the same salt producers supply both countries. We would not want Scotland and Wales to lose out as an unintended consequence of our prioritising English local authorities. That is why both countries are very much inside the loop when it comes to the Salt Cell organisation to which we have referred. We are in regular contact with our colleagues, and that includes discussions about salt importation from overseas. We will continue to keep in touch with them over the next period.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): In some parts of the country, supplies such as milk and fresh food are inevitably being compromised. Will the Minister pay tribute to those voluntary sector and community groups that organise people to be on the look out for the needs of vulnerable members of the community; and will he say a word about everybody being a good neighbour at this time and looking after vulnerable neighbours in their streets?

Mr. Khan: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. I pay tribute not only to those people who, out of the goodness of their heart and common decency, check on their neighbours, whether they are elderly or not, and ensure that there is sufficient food for them, but to those who get the shovel from their shed, clear their front pathway and help the old person next door who may need assistance. Whether it is young children, helping old people to cross the roads and clearing their front paths, or us older citizens, I pay tribute to the resilience of the British public over the past three weeks, who have shown what is good about our society.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I thank the public sector workers who have been putting in very long hours in the Aylesbury and, indeed, Buckingham constituencies to deal with the problems caused by snow and ice locally. However, many able-bodied local residents would be willing to clear the snow and ice on the pavement in front of their properties if they were not scared of being sued by somebody who subsequently fell over. Will the Minister look at the guidance and the law on that point to try to ensure that common sense and public spiritedness are given a fair wind?

Mr. Khan: I am sure that that did not escape your notice, Mr. Speaker—that sucking up to you! I too pay tribute to the public servants of Buckingham, who are doing a great job. However, the hon. Gentleman makes a serious point, and I would be thoroughly disappointed if people were reluctant to be a good neighbour and clear their pathways for fear of being prosecuted. I have seen evidence of good neighbours in my community, in Tooting and Wandsworth, and I have heard about it from stories around the country. I hope that that continues over the next period.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Notwithstanding the short-term impact of what needs to be done, I must say that there is a longer-term impact on the fabric of the roads. They were already breaking up after the most recent bout of poor weather, and they were not helped by gritting, either. Counties such as mine, West Sussex, have faced real-terms cuts in their highways grants over recent years, so will the Minister look at the situation and at how we can help authorities to repair roads in the longer term? If we do not, the problem will get worse and worse.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that we have increased local authority capital investment for those matters two or three times in recent years. In fact we were criticised for doing so. The important thing is that local authorities take stock of the areas where adverse weather causes problems. He is right to say that gritting and adverse weather causes more potholes in, and problems with the fabric of, our roads, but it is for local authorities to know their communities best and to decide where their priorities lie when it comes to spending their moneys.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): Many grit bins that local authorities provide for residents' use on footpaths have been vandalised, leading to avoidable falls and injuries. Will the Minister join me in condemning the people who are responsible for that mindless vandalism; and will he discuss with his colleagues whether it is possible to source vandal-proof grit bins?

Mr. Khan: I unequivocally condemn those who vandalise such salt bins. I have also heard stories about them being stolen, and that beggars belief. On the one hand we are talking about the very best of British; on the other, we see examples such as that to which the hon. Lady refers. I am happy to look into any technical areas on which we can work to make salt bins vandal-proof.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I do not wish to diminish the seriousness or scale of the task that staff have had to undertake, and salt reserves certainly need replenishing in Cornwall, but I am not sure that the Minister has answered the questions about pavements from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman

[Andrew George]

Baker) and the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley). Many people are walking on the roads and putting themselves in greater jeopardy. Have the Minister and his Department considered whether any guidance is required to ensure that accidents, which we know are happening throughout the country, are avoided?

Mr. Khan: Perhaps I can answer the hon. Gentleman's question this way: we know that public safety demands that local authorities clear and grit certain roads; and we know that the Highways Agency is ensuring that motorways and trunk roads are gritted. However, local authorities are responsible for pavements, and it is for them to decide the priority areas in their communities. Some authorities may decide that pavements leading to and from a school or a GP's surgery are a priority, but I am not sure that I should advise local authorities on which parts of their communities need to be gritted. I am certainly not keen on any politician in Whitehall telling me or the leader of Wandsworth borough council which parts of Wandsworth need to be gritted. Local council leaders and officers in town halls know which parts of their community deserve to be gritted. However, when there is a shortage of grit, priorities need to be established and decisions made about which areas are gritted, and some inevitably will not be.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Minister accept that in the guidance given by central Government, the criteria mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) must be complied with? It is no good suggesting that local authorities alone can make these decisions if national suppliers are involved, as the chairman of the Highways Agency in Staffordshire, Mike Maryon, has made clear. We had temperatures of minus 17° in Staffordshire, Moorlands. Rural areas have been severely affected. There is no point in the Minister trying to pass the buck to local authorities if the overall number of days' supply has been got completely wrong.

Mr. Khan: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting we do. The salt suppliers are private companies who produce and sell salt, and local authorities decide what they need for their communities. The good practice advice given to local authorities is that there should be supplies of at least six days' worth, and they can follow that advice or not do so. Some local authorities stockpiled many weeks' worth of grit because they took the sensible course of action. The Highways Agency decided that there should be 13 days' worth of grit in our stocks. If he wants us to consider the possibility of those private companies being taken over by a public company, and therefore local authorities being told how much supply they should keep, I would not recommend that. We should work with the Local Government Association, the Highways Agency, the devolved Administrations and the salt suppliers to ensure that those parts of the country that need salt the most get it the quickest.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Many of my rural villages have been badly affected by this exceptional dumping of snow. I assume, because we spend millions on the Met Office, that the Government were given several days' advance notice of the exceptional weather conditions. Was not that the time to ensure that the grit got out to rural areas, in particular? The Minister says that there is a storage problem. Many farmers with spare capacity would be delighted to hold that exceptional storage on their farms, which would ensure that these villages could be passable.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Gentleman's final point is a very good one. Some local authorities in rural parts of the country use farm buildings such as barns to store salt. If there are to be further prolonged periods of bad weather over the coming years, the storage of salt will be a big issue and we will need to consider whether we can set up central depots or points where it is stored and can be reached. In October, we surveyed local authorities to find out how much salt each of them had. Those that responded told us that they had at least six days' worth of salt supply. Some of the anecdotal evidence from the experience of colleagues around the country leads me to believe that that was not necessarily the case. We are looking into how much salt some local authorities had and whether they were inaccurate when they told us in October that they had six days' worth, because some clearly did not. The hon. Gentleman raised another good point in relation to advice from the Met Office.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am afraid that the Minister did not answer the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who raised a serious issue. Residents are frightened of being sued if they clear public pavements in front of their property, and shopkeepers are frightened of breaking their liability insurance if they do likewise. Will the Minister consider changing the law to protect residents and shopkeepers who clear pavements in front of their properties?

Mr. Khan: There is no criminal liability, as I understand it. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the possibility that somebody could sue for damages because of negligence. I am not sure if he is suggesting that I provide immunity from a civil action under the law of tort. As much as I like to empire-build, I am afraid that I do not have that power or gift at my disposal.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): To bring the Minister back to the sensible things that he said about looking after elderly people, will he use his Department's influence with social housing providers to impress on them their duty of care to elderly and infirm residents of sheltered accommodation to ensure that the common areas of such properties are kept safe? At the moment, they do not believe that they have that responsibility, but I think they do.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Gentleman raises a very important point. I know from my own experience that we can go and help our mum to clear her front pavement, but someone in sheltered accommodation or an older person living by themselves clearly needs some help. I will look into the situation and respond to him directly about what we can do.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): There are clearly resource implications resulting from the extreme weather that we are experiencing at the moment. This has nothing to do with party politics; I am sure that whichever party controls a local authority, it will do its best to help local people and businesses. Is there any exceptional emergency fund to assist local authorities that will exceed any budget allocation that they made in respect of salt and grit? This is clearly important, as we need to keep the country running. My constituency has large rural areas, including the Peak District national park. Can any exceptional help be given to local authorities such as mine—Macclesfield and Cheshire East—so that we can keep the area running?

Mr. Khan: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Bellwin funding is available, and local authorities know that the Department for Communities and Local Government can assist them in relation to that. There was a recent example of emergency funding being made available in Cumbria following the flooding. I suggest that his council leader speaks to the DCLG or the Department for Transport to see whether sufficient thresholds have been reached in his constituency to judge whether the Bellwin criteria apply.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): On the first Monday of the cold snap, 25 people reported to Mayday's accident and emergency department with fractures, compared with six at the same time in the previous year, when the weather was somewhat balmier. Will the Minister look positively at what is done by Durham primary care trust, which provides money to the local authority as a preventive measure to ensure that there is more gritting and therefore fewer people turning up at hospital injured?

Mr. Khan: I am happy to listen to good ideas. I would be keen to consider whether the Department of Health and the DFT can work better together and whether lessons can be learned from Durham that can be used in London and other parts of the country. I am happy to go away and look at the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): The Minister has referred to Salt Cell—the cross-departmental group of officials responsible for managing the supply chain with the salt suppliers. Is he aware that many councils across the country are concerned that this group is not coping with the situation in which we find ourselves and is not communicating properly with suppliers?

Mr. Khan: I take on board the hon. Gentleman's comments. I can undertake to speak again to the LGA to see whether it has heard any grumblings from local authorities and try to rectify the situation. We do not want local authorities to feel that they have been harshly treated because of the way that Salt Cell operates. That group is there to help to prioritise supplies. I will reflect on his comments, and if there any issues for consideration, I will be happy to speak to him directly or report back to the House at a later date.

Business of the House

12.7 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May I ask the right hon. and learned Lady to give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): The business for the week commencing 11 January will be:

Monday 11 January—Second Reading of the Children, Schools and Families Bill.

Tuesday 12 January—Consideration in Committee and remaining stages of the Personal Care at Home Bill.

Wednesday 13 January—Opposition day [2nd allotted day]. There will be a debate on education, skills and training opportunities for young people in the recession followed by a debate on energy security. Both debates will arise on an Opposition motion.

Thursday 14 January—Topical debate, subject to be announced. To follow, the Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed Private Business for consideration.

The provisional business for the week commencing 18 January will include:

Monday 18 January—Second Reading of the Crime and Security Bill.

Tuesday 19 January—Consideration in Committee of the Constitutional Reform and Governance Bill (day 3).

Wednesday 20 January—Consideration in Committee and remaining stages of the Fiscal Responsibility Bill.

Thursday 21 January—If necessary, consideration of Lords Amendments to the Video Recordings Bill. To follow, the Chairman of Ways and Means will name opposed Private Business for consideration.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 14 and 21 January will be:

Thursday 14 January—A debate on supporting young people in the recession.

Thursday 21 January—A debate on violence against women.

You, Mr. Speaker, have paid tribute, on behalf of the House, to David Taylor, as did the Prime Minister and the leaders of the Opposition parties yesterday. I should like to add my tribute as Leader of the House. There is an empty space up on that Back Bench today. [Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] We will miss his contributions, not least at this time every Thursday. The good that he did as an MP will endure in the improved lives of the many, many constituents he personally helped. More widely, the good that he did in this House will endure—for example, his private Member's Bill, the Management of Dementia in Care Homes Bill, laid the basis for, and lives on in, our national dementia strategy. He is a big loss to his family and also to the House.

Sir George Young: May I thank the right hon. and learned Lady for next week's business, and also for what she said about David Taylor, which I strongly endorse? In an age in which the standing of the Chamber has diminished, and in which the Chamber lies empty for much of the day, he was often assiduous in his attendance and he was an independent contributor to our debates, including, of course, in his regular appearance at business questions. He was a good parliamentarian and will be much missed.

[Sir George Young]

May I thank the staff of the House for ensuring that this place has continued to run smoothly despite the bad weather that is continuing to disrupt the whole country?

Now, when will the right hon. and learned Lady give us the dates of the Easter recess? Those who work in the Palace of Westminster can take a holiday only when we are not sitting, and they need to make their plans for the months ahead. I have been asking for the dates almost every week since October. When will she announce them?

Can the Leader of the House untangle the Government's muddle about the Budget? In a television interview on Sunday morning, the Prime Minister said:

> "I believe there'll be a Budget this spring".

Given yesterday's devastating report from the Treasury Committee, which eviscerates the Government's current plans to reduce the deficit, will she confirm that there will be a Labour Budget in March, and that it will spell out the details of how the Government intend to deal with the financial crisis? Hopefully that will generate more interest among Government Back Benchers than the Second Reading of the Fiscal Responsibility Bill on Tuesday, during which not one Labour MP spoke in support.

When will the House debate the report from the Commons reform Committee? As we saw yesterday during the debate on private Members' Bills, the House is impatient to discuss these issues. During the recent debate in Westminster Hall both main Opposition parties set out their position, but we had no such transparency from the Government. When will the Leader of the House set out the Government's position, and will she now confirm that the debate will be held on a substantive motion ending in a vote?

If the Government intend to amend the Constitutional Reform and Governance Bill, which is due to be debated next week, to implement proposals from the Kelly report, and, as some newspapers have suggested, to include a provision for a referendum on voting reform, will the right hon. and learned Lady give the House an extra day in Committee to consider what is already a large and sprawling piece of legislation?

May I repeat my call, and that of many colleagues throughout the House, for a proper debate in Government time on Afghanistan? The conference on the future of Afghanistan has been scheduled for the end of the month in London. Does the right hon. and learned Lady agree that Members should have their chance to debate the matter in full before that conference, so that they can bring to Ministers the thoughts of their constituents ahead of it?

Finally, looking at the weeks ahead, does the Leader of the House agree with me, and indeed with some of her right hon. Friends, that we cannot go on like this? The right hon. and learned Lady, who is the deputy leader of the Labour party, finally issued a statement of support for the Prime Minister at 6 o'clock last night, saying that Ministers were getting on with the business of government. She was so involved in her own business that she could not even vote yesterday afternoon for a House motion that was tabled in her own name. Is not the truth that instead of a secret ballot of Labour MPs for a new leader, what the country really needs is a ballot of the whole country for a new Government?

Ms Harman: I would like to add to the right hon. Gentleman's comments thanking the staff of the House. The House did not rise until about 11 o'clock on Tuesday, which left it very late for Officers and staff of the House to get home. We ought to pay tribute to them for the fact that the House has continued to operate, not least so that we could hear the urgent question answered today about the efforts that need to be taken to help people carry on with their work as usual during the cold weather.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the announcements about the recess, which will be made in the usual way. He also asked about the management of the economy. There will be a pre-Budget report debate after business questions, and there will be further stages of the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, allowing all such issues to be debated. We heard the Prime Minister reassure the country again at Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday that we would ensure that we have a secure recovery, that we do not pull the plugs on the recovery, that we tackle the deficit by having fair tax measures and that we make sensible and fair choices about public spending. The public can be reassured that that is the Government's position, even though there is something of a muddle about the matter on the Tory Benches.

As far as the Wright Committee report is concerned, the Prime Minister said yesterday that he welcomed it and that there would be an opportunity for the House to debate and decide on the issues in question. As the right hon. Gentleman reminded the House, we have already had a 90-minute debate in Westminster Hall on 15 December, in which 17 colleagues participated. We made some progress in the motion that the House adopted last night, which he mentioned. We have not stood still, and the direction of travel is clear. It was I who tabled the motion to take the matter forward on behalf of the Government. It is a complex matter on which the Government will have to take views, but it is not for us to dictate to the House on it. It is for us to facilitate progress on a consensual basis, which is what we will do. We want further progress to be made.

As far as the Constitutional Reform and Governance Bill is concerned, we will have to consider whether extra measures should be brought forward to ensure that the House has enough time to debate it on the Floor of the House.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the important issue of Afghanistan. I said before Christmas, and reiterate today, that we want to be absolutely sure that the House can hold Ministers to account and that there can be debates so that views can be put forward. A lot of concern was raised in business questions in December about the need to have a substantive debate on Afghanistan in January. Although I have not been able to announce it today, I am aware of the time scale that the shadow Leader of the House pointed out. I reassure colleagues that I am determined that we will have a substantive debate on Afghanistan before the end of the month.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): One of the Members of Parliament who participated in the debate in Westminster Hall that the Leader of the House mentioned was David Taylor. He intervened when I was making my comments, and within a few moments of having made his intervention he passed me a note thanking me for allowing him to contribute. That was typical of the courtesy of the man and his ever-presence and value to the House. He will be very much missed.

On the Wright Committee report, this simply will not do. There is only one thing that the Government have to do: take the page of the report that contains the draft motion and put it on the Order Paper. Nothing else is needed. The Leader of the House says that she is facilitating matters, but she is doing so exceedingly slowly. I ask her to hurry up and simply put that motion before the House, and then I hope we can make progress.

When can we expect a debate on the special report from the Information Commissioner following the veto by the Secretary of State for Justice of the release of Government papers, in contravention of the Information Commissioner's decision and prior to a tribunal hearing? That is unprecedented, and it is necessary for that report, which is to the House, not the Government, to be debated, and for the Secretary of State to justify his actions. When will that happen?

May we have a statement from the Health Secretary on the intention from the beginning of the next financial year to consolidate the assets of hospital charities into the general NHS budget? That is very much resented by those who work tirelessly to raise funds in support of their local hospital. It cannot be right that it is going to happen, and I hope that the House will have the opportunity to express an opinion on it.

May we have a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in due course on the supervisory review of the failed banks by the Financial Services Authority? There is some suggestion that it will not even published, which I hope is not the case. I hope that the Government can assure the House that it will be published and that a statement will be made in the House about its contents, because it is of absolute importance that we understand why the banks got this country into the mess that it is in and that we can assign responsibility appropriately.

Lastly, may we have a statement in due course on bilateral relations between the United Kingdom and Iceland, because there is clearly a full-scale constitutional crisis in that country as well as an economic one? That has huge ramifications for the United Kingdom, not least for the £830 million of taxpayers' money from local authorities that is still to be recovered from that small country with its enormous debts. May we have a clarification from the Government as to what the position is at the earliest opportunity and an opportunity to debate the matter?

Ms Harman: I can assure the hon. Gentleman, as I have the shadow Leader of the House, that we intend to make progress on the Wright Committee's report. I reiterate that that Committee's work was not foisted on us: we actually welcomed the proposal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) to set up the Committee and swiftly brought forward the resolution to establish it. We are grateful for the work that it did, including over the summer recess, and we want to ensure that it is built upon and taken forward.

As far as the freedom of information request and the veto is concerned, there was a full statement on that by the Justice Secretary on—I think—10 December.

Mr. Heath: A written statement.

Ms Harman: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon—he is right that it was a written ministerial statement. I think I remember that that statement contained the information that there were something like 16,000 routine FOI requests, of which only two have been vetoed, so it was a very exceptional occurrence, which is why things were spelt out in a written ministerial statement. The framework that is set down by the Freedom of Information Act 2000 was followed as part of that process.[1]

As for charities, resources and the health service, there are Health questions next week, so the hon. Gentleman could look for an opportunity to raise that issue. If his question goes wider to include the funding of charities as part of the contribution to our health services, he might find an opportunity to catch Mr. Speaker's eye in the debate on the pre-Budget report, which will happen immediately after business questions.

On financial regulation, the hon. Gentleman will know that the House has devoted a considerable amount of time—and rightly so—to the question of the regulation of financial services since the global credit crisis was precipitated in the United States. That has meant more work to toughen up the regime of the Financial Services Authority, the Financial Services Bill and international action so that we can work with other countries to ensure that this contagion of a lack of confidence in financial services does not spread with such devastating consequences as it did before. He will know that such things are constantly on the Treasury's agenda, the business Department's agenda and the House's agenda.

On the UK and Iceland—as it happens, the Netherlands is also involved—the UK Government stepped in. That was part of the action that we have taken so that people have not been left to sink or swim during the recession. Just as we have taken action to protect people who are at risk of losing their jobs, protected small businesses and protected people from losing their homes, we have taken action to protect people with deposits in Icelandic banks. That is all part of the action that has necessarily resulted in an increase in the deficit. Who would say that it was not worth increasing the deficit to make sure that we protect not only people's deposits in Icelandic banks, but confidence in financial services by the action that this Government have taken? All those things are part of what has built up the deficit. The next time anybody says that we should not have allowed public debt to rise, they should say where they think we should not have taken the action that has been so important. We will carry on with our bilateral work between not only ourselves and Iceland, but our European colleagues, to make sure that Iceland plays its part in paying back what it owes to the Government and people in this country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Twenty-five right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. As always, I should like to be able to accommodate everybody, but short questions and short answers will be required if there is any chance of doing so.

---

[1] [Official Report, 13 January 2010, Vol. 503, c. 7-8MC.]

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen early-day motion 72, on A1 Techsol Ltd, Stockport Road, Manchester, standing in my name and the names of a number of other hon. Gentlemen?

[That this House condemns A1 Techsol Ltd, Stockport Road, Manchester, for having failed to return to a constituent of the right hon. Member for Gorton his UK passport, driving licence, bank statements, security officer's badge and photographs, which they required from him on taking up employment with them, and for ignoring repeated requests from the right hon. Member to return this material to his constituent; regards A1 Techsol's retention of this material as both theft and a breach of employment legislation; calls on the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the police to investigate; and meanwhile calls on the public to have nothing whatever to do with A1 Techsol, either as employees or in any other way.]

Will my right hon. and learned Friend ask the Work and Pensions Secretary to investigate the employment practices of that rogue company, and the police to investigate it for possible larceny?

Ms Harman: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on raising this issue, which is obviously of importance in his constituency. I will do as he suggests and raise the matter with the Work and Pensions Secretary, but he will no doubt have the opportunity to refer it to the police.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Over the Christmas recess, the Yorkshire Post reported that the chief constable of West Yorkshire police, Sir Norman Bettison, criticised the fact that burglars were being released from prison early owing to the lack of prison places. May we have an urgent debate about sentencing for burglars and prison places, given that it is causing West Yorkshire police lots of trouble that they otherwise would not have had, and completely unnecessarily creating extra victims of crime, owing to the incompetence of this Government?

Ms Harman: There has actually been a fall in the level of crime since this Government came to office and an increase in the number of offenders brought to justice. No one is released from prison on the basis of a lack of prison places. We have increased the number of prison places—[Interruption.] Actually, we have done that with finance that the party to which the hon. Gentleman belongs would have opposed. I will not raise his points with the Home Secretary or the Justice Secretary because I think they are ill-founded.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): Returning to the Wright Committee, do we take it that when the Leader of House says that the House will have the opportunity to decide on its report, she is saying that there will definitely be a substantive motion on which the House will have the opportunity to vote? I hope that that substantive motion will be, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said, on the draft resolution in the back of that excellent report. My right hon. and learned Friend is quite right that the Government can take credit for introducing the Committee, but we now want to see its report put into action.

Ms Harman: Yesterday in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister said:

> "We are now discussing these issues and they will form the subject of a debate and decisions by this House."—[Official Report, 6 January 2010; Vol. 503, c. 170.]

He was obviously right to talk in the plural because, as the Committee itself acknowledges, a number of decisions will need to be taken by the House. Some proposals require further work before they can be brought to the House, but there will be a number of decisions, and we expect to make progress on them and, indeed, the work that came within the remit of the Wright Committee, which arose originally from the work of the Procedure Committee on the election of Deputy Speakers and the introduction of term limits for Mr. Speaker and Deputy Speakers. Those were passed by a resolution of the House yesterday. We will make progress on this matter—not in one big bang, but we will establish the direction of travel on a consensus within this House. Steps will be taken, and the House will vote to see them put into action.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): Will the right hon. and learned Lady ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to come to the House to make a statement on "Food 2030", which was published by the Government on Tuesday morning? It is not available even in the Vote Office, let alone to Members by a statement. Quite apart from that discourtesy to the House, surely we should have a discussion in this Chamber about the document, which talks about the future of farming, food production and the food chain. When so many of our farmers are clearly in real difficulty with the current weather, perhaps we should use the topical debate next Thursday to discuss the document, and the Environment Secretary can answer some questions on it.

Ms Harman: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest in what is a very important report. I will discuss with the Secretary of State whether he thinks there should be an opportunity to bring it to the House to debate. I certainly think it raises some very important issues that probably could benefit from wider debate in the House.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the prime area in which Ministers are held to account is here, in the House of Commons? Does she therefore agree that the failure by the Department for Communities and Local Government to field a Minister for last night's Adjournment debate was a basic failure in accountability? As the debate was about discrimination against minority faiths, the lack of a departmental Minister made the point forcefully. What steps will she take to ensure that Departments understand that private discussions in meetings are no substitute for proper parliamentary accountability here on the Floor of the House?

Ms Harman: I agree: if something has gone wrong, Ministers should offer a meeting with the hon. Member concerned—and I understand that that has happened in this case—but that is not sufficient. There is something unique about accountability on the Floor of the House, and that is what a Back Bencher seeks when initiating an Adjournment debate. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House for taking that debate so ably on behalf of the Government. She is committed to those issues, but she is not the accountable Minister, and that is why I will take this up with the Secretary of State. It should not have happened and we need to ensure that it does not happen again.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): May I thank the Leader of the House for what she said about David Taylor, who was such an outstanding Back Bencher?

In the light of Sir Ian Kennedy's comments yesterday, would it not be sensible for the House to make its views known on his proposals so that we do not put the cart before the horse and vote on some Kelly recommendations that Sir Ian may not wish to endorse, bearing in mind that the Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority is now in control?

Ms Harman: There are some residual issues from Sir Christopher Kelly's report that require legislation to fix them firmly in place. We have agreed to bring those forward in the Constitutional Reform and Governance Bill. As for Sir Ian Kennedy's document on establishing the new scheme for Members' allowances, the framework for it was laid down in the Parliamentary Standards Act 2009, which requires consultation with the Speaker and Members of the House, and I understand that Sir Ian has announced a wider five-week consultation with the public on the document through a website. It is now the responsibility of IPSA to take that forward independently. Individual Members can respond to the consultation and we can put forward our views, but Professor Sir Ian Kennedy is responsible for proposing the scheme as chairman of IPSA, and that is what he will do under the framework that has been laid down.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Will the Government table their own amendments to the Constitutional Reform and Governance Bill to ban non-doms from serving in Parliament, or will Ministers rely on my amendment?

Ms Harman: That is an important issue, although I was not aware that my hon. Friend had tabled such an amendment. It sounds like a very good idea and I thank him for bringing it to the attention of the House. If he gets the chance to move his amendment, perhaps it will provide an opportunity for those on the Opposition Benches to say whether the deputy chair of the Tory party is actually resident for tax purposes.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I very much welcome the Leader of the House's warm words about the Wright Committee proposals for reform of the House of Commons, and in particular her suggestion that we will need to go even further and build on them. That is an excellent and necessary idea. As a first step, will she place the Committee's draft motion on the Order Paper for a free vote in this House—yes or no?

Ms Harman: We are consulting the Opposition parties to ensure that the motion that we table has the broadest possible agreement across the House. Of course it will be a free vote, as it is House business, not Government business.

David Cairns (Inverclyde) (Lab): Can my right hon. and learned Friend find time for a debate on the Government's overseas aid policy? She will be aware that a wind of vicious homophobic oppression is blowing through large parts of Africa, including in countries to which we contribute significant sums of aid development money. Other than the routine expressions of outrage that we make in diplomatic circles, can she enlighten us as to what actual leverage we have with some of these countries, such as Uganda and Malawi, that will demonstrate to them the complete unacceptability of the course of action on which they have embarked, as it will see innocent men and women sentenced to life imprisonment or to death just for being gay?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend raises a very important point. This is a fundamental, basic human rights issue of great concern to the Government and the international community. I will raise his points about overseas aid in that specific respect with the Secretary of State for International Development.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): May we have a debate on benefit entitlement? We learnt yesterday that Anjem Choudary, the putative leader of Islam4UK which plans a despicable march through Wootton Bassett, is in receipt of £25,000 of benefits, compared with the average wage of our brave soldiers in Afghanistan of £17,000. My constituents do not understand that distorted sense of priorities in our benefit system. Does the Leader of the House agree that we need an urgent debate to talk about such issues?

Ms Harman: If the hon. Gentleman believes that the benefit system has been misapplied in this case, he can bring it to the attention of the relevant authorities. If it is a question of the structure of the benefit system, I suggest that he seeks an opportunity to raise it at Work and Pensions questions and makes his own proposals on how the benefit system should be changed.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. and learned Friend may be aware that during the festive period a major holiday provider in Scotland, Flyglobespan, went into receivership, resulting in hundreds of job losses and thousands of families losing their holidays. Will she use her good offices to facilitate an investigation into the circumstances surrounding that company so that we may explore what lessons can be learned and, just as importantly, ensure that the workers' interests are taken into account and the families receive compensation?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point, and I am sure that my colleagues in the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills will be concerned to investigate the circumstances surrounding the receivership of that company. I join my hon. Friend in expressing sympathy to the thousands of families affected and the employees whose livelihoods have been so devastatingly affected.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): May we have an early debate on the situation in Gaza? There is growing concern on both sides of the House about the desperate and deteriorating humanitarian situation, and a debate would allow Ministers from the Foreign Office to explain what they are doing to bring about a change of mind on the part of Egypt, which is currently blocking a humanitarian convoy.

Ms Harman: I am aware of the general intensification of concern about this issue, not least as reflected by the hon. Gentleman and by questions to the Prime Minister yesterday. I shall perhaps discuss with the Foreign Secretary the best way to ensure that the concerns of the House are properly aired and debated, so that he has a chance to respond and the way forward is made clear.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) leads an impressive campaign for fashion magazines clearly to label doctored and airbrushed images of professional models. I support that campaign and, after the pre-election launches this week, I think that it should be extended to political propaganda. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in the new age of parliamentary transparency there should be no role for Ken Barbie doll politicians?

Ms Harman: I agree with my hon. Friend. I fully support the hon. Lady's excellent campaign. There is nothing wrong with older women, and we do not need airbrushing. I also agree that no amount of airbrushing will conceal the truth behind the Tory tax muddle. It might be a new, airbrushed face, but it is still the same old Tories.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): It would be particularly appropriate at this time to have a topical debate on the Met Office, which costs taxpayers about £200 million a year. Surely it is time to stop treating the serial inaccuracy of the Met Office's forecasts as just a joke. It has become a scandal; it looks as if it has been hijacked by the climate change lobby. May we have a topical debate very soon on the subject?

Ms Harman: The problem is not the Met Office but the challenge of climate change. There is a micro-climatic problem on the Tory Back Benches, which perhaps I could refer to the Tory Front Benchers.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): On Monday, the Leader of the Opposition paid a visit to the Stroud constituency—a fine place to come to, if I may say so. When asked by a journalist what difference a Conservative MP would make to the people of Stroud and Gloucester, he was quoted as saying:

> "They will make a big difference. They'll do what they say. The problem with the current MPs is they say they're going to defend the Post Office but they go to Parliament and vote against it, they say they're going to defend community health services but they go to Parliament and vote the other way…you would have a bunch of"

Tory—

> "MPs committed to this area."

Given that my right hon. and learned Friend protects the rights of Back Benchers, may I suggest that she tell the Opposition, in the nicest possible way, to get some decent researchers? They could have looked at my voting record. More particularly, would she support my demand for a retraction, so that we can get some honesty back into politics and get people who are straight with the electorate for once?

Ms Harman: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. It sounds like he is suggesting something like "Ofpol" to monitor the Opposition. They say different things in different parts of the country and different things to the newspapers from what they say in the House. The one consistent thing is that none of it adds up.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): In the early days of this bout of bad weather, when the channel tunnel was closed because the trains could not run, Operation Stack was applied. That means that the M20 is closed and used as a lorry park. It happens regularly, and it does not just mean misery for my constituents and others in Kent; it cuts the most important freight route in the country. Given that, could the right hon. and learned Lady arrange for the Department for Transport to come to the House and make a statement? The regular application of Operation Stack is not just a local and regional problem, but a national and serious economic one. For various reasons, it is happening more and more often, and it is time for national Government to take some responsibility for this long-running problem.

Ms Harman: I can see that the issue has national implications, but it might be a good idea for the hon. Gentleman and a group of MPs for the constituencies most directly affected to get together with the responsible Transport and Business Ministers and discuss whether the framework needs to be changed. No doubt the regional development agency would also need to be involved. I suggest that he takes that forward. However, if he wants to make another suggestion, perhaps he can make it to me and I can follow it up.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Will my right hon. and learned Friend urgently arrange for lessons in GCSE geography to be made available to certain Members of the House who do not appear to be aware that when the planet warms up, warm air moves to the poles, pushing cold air down into areas such as ours? Global warming, therefore, produces extremes of weather, both hot and cold. Does she agree that the problem of global warming requires global leadership, and will she assure the House that the Prime Minister will continue to provide that leadership undeterred by recent events?

Ms Harman: We are able to play our part in the global effort to focus on climate change—obviously it has to be tackled nationally as well as globally—only because the Prime Minister and the Government are absolutely clear that climate change is one of the biggest challenges facing the planet, that we understand the science that lies underneath it, and that we are determined to take action to tackle it. I strongly agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there was a statement in the House this week on aviation and border security. It included a section on the risk of radicalisation and extremism in our universities. The statement made it clear that > "the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills has published guidance on managing the risk of violent extremism"—[Official Report, 5 January 2010; Vol. 503, c. 30.]—

in higher education. However, it is not clear when that guidance was published. This is a dynamic subject; the risks and intelligence change, and the guidance needs to change too. May we have a statement ensuring that the guidance is updated and published so that Members can see that it is relevant and fit for purpose?

Ms Harman: The Prevent programme, preventing radical extremism, is important not only in the Department for Communities and Local Government but, as the hon. Gentleman said, in the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, given that it involves issues of further and higher education. There are Business, Innovation and Skills questions next Thursday. Perhaps he will seek an opportunity to raise the issue directly with Business Ministers.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. May I point out that questions are starting to get a bit long? I want to try to get everybody in. We have an important debate to follow, so I hope that colleagues will be as helpful as possible.

Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): May I draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend to my early-day motion 259 on the east coast main line franchise?

[That this House notes with concern the timetable the Government has set for the refranchising of East Coast main line services; and calls on the Government to maintain the East Coast main line in public ownership so that the quality, effectiveness and competitiveness of public ownership can be fully demonstrated.]

May we have an early debate on the subject so that we can get a better understanding of why the Government remain wedded to the idiotic and fanciful privatisation of the railways bequeathed to us by the Conservative party? Many of us hoped that the east coast main line could be a public service comparator, so that we can judge other companies.

Ms Harman: We remain concerned to continue to improve our rail services, including the east coast main line, and I will draw my hon. Friend's point to the attention of the Secretary of State for Transport.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): Concern has been raised across the House about whether the Government actually support the recommendations of the Wright Committee report. The right hon. and learned Lady sought to reassure the House today, which I welcome. On that constructive note, may I ask whether she would be willing to meet a delegation of Wright Committee members to discuss where she feels that the recommendations need building on, so that there is no misunderstanding and to ensure that her motives, and those of the Government, are not misinterpreted in the way that she feels that they have been? Perhaps a meeting next week would suffice.

Ms Harman: The Select Committee recognised that some of the proposals needed more work to take them forward. Above all, I would like to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will facilitate proposals for debate and decision in the House, but there is no way we expect this to become a Government issue. It is a House issue, and we will ensure that we facilitate its ability to look across the piece and make progress on those issues.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): My constituents are extremely concerned about the quality and speed of communication between major Departments. Yesterday, it seemed to take an inordinately long time for the message to go from the Prime Minister to the Foreign Secretary, "Get out there and say something." In view of concerns about what would happen were there a greater national calamity, can the Leader of the House assure us that communication will be rather quicker in the future?

Ms Harman: The Foreign Secretary is getting out there and doing his job, which is what the Prime Minister, and indeed the whole country, would expect him to do. That is exactly what he is doing.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware of my early-day motion 529 on the proposed march by Islamic extremists through Wootton Bassett.

[That this House notes that Anjem Choudary, the UK leader of al-Muhajiroun, plans to stage a march through Wootton Bassett town carrying empty coffins as a protest against Britain's presence in Afghanistan; considers that such a demonstration would be a gross mark of disrespect to the soldiers who have died or been wounded in Afghanistan, their families and those who continue to fight on active service in Afghanistan; believes that such a march would cause great distress to those who have lost loved ones; further notes that the Muslim Council of Britain has described the proposed march as 'deplorable'; calls on the Home Secretary urgently to investigate the breaching of public order and other related offences; and urges Wootton Bassett Town Council and Wiltshire Police to ensure that any proposed demonstration that breaches the Public Order Act 1986 be rightly refused.]

Would it be possible to have a statement from the Home Secretary about what powers local authorities and police authorities have in relation to such a march? Does she agree that if the march went ahead, it would be a slight against not only the memory of our heroic servicemen and women returning to the United Kingdom, but the great people of Wootton Bassett who turn out in such great numbers to respect our war dead?

Ms Harman: I very much understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns. I understand that the police have not yet received notification of any such procession taking place. If notification is given, there are powers under public order legislation for the police to impose conditions subject to the consent of the Home Secretary, and indeed to deny the opportunity for the march to take place. The Home Secretary has said that he will look sympathetically on any application made by the police in that respect.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Residents and shopkeepers up and down the country are frightened of clearing pavements in front of their properties of snow and ice for fear of being sued should any pedestrians fall over on that section of public pavement. During the urgent question, I asked the Transport Minister if he would look at changing the law to protect residents and shopkeepers in such cases, and he said that he had no power to do so. Will the Leader of the House ask the Justice Secretary to make a statement about how the law could be changed to protect residents and shopkeepers in such circumstances?

Ms Harman: The Transport Minister was saying that people should be protected from the unreasonable fear, which is not founded on reality, that if they look to protect the forecourt of their business or help their neighbours they will be sued. The health and safety laws are important for protecting public health—for example, in the E. coli outbreaks that we have seen in city farms and suchlike. Those on the Opposition Benches are quick enough, if the public are not protected, to expect the Government to have effective regulations in place to protect them. However, nobody should go round encouraging the notion that there are nonsensical provisions waiting to entrap people who are using their common sense. There are not. I therefore assure the hon. Gentleman's constituents, as the Transport Minister did, that everybody can do what is commonsensical. If it is commonsensical, we can be pretty certain that it will be absolutely within the law.

[Ms Harman]

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): May we have a debate on the timeliness and clarity of ministerial responses? All Members from time to time have concerns about responses to parliamentary questions or correspondence with Ministers. However, I am thinking in particular of the delay of some hours yesterday among senior Ministers, including the Leader of the House, in responding to the simple question of whether they supported the Prime Minister, and of the equivocal and evasive nature of many of their answers.

Ms Harman: All the statements that have been made have been made on numerous occasions, including yesterday. I am going to continue with my view on such questions, which is that I do not respond to them when we are being asked about the business of the House.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Some 2,500 of my constituents and those of my right hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House have been without electricity over the past two days as a result of the adverse weather, and this in a period of sub-zero temperatures. We urgently need a broader statement from the Government on how the severe weather is being handled. Indeed, I find it extraordinary that the Government should have relied on a Conservative urgent question, tabled today, for the problem to be discussed in the House.

Ms Harman: I do not think that it matters where an urgent question comes from. If it is an important urgent question, on which Members from all parts of the House want to join in and ask questions, and if it is granted by the Speaker, it can be a positive contribution to debate in the House. It is no skin off anybody's nose for that to happen. There will be an opportunity next week to discuss energy security on an Opposition day motion. In anticipation of that debate, I can say that the National Grid Company has said that because of the cold weather there is unprecedented demand on our energy supplies, as one would expect, but that it is confident that supplies will be sustained. Indeed, the important work of repairing energy lines that are affected by falling trees cutting energy supplies is also an issue. However, there is no reason why there should not be an opportunity to ask questions in the meantime, and to debate them further next Wednesday.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): Does the Leader of the House share my concern that 4,600 households in Shirley, Croydon were without power during this cold period? Unfortunately, the problem is not just weather-related, because there were cuts on Christmas eve and on previous days too, when the weather was clement. Does she think that I will be able to get away with dealing with this Croydon issue in a debate on energy security?

Ms Harman: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman raise the issue directly with the relevant Ministers. I will alert them to the fact that he wants to raise the issue on behalf of his constituents and see whether he can deal with it by correspondence, a meeting or further discussion.

Point of Order

12.53 pm

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier in business questions, which I am sure you were following avidly, the Leader of the House clearly said that nobody had been released from prison early because of overcrowding. That is surprising, given that the Government introduced a scheme that releases all prisoners 16 days early from prison, specifically because prisons are overcrowded. Given that people following proceedings in the House or reading Hansard should be able to rely on the accuracy of the things said here, particularly by those on the Government Front Bench, can you ensure that the Leader of the House corrects the record, so that people are not misled about the state of play with regard to prisoners being released from prison?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): No, I cannot. However, if the Leader of the House wishes to catch my eye, further to the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised, which is not strictly a point of order, I am sure that she will try to help.

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) for bringing that issue to my attention. What I meant was that nobody is released outwith the framework that the Justice Secretary has presented to the House in respect of the overall approach to the provision of early release, which is a well established pattern that has been followed not only by this Government, but by previous Governments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the Leader of the House. I hope that everyone is clear and happy about the situation.

Pre-Budget Report

[Relevant documents: The Fourth Report from the Treasury Committee, Pre-Budget Report 2009, HC 180; and the Third Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Legislative Scrutiny: Financial Services Bill and the Pre-Budget Report, HC 184.]

12.55 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Liam Byrne): I beg to move,

That this House has considered the matter of the Pre-Budget Report.

I welcome the chance to open today's debate, the first on the pre-Budget report. I welcome it because decisions as significant as these should be tested in debate, so that the House and the public whom we represent can see clearly where each party stands and, amidst the arguments that we have in the media and elsewhere outside, where the policy of each party really rests.

We on the Government Benches are very clear about where we stand. We stand on the side of workers, businesses and home owners, who need protection from the worst global recession in 60 years, and for locking in recovery. We stand for taking the difficult decisions that will be needed to halve the deficit over the four years to come, while protecting our priorities for public services. We also stand for investing in growth, new jobs, new industries and new infrastructure that together will be vital in balancing our economy better in the years to come.

I hope that the crispness and clarity of our position in this debate will be matched, especially by the Opposition. This week, policy pose after policy pose has given way to position after position, sometimes with up to three difference stances in one afternoon. However, credit where credit is due: the Opposition are nothing if not nimble, as they hop madly between constituencies that they are so desperate to please. We will have none of that on this side of the House, so let me use the few minutes allotted to me this afternoon to set out some of the measures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor presented before Christmas.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): To reinforce the points that my right hon. Friend has just made, has he seen page 24 of The Guardian today, which says, "Demand for gilts at its highest for nine months," and "Service sector recovery raises hopes of end to UK recession"? The Government must be getting something right, and the Tories must be completely wrong.

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing page 24 of The Guardian to the House's attention. I will address some of those points shortly.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byrne: I will give way in a moment.

The first objective of our policy as set out in the pre-Budget report is, of course, to secure the recovery. When we look back over the year that has passed, we are glad that we ignored the idiosyncratic advice proffered by the Opposition and, instead of doing nothing, as they suggested, chose to act: to rescue the banking system from the brink of collapse; to cut VAT; to invest £5 billion in jobcentres, which have helped 3 million people out of unemployment in the past year; to introduce measures to allow families to stay in their homes, helping to ensure that repossessions are two times lower than in the 1990s recession; and to set up the Time to Pay scheme, which has helped more 160,000 businesses to spread their tax payments over a timetable that they can afford, helping to keep insolvency rates three times lower than in the 1990s.

[Mr. Byrne]

In the pre-Budget report, the Chancellor forecast a return to growth, but as we know, over the next period unemployment may continue to rise in the short term. So to lock in the recovery, the Chancellor said that he was able to do more: by extending the Time to Pay scheme for as long as it is needed; by deferring the proposed increase in corporation tax for smaller companies, leaving the 2010 tax rate unchanged for nearly 900,000 small businesses; by freezing support for mortgage interest at 6.08 per cent. for six months more, to help people who are worried about their mortgage payments; and, perhaps most importantly, by ensuring that every 18 to 24-year-old who has been out of work for more than six months is offered the chance of a job, training or community service.

However, the second point made by the Chancellor in the pre-Budget report is about looking ahead—to the years beyond 2010 and the return to growth and prosperity in the years to come. I am afraid that those years of growth will not be years without difficult decisions—indeed, they will be full of them—and especially not without the decisions needed to halve the deficit and protect our priorities in public services. We have said that, in our judgment, the right time frame over which to execute this difficult decision is the 48 months up to the end of 2013-14.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): I want to ask the Minister about the exchange on this subject during Prime Minister's Questions yesterday. The Prime Minister said:

> "We have published a deficit reduction plan".

He went on to say:

> "It includes cuts in some of the major Departments".—[Official Report, 6 January 2010; Vol. 503, c. 162.]

Can the Chief Secretary tell us where in any published Treasury document we can find details of those departmental cuts?

Mr. Byrne: Let me explain that in detail in a moment.

It is fair to say that the Conservatives have questioned our judgment that four years is the right time frame over which to halve the deficit, but their questioning has been in the style and manner of rather open-ended, slightly ponderous thinking aloud. They have not offered an alternative proposition, such as reducing our four-year time frame to three. They know what the price of such a move would be, and they seem unsure whether they want to pay it.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): It is not only the Opposition who are questioning the Government's debt reduction plans. The bond markets around the world are also doing so, and I was alarmed to read yesterday that the world's biggest bond house, PIMCO, which is based in the United States, has said that there is an 80 per cent. chance of Britain losing its triple A sovereign debt rating. That would result in increased mortgage and borrowing costs for the whole UK economy.

Mr. Byrne: That is an important point that I will address directly in a moment.

First, let me return to the question of the level of detail, because the House is right to ask how the sums will add up in 2013-14. In framing my remarks, I should like to draw on the excellent report from the Treasury Select Committee and the evidence presented to the Committee by the Chancellor and by Her Majesty's chief economic adviser.

Our judgment is that the deficit must fall from £178 billion this year to £96 billion in 2013-14, a fall of £82 billion. We anticipate that £25 billion of that sum will come from growth, and the return to business as usual, including the reversion of the VAT rate, but, as the Chancellor said to the Treasury Committee, £57 billion must come from discretionary action—in other words, decisions. As the chief economic adviser said to the Committee, we have decided to deliver two thirds of that sum through spending, and one third through new taxes. On decisions on tax, we have set out plans to raise £19 billion from new taxes, which we have sought to introduce in a fair way by ensuring that 60 per cent. of them are paid by the top 5 per cent. of earners in this country. That leaves £38 billion to be secured from spending cuts.

Capital investment must fall, as it safely can, from today's historically unprecedented level. In the 2008 pre-Budget report and the 2009 Budget, we announced substantial reductions to the overall capital spending budget, and that is set out on page 189 of the pre-Budget report book. Yes, Departments will have to cut back, which is why we have reduced our plans for current expenditure from 2011 onwards.

That is why this pre-Budget report, together with the command paper "Putting the Frontline First", announced £20 billion of cuts and efficiencies. If the House will bear with me, I think that it will be helpful if I run through them. They include: £8 billion to be delivered by 2012-13, identified across the public sector through cutbacks in Whitehall through the operational efficiency programme; £600 million from the greater use of online systems to deliver public services; £650 million from cuts in consultancy, marketing and communication spending across government; £550 million from cutting back on quangos and arm's-length bodies; £550 million from local government, including reducing the costs of inspection; £140 million from cutting senior civil service costs by 20 per cent.; £1.4 billion from ending temporary employment measures as unemployment falls; £850 million from delaying things that can wait, or from cutting back systems such as the NHS IT programme; £900 million from asking businesses and students to pay a little more for training; £360 million from reforming the criminal justice system and legal aid; and £730 million from focusing regeneration and transport spending on areas where it is needed most.

Of course, to this sum may be added the windfall of lower unemployment. For the purpose of the PBR, we made the extremely cautious assumption that unemployment would not fall. In fact, if unemployment does indeed come down, as we expect it to, the benefits bill will be billions of pounds lower. It is also possible that, as the economy grows faster—as the Bank of England has projected—there will be further fruits of growth in the years to come.

The House will rightly ask how such windfalls will be put to use. I will state the position bluntly, by repeating what the Chancellor said to the Treasury Committee. He said that, in the event that growth turns out to be more robust than in his forecast, borrowing would naturally fall faster, and that it would then be possible to reduce the structural deficit further in the medium term.

Derek Twigg (Halton) (Lab): I received some figures this morning from my local authority. They show that, in August 1985, the youth unemployment rate was 19.1 per cent. My right hon. Friend has made a good point about people getting back into work and no longer claiming benefit. We have to have cuts and efficiency savings, but we do not want to go back to those unemployment rates. I urge him to ensure that we have continual growth to provide jobs, particularly for our young people.

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The fact that unemployment is so much lower now is a result of many of the actions that we took to ensure that businesses had flexibility over cash flow and that there was guaranteed new help for young people after nine months. We were, however, conscious of the need to do more than that, which is why we said in the pre-Budget report that no young person should be out of work for longer than six months without being offered a job, training or community service.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I want the Government's plans to succeed and the economy to grow, but will the Minister now deal with the question most appropriately put by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone)? Would not the plans that the Minister has announced be derailed if our huge deficit caused a loss of confidence in the international monetary market and our credit rating was reduced, with all the horrors that would result from that? Will the Minister now deal with that question, because it is critical to what he is saying now?

Mr. Byrne: I am going to ask for the hon. Gentleman's patience for just a minute or two longer while I make one further point.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byrne: I will address this point before I give way.

The pre-Budget report set out plans to rebalance our economy in the years to come. In the Budget, we said that we would do this through fair tax increases and the tighter control of public spending, to ensure that long-term interest rates were kept low. That point has often been made by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). There are now great strengths on which we can build in the years to come. We have low interest rates and low inflation. We also have the most flexible labour market in Europe, the lowest rate of corporation tax in the G7 and a competition regime that is among the best in the world. That is why we are judged to be one of the best places in the world in which to do business and to attract inward investment.

The pre-Budget report develops those strengths. It sets out how we will maintain our leadership in the low-carbon sector, how we will boost investment in our national infrastructure and skills, and how we will support our world-class high-tech industries. Over the next year or two, we will extend by £500 million the amount of lending available to small and medium-sized enterprises, through a 12-month extension of the enterprise finance guarantee scheme. We have created a new growth capital fund, with a new £325 million. We have created Infrastructure UK, which will help to accelerate private sector investment in new infrastructure. We are proposing to introduce a patent box, which is a reduced rate of corporation tax applying to income from patents from April 2013. We have also proposed £200 million for the strategic investment fund, of which £150 million will be routed to support low-carbon investment. We are doubling the UK's commitment to funding carbon capture and storage demonstration sites from two to four. We are increasing support for low-carbon vehicles and setting out additional funding for low-carbon industries and energy efficiency, including Warm Front. Those are all policies—indeed, all ambitions—in which the Conservative party has little interest.

Mr. Philip Hammond: The Minister has moved swiftly on from the question that the hon. Member for Halton (Derek Twigg) asked him, but, before we lose the point, will he confirm that youth unemployment in Britain is now at a record high level?

Mr. Byrne: Youth unemployment, in my view, is too high, but the hon. Gentleman will recognise that something like 200,000 to 250,000 of the numbers in the current count provided by the International Labour Organisation include those in full-time education who may be looking for part-time work. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to bandy around figures in headline terms in a debate such as this without setting out some of the detail.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Byrne: Let me deal with the points about bonds, which were raised by the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), after which I will give way again.

I hope that over the hours to come, we get a chance to explore some of the myths thrown around during the last week, starting perhaps with the most important question of whether our plan to cut the deficit is fast enough. Is it fast enough, for example, for the people who buy our bonds? We have heard a lot about the intentions of PIMCO and some of the quotations bandied around the House to date have, of course, been a bit selective and one-sided, if I may say so. PIMCO, reflecting on the flight to safety that brought buyers to UK bonds and brought gilt rates so low is naturally thinking about divestment into riskier assets as the world economy returns to its former state. This is not a new notion, as that was said last July.

Is the plan fast enough for the Governor of the Bank of England? The shadow Chancellor is fond of quoting the Governor. The shadow Chancellor is not in his place.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Neither is the Chancellor.

Mr. Byrne: No, indeed. In fact, the full answer from the Governor of the Bank of England on this question paints a very different picture. He gave his answer in evidence to the Treasury Select Committee, saying:

> "It is certainly true that if you eliminate the deficit too aggressively it will have an adverse consequence."

He went on to say:

> "You have to take action to bring down the deficit of the size we have—it is a very large structural deficit—but to do so at a rate that is consistent with the restoration of growth in the economy".

That is why we propose to reduce the structural deficit from 9 per cent. to 3.6 per cent. in the space of just one Parliament.

Is our deficit reduction plan fast enough for the ratings agencies? Again, their views are sometimes traduced in this House, but the reality is that in Moody's analysis published last month, both the US and the UK triple A ratings are described as "resilient"; all three rating agencies have acknowledged the UK has access to particularly deep and liquid capital markets; and on perhaps the ultimate test of demand, gilt auction performance remains strong. Ten-year gilt yields averaged over 11 per cent. in the 1980s; they are now around 4 per cent. I hope that all these arguments and more are debated this afternoon.

If I were forced to characterise this pre-Budget report, I would say that the sweep of its ambition is matched by the depth of its detail. In the debates that we have had—not only in this place, but in the media and elsewhere, and particularly in the debates the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge and I have had late at night in TV studios around London since 9 December—I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will have been struck like me by the sheer contrast between 212 pages of detail on specific, pressure-tested proposals and the vacuous nonsense of the Conservative party.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Byrne: Before I conclude, I will give way to hon. Members.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Ind): Because of the impact on the economy, I applaud the Government's cautious approach towards reducing the fiscal deficit, but what is the estimate of the reduction in economic growth that will result from the proposed reductions in spend in the pre-Budget report?

Mr. Byrne: The growth forecasts that we have set out are the basic answer to that question. There is, of course, a degree of uncertainty about the future path of growth for our economy. The independent forecast is different from the forecast that the Chancellor presented, while his forecast is rather lower than that presented by the Governor of the Bank of England. It would be difficult, especially this afternoon, for me to decouple these projections for the public finances and those presented for growth.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): The Treasury Select Committee criticised the temporary operating rule, which in turn, in line with the pre-Budget report of 2009, has been followed by the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, debated yesterday, to implement those provisions. That includes the code for fiscal stability, the principles of which are set out—including the principle that > "the Government shall publish sufficient information to allow the public to scrutinise the conduct of fiscal policy".

This includes debt, and provision is made for the definition of debt. I am sure that the Minister will understand it when I say that organisations such as PIMCO and others that are working out the degree of credibility they can ascribe to the Government's position will take account of whether the definitions and the actualité, as they say, of net borrowing are actually true. The Minister knows that we do not agree on that, so is he prepared to spell out the definition of net borrowing? I asked his Front-Bench colleague the same question yesterday and she did not or could not answer. Will he do so now? What is net borrowing?

Mr. Byrne: I seem to remember that the hon. Gentleman intervened on the Chancellor earlier in the week, so it will not surprise him to learn that I have nothing to add to the Chancellor's excellent answer provided to the hon. Gentleman at that time.

Mr. Cash: Give me an answer.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman asks me to go further than the Chancellor's position, which was set out—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) should not pursue the answer that he has been given by calling from a sedentary position—irrespective of whether or not he is satisfied with that answer.

Mr. Byrne: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Given that the earlier intervention was not answered at all satisfactorily, the Chief Secretary must be able to tell the House what the suppression of gross domestic product growth will be as a result of £57 billion being taken out of the economy—£20 billion as a result of tax rises and £40 billion as a result of spending cuts. To homogenise it altogether in a global growth figure is really not good enough. That is a heck of a lot of money out of the economy, so surely the Government must know the impact of it on the suppression of GDP growth.

Mr. Byrne: I am trying to avoid taking the House through what would be a quite complicated economic equation, which no one will be surprised to hear I have not brought with me this afternoon. The hon. Gentleman is looking at only one side of the argument. He will know that when we have such a large structural deficit because of the action we have taken to protect the country from the worst of the economic storm, it is vital to set out for members of the public and for taxpayers, as well as for people who buy our bonds, exactly how we plan to reduce that deficit. We have set out the fastest deficit consolidation plan in the G7. Without that clarity in place, it would be quite possible for long-term interest rates to begin to rise, which would also be damaging to the success of investment in this country in the years to come. The Chancellor has thus set out a central scenario, clarifying what we think is the right judgment to make on public finances and what the consequences for growth will be.

Mr. Philip Hammond: I wonder whether part of the disagreement between us is definitional. The Chief Secretary has said that some of the structural deficit we face is the result of the actions taken by the Government to protect people and citizens from the effects of the recession. In my definition, that is part of the cyclical deficit we face, not the structural deficit. Can we be clear about that?

Mr. Byrne: I apologise for mis-speaking earlier, but the point I was making is that the plan we have presented involves a rapid—indeed, the most rapid of any G7 country—reduction in the cyclically adjusted deficit: from 9 per cent. this year to 8 per cent. next year and then down to 5.8 per cent. in 2011-12, when we anticipate the economy growing above trend.

I conclude by saying that I feel very strongly that this pre-Budget report constitutes 212 pages of great detail, which is in complete contrast to the plan—if it can be so characterised—presented by the Conservative party. The truth is that the Conservatives have been love-bombing every audience they can find within easy reach of a press conference, and with that love-bombing has come a new lexicon of ambiguity. Thus, instead of a straight "promise", we now have a "pledge", an "aspiration", a "commitment" or a "No. 1 priority".

This morning the Leader of the Opposition continued his careless whispers, reassuring listeners to the "Today" programme. He said that he would have to be tough and pull back from the Conservatives' guarantee of 45,000 single rooms in the national health service. It could not be a pledge, he said, but he told the listeners not to worry, because "it is an aspiration". It seems that the Conservatives now cannot stop adding to their now famous "queue" of commitments. We all remember what a Tory queue looks like. We used to call them waiting lists, and they were so long that people often expired before they reached the front.

The Conservatives' "all things to all people" policy has left them with a £34 billion credibility hole that they cannot airbrush away. If the Shadow Chancellor spent more than 40 per cent. of his time on economics, perhaps the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge would not be in such an embarrassing position this afternoon; but he is, and the whole House is looking forward to seeing whether he can climb out of the hole in which his party leaders have left him.

1.20 pm

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I shall try to match the Chief Secretary's brevity, although I came prepared for Members of the House to be a bit thinner on the ground. Evidently not all experienced the same difficulty that some of us encountered in battling through the snow to get here.

This is the first opportunity that the House has had to debate the pre-Budget report, the last important economic statement made by the Government before a pre-election Budget which markets will rightly discount. Given the critical state of the public finances, the huge borrowing requirement that must be met, and the fragility of confidence in the United Kingdom economy and United Kingdom Government debt in particular, we would have expected the Government to use this opportunity to send a powerful and unambiguous signal to investors and lenders alike of their determination to get the deficit under control.

Listening to the Chancellor and the Prime Minister yesterday, and to the Chief Secretary, one would think that the global financial crisis caused the meltdown in Britain's public finances, but that is not what has happened. According to the Treasury's figures, the economic recession accounts for about a quarter of Britain's deficit—that is the cyclical part of the deficit, which economic recovery will eventually eliminate—but three quarters of it is structural, and requires a structural response. The truth is not that the financial crisis has caused the fiscal crisis, but that for many years the global financial boom masked the scale of the underlying fiscal problem as this profligate Government spent the tax receipts that were the proceeds of a series of bubbles in financial assets, and property in particular, as if they were permanent features of the economic landscape. The real structural crisis that needs to be addressed is not caused by the Government's support for the banking system, as they like to imply. In fact, none of this year's £178 billion deficit is directly attributable to support provided for the banks.

The pre-Budget report was the Government's last chance to set out a credible path to fiscal stability, to put our economy back on the road to sustainable growth and enduring prosperity, and to ensure our triple A credit rating. They blew that chance, and now the country knows beyond doubt that only a change of Government can deliver the economic change that Britain needs. The present Government have shown themselves to be unfit for office by shirking their task in the nation's hour of economic need.

Mr. Byrne: I am following the hon. Gentleman's remarks with great interest, and I am grateful to him for giving way so early in his speech. He appears to have changed tack slightly in his critique. For some months he has been saying that we should move faster in reducing the deficit. Is he now accepting that four years is the right time frame within which to halve it?

Mr. Hammond: It sounds as though the Chief Secretary has not been listening over the last few months. We have consistently said that we need to start earlier: we need to start reducing the fiscal deficit in the coming year. As he will know, if he has his calculator with him, starting earlier would have a compounded effect throughout that four-year period, and would make a greater impact on the deficit.

Kelvin Hopkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I will, but then I must make some progress.

Kelvin Hopkins: The Conservatives are constantly harping on about borrowing and debt, but the truth is that our gross national debt is still below that of France and Germany, and about half that of Italy and Japan. There is no need for panic. May I suggest that the Tories are trying to make the Government panic simply for electoral advantage, rather than for the benefit of the country?

Mr. Hammond: I think that if anyone is running policy for electoral advantage, it is to the Chief Secretary that the hon. Gentleman should address himself.

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

The hon. Gentleman is, of course, right about debt. The issue here is the size of the deficit, and the speed with which we are increasing our debt. Ultimately, all of us in this place can talk as much as we like about the debt and the deficit, but what matters is what the people who must finance that deficit, and must continue to finance that debt, believe about the situation and whether we are moving fast enough to deal with it.

Mr. Byrne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I will, but then I must make some progress.

Mr. Byrne: I am enormously grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He will know that our projection is a reduction in the cyclically adjusted deficit from 9 per cent. in 2009-10 to 8 per cent. in 2010-11, but he seems to be saying that it should be falling still faster. What figure does he propose?

Mr. Hammond: I am afraid that I am not going to oblige the Chief Secretary. In fact, I think I will adopt the strategy that he adopted in response to the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). The day before yesterday, the shadow Chancellor answered the precise question that the Chief Secretary has just asked. I will do what he did in response to my hon. Friend, and refer him to that answer.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hammond: Very briefly; then I must make some progress.

Mr. Cash: We seem to be going in circles. Does my hon. Friend agree that, contrary to the assertion made by the Chief Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) made it clear that in our estimates of net debt we would include matters such as the private finance initiative, Network Rail and public pensions? Is it not the Government's failure to arrive at the truth of this matter that is undermining their arguments about what the deficit is, and thereby undermining the credit risk rating and the bond markets?

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend has made a good point, although it is a slightly different point from the one that the Chief Secretary was making to me. Issues relating to definition of the net debt are indeed part of what is undermining the United Kingdom's credibility in international markets.

Divided Governments are weak Governments. In the run-up to the pre-Budget report we saw acrimony and division within this Government, and since the PBR some may have noticed a degree of continuity in that trend. We have observed the Schools Secretary and the Chancellor playing cat and mouse with each other in public over the education budget, the Work and Pensions Secretary accusing the Chancellor of "astonishing" mistakes—I wonder where she got that idea from—the Health Secretary insisting that his budget would be protected, the Transport Secretary implying that he would resign if railway capital spending was cut; and, all the time, the Chancellor's options being narrowed by the manoeuvring of the Prime Minister and his allies—or perhaps I should say "ally"—intent on creating political dividing lines rather than solving the underlying fiscal problem.

Yesterday the Deputy Prime Minister, in what was billed as a speech reasserting his support for the Prime Minister, instead comprehensively undermined the Prime Minister's economic strategy, making it clear that he, at least, understands that economic recovery cannot be built on more borrowing and more public spending—hence his decision to let it be known that he was "incandescent" about the content of the pre-Budget report.

Following those internal semi-public debates within the Government may be great fun for Opposition politicians and journalists in the Westminster village as they seek to identify the winners and losers of each round, but the real losers are the people of Britain and the only winners are the hedge funds, which are quick to spot weakness and indecision and which are now openly speculating against our currency and our sovereign debt.

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Is it not the case that the massive cuts proposed by the Tories would simply drive up unemployment and make the crisis worse?

Mr. Hammond: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has made a mistake, and intended to address that question to the Chief Secretary.

There is a fact here that we must all face: whoever is in government after the next general election will have to cut public spending. Surprisingly, even the Prime Minister on a good day—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) does not agree that it will be necessary to cut public spending after the next general election. I think that puts him in a very small minority in the House. We will leave him with his thoughts and perhaps those of the little group around him, but he is well out of the mainstream of current thinking.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hammond: I will give way in a moment.

The fact is that this Government are being driven not by the needs of the economy and the medium and long-term best interests of the British people, but by the needs of the Labour party and the insistence of the Prime Minister and the Schools Secretary that the scale of the fiscal problem, the challenge of dealing with it and the true price of not dealing with it are to be concealed at all costs from the British public until after polling day. No price is too high to pay, provided the bill does not arrive until 7 May. No burden is too heavy to bear if it is the Prime Minister's successor who will bear it.

That is the most systematically reckless, cynical and dishonest strategy for dealing with a fiscal crisis that anyone in the House will be able to recall. It compares very unfavourably with the stance of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who as Chancellor in 1995 and 1996 insisted on pursuing the policies that were right for Britain's long-term economic health, not those that would deliver short-term illusions of success, however tempting that may have been electorally.

Britain's fiscal history over the past decade and a half is pretty simple. My right hon. and learned Friend created the golden legacy of low inflation, stable growth and falling unemployment, a legacy that the current Prime Minister inherited in 1997. He exploited that legacy to create a formidable image as a "prudent" Chancellor even while he was pumping up the bubble that was the root cause of the fiscal crisis that we now face. However, when the legacy ran out, he carried on spending, focused as always resolutely on the short term, spending the proceeds of his unsustainable bubble and then borrowing some more—spending and borrowing his way through the illusion of a boom. Apparently, that is his idea of building an economy that is best placed to withstand the slow-down and ready to lead the world out of the recession.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The reality is that the so-called golden legacy was an accidental consequence of sterling's ejection from the European monetary system in the early 1990s after a previous unsustainable bubble. The hon. Gentleman wants to deal with facts and figures. What estimate has he made, given that the Conservatives want to cut faster, of the effect of that on domestic demand and therefore on the recovery of our economy?

Mr. Hammond: We come to the crux of the disagreement between us and the Government. If there were no factors other than the level of demand implied by fiscal stimulus, the hon. Gentleman would have a point, but the fact is that what has kept Britain going through this recession and what will see Britain grow in the recovery are continued low interest rates and relatively loose monetary policy. We do not have an automatic option of maintaining a fiscal deficit at the level that the Government would like to maintain and still being able to keep monetary policy as loose as it is now. That is the crux of the disagreement between us. In my view, there are many members of the Government who understand that perfectly well, but the Prime Minister has chosen, for electoral reasons, to ignore those voices and to insist that he maintains his fiscal stance until after the general election.

Phil Wilson (Sedgefield) (Lab): The Government say that we will cut the deficit over four years. Under the Tory policy, how long would it take to cut the deficit in half?

Mr. Hammond: I have indicated to the hon. Gentleman that we would expect to start the process of cutting the deficit, or of reducing Government spending, in 2010-11. This Government are proposing to go on increasing Government spending. The cumulative impact of starting early, even in a modest way, is quite significant. Of course, Labour Members want to try to reduce this to a very simple issue. It is a complex balancing act. I totally accept that. Reducing the deficit is going to have to go on over many years until we get ourselves back into balance. It can go a little bit faster if the economy is growing more strongly. It needs to be mindful of the monetary policy position that the Bank of England is able to offer at any given time. It needs to be mindful of wider macro-economic circumstances.

Mr. Pelling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I will in a minute. I must make a bit of progress and then I will give way to a few more Members.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I want to make a bit of progress and then I will happily give way again in a few moments. The Chief Secretary has wrong-footed me by being so surprisingly brief and I do not want to spend all my time taking interventions.

We have ended up where we are today: the only country in the G20 not yet out of recession—the Chancellor confirmed that on Tuesday—running the biggest deficit in the industrial world, unemployment at nearly 2.5 million and, as I said earlier, with the highest number of young people out of work on record. We are in the longest and deepest recession in our history, with more companies going bust in this downturn than in any other. After 13 years of Labour Government, the poorest are getting poorer.

Most importantly, confidence in the Government's economic management, both at home and abroad, already shaky, has crumbled since the PBR. It is no exaggeration to say that it is only the prospect of a change of Government that has prevented an even more marked negative reaction in market sentiments since the PBR. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) finds that amusing. I know that he is a great expert on financial markets.

Mark Schofield of Citigroup, for example, said:

> "Unless we get a credible set of measures put in place quickly, which seems unlikely unless we get a Conservative government with a clear majority at the next election, we think the UK's Aaa rating will be right up on the radar screens in a very short space of time."

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hammond: I will give way in a moment.

This is how the Institute for Fiscal Studies summed up the situation:

> "Arguably, with the Conservatives well ahead in the opinion polls, financial markets may be more influenced now by whether the Opposition's policies are consistent with long-term fiscal sustainability than those of the government."

Frank Dobson: The hon. Gentleman quoted someone from Citigroup as a person we should take seriously. Would the hon. Gentleman care to tell us how much Citigroup lost in the banking crisis? Was it $10 billion, $20 billion or $30 billion?

Mr. Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman makes his point. Mark Schofield and Michael Saunders, whom I shall quote later, are respected economists in the City. Their comments are widely circulated and noted.

Mr. Pelling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I will not at the moment.

The pre-Budget report was, as I said, the Government's last chance to turn this situation around and to restore Britain's reputation and credit-worthiness. It needed to do two things: first, to put in place a credible plan to restore fiscal balance, and secondly to demonstrate the political courage to implement it, instead of merely talking about it. The Government failed on both tests. The plan that the Chancellor set out has reassured no one. It was immediately attacked by business leaders, economists, market analysts and commentators. Richard Lambert, director general of the CBI, said on 9 December:

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

> "The Chancellor has made a serious mistake imposing an extra jobs tax at a time when the economic recovery will still be fragile…He has also missed the opportunity to increase the UK's credibility by reducing the public deficit earlier."

David Frost, of the British Chambers of Commerce, said that the national insurance rise is

> "Terrible news…It's an additional cost for business when they can least afford it."

The PBR was slammed by economists for being driven by politics, not by economics, with widespread agreement that the failure to produce a credible plan to tackle the deficit leaves Britain vulnerable to higher interest rates and a downgrade of the sovereign debt rating, which I assume is something that the Government will be concerned about.

The right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras will be pleased to hear that I am going to quote Michael Saunders at Citigroup, who is one of the City's most respected economists:

> "The PBR appears to be aimed at reviving Labour's core support rather than seriously tackling the UK's medium-term fiscal problems…These measures do little or nothing to alter the medium- and longer-term fiscal outlook."

Let me give the right hon. Gentleman a few more examples. Barclays said:

> "The PBR is unlikely to dispel concerns about the UK's public finances…The government has demonstrated that it is willing to raise taxes to fund extra spending, but not that it is willing to project a more aggressive overall tightening in policy".

Nor were analysts impressed by the Chancellor's forecasts, upon which even his modest plans for fiscal consolidation depend. BNP Paribas said:

> "The Chancellor's new forecasts also continue to look massively over-optimistic".

Morgan Stanley said that

> "the Treasury's forecasts for GDP growth, particularly beyond the next couple of years, still look optimistic to us."

Citigroup, again, said:

> "The revenue forecasts…look over-optimistic."

RBS said that the Treasury has been consistently too optimistic on how much tax revenue

> "a given amount of GDP growth generates".

All this leaves us exposed to higher interest rates, of course. Citigroup has said:

> "We suspect that as this budget is digested, gilts and sterling will react badly."

RBS said:

> "Issuance remains at historically highly elevated levels and this is seen forcing yields higher in a post QE environment."

The soaring national debt threatens a credit rating downgrade.

Frank Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman shortly, after I have finished reading out these reactions and responses to the PBR.

On the afternoon of the PBR, Barclays said that

> "the UK's triple-A sovereign credit rating and the currency are likely to remain vulnerable."

BNP Paribas said:

> "Given that the Government has decided to ignore the opportunity to take steps to remove the risk of a sovereign rating down grade we expect sterling to remain under pressure over the medium term."

The bond-rating agency, Moody's, said that the PBR plans

> "stretch to the limit…what is consistent with a top rating."

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hammond: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne).

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): The Government's deficit reduction plan relies on increased taxation, reduced public spending and, crucially and perhaps least discussed, very optimistic forecasts for economic growth, well above trend forecasts. Does the hon. Gentleman accept the Government's forecasts for economic growth in the years ahead, which are part of the plan the Chief Secretary has outlined this afternoon?

Mr. Hammond: It is clear from what I have just said that the qualified commentators' view is that the Government's forecast of trend economic growth beyond 2011 appears optimistic.

Mr. Byrne rose—

Mr. Hammond: I know what the Chief Secretary wants to say now; he wants to talk about the Bank of England. The forecast appears optimistic, however. We are not an economic forecasting organisation, but we do look at the consensus of forecasts made by independent commentators, and I think it is fair to say that the Government's forecasts are at the top of the optimistic end of the spectrum.

Frank Dobson rose—

Mr. Pelling rose—

Mr. Meacher rose—

Mr. Hammond: I shall give way first to the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson).

Frank Dobson: I said—ironically, of course—that I was most impressed by these qualified commentators, and, as usual, I was not exaggerating. Citibank, which provides one of the highly qualified commentators quoted by the hon. Gentleman, lost £60 billion, and it bought up Merrill Lynch, which had lost £52 billion, so this brilliant person is working for an organisation that lost £110 billion. The hon. Gentleman quoted Morgan Stanley, which lost almost £16 billion. Barclays losses were, admittedly, a mere bagatelle in comparison; it lost only £7.9 billion. We are expected to give credence to the prognostications of these idiots, however, including Moody's, which had given triple A ratings to all the lunatic procedures those organisations were following.

Mr. Hammond: Clearly, there is nothing like a financial crisis to bring the old dinosaurs out of their caves—and I know the right hon. Gentleman takes great pride in being a dinosaur. I say this to him, however: I do not think anyone cares tuppence whether he gives credence to what these City economists are saying. The important point, however, is that the people who will have to lend us the hundreds of billions of pounds that this Government want to borrow do take notice of them, and they make their judgments about where to lend, and where not to lend, on the basis of them.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hammond: I shall give way to the Chief Secretary.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman is enormously kind in giving way. Does he acknowledge that Standard & Poors has said:

"We believe that the ratings on the UK continue to be supported by its wealthy, diversified economy"?

He will also recognise that Fitch said "The UK's triple A rating remains supported by its high value added, diversified economy." He will recognise, too, that Moody's has said that "the outlook for the UK Government is stable. Her Majesty's Government is deemed a resilient triple A issuer." The hon. Gentleman's presentation would be incomplete without such an acknowledgement. Would it not be incomplete, too, without an acknowledgement of the Governor of the Bank of England's growth forecast for 2010-11 of 4.1 per cent., which is much higher than the rate the Chancellor offered?

Mr. Hammond: I predicted the last bit of that intervention, and I am happy to agree with the first bit: I am extremely kind. It is the bit in the middle that we have to talk about. If I really thought that it was done and dusted and that the UK's triple A credit rating was a lost cause, I probably would not be applying for the job I am applying for. I also hope, however, that the right hon. Gentleman similarly agrees that there is no scope at all for complacency about the triple A credit rating. That credit rating has not even been in question for decades, yet it is now right on the radar screen; it is being talked about in analysts' notes, and we need to be extremely careful. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman is under great pressure from the Prime Minister to create political dividing lines and to focus on the very short term, but he and his boss need to be extremely careful about how they present themselves to the people who decide these things, who ultimately will be the arbiters of our fate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: We need balance in this debate. We have heard a great deal from the Government, but will my hon. Friend describe to the House the scenario that would arise if the United Kingdom lost its triple A credit rating? It is important to know about the consequences that would flow from losing that rating—the implications of that on taxes and everything else that affects the country and the people of this country.

Mr. Hammond: If my hon. Friend will wait a moment, I shall come on to a part of my speech that deals specifically with that issue. If he wants to intervene on me again then, I will be very happy to give way.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): In the plethora of quotes my hon. Friend gave us from the outside experts, one of the key points to consider—which is very much in tune with the wishes of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) and even the Government—is the need to stop the huge rise in unemployment. Does it not strike my hon. Friend as counter-intuitive to raise national insurance when one is trying to increase employment and reduce unemployment?

Mr. Hammond: It is very clear that the increase in national insurance tax will have a negative impact on the capacity of the economy to create jobs, and I would have thought that creating jobs in the recovery would be one of the principal focuses of attention for the Chief Secretary and his colleagues.

Mr. Meacher: Several minutes ago, the hon. Gentleman said that it was a mainstream view that there should be a reduction in the deficit through large and early public expenditure cuts, and he rather condescendingly rejected the opinions of those who took a different view. How does he explain the case of Japan in the 1990s? It followed exactly that policy. When recovery started, it raised the sales tax and reduced expenditure, and it went into a double-dip recession. How does he also explain that Roosevelt through the new deal expanded the economy, and as it began to come out of the slump, as a result of increasing taxes and reducing public expenditure, it went into a further slump that did not end until the war? Is the hon. Gentleman not pursuing exactly those wrong policies?

Mr. Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman has, in fact, very neatly made my point for me, because in both cases the problem was an increase in interest rates too early in the cycle, which then choked off the recovery. What I have been arguing and what the Conservatives have been consistently arguing is that the most important determinant of the strength of the recovery will be the level of interest rates and the looseness of monetary policy.

Whatever Labour Members might think, it is clear to Conservative Members that the credibility and creditworthiness of Britain requires a plan to deliver what the Governor of the Bank of England has called

"a really significant reduction in the deficit…over the lifetime of a Parliament", which is the period for which a Government are elected. Surely the point is that common sense tells us that for as long as the Chancellor is publicly failing to propose something that meets the minimum requirements set out publicly by the Governor of the Bank of England, markets will be unsettled and they will mark the Government down. Demonstrating political commitment to fiscal consolidation means starting work on the task, not talking about it; it means putting one's money where one's mouth is.

Derek Twigg rose—

Mr. Hammond: I am going to make a bit of progress before I give way.

At the time of the pre-Budget report, the Chancellor told us:

"For as long as extraordinary uncertainties remain in the world economy, this is not a time for a spending review."—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol. 502, c. 368.]

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

However, to be credible the pre-Budget report needed to be accompanied by a comprehensive spending review or at least by a clear allocation of departmental spending totals for 2011-12 and 2012-13. Having told us that he could not provide that, he went on to tell us that he was guaranteeing most of the NHS budget, the schools budget and the police budget.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury has recently refined this argument, with the proposition that the Government can confidently predict that we will come out of recession at the turn of the year and that economic growth will be 1.25 per cent. in 2010 and 3.5 per cent. in 2011 and every year thereafter, and can set an overall envelope of public spending in specific budgets for health, for schools and for the police—that is about 40 per cent. of resource departmental expenditure limits—but cannot allocate spending totals to the remaining Departments because they do not know what the level of unemployment will be.

Yesterday, the Labour-dominated Treasury Committee said the following about that astonishingly selective forecasting capability:

> "It may be difficult for any current consolidation plan to command universal support. It will therefore be very important to add greater detail and clarity to the plan sooner rather than later."

It went on to say:

> "There is a sense that the Treasury are using uncertainty to suit themselves"— by producing some forecasts as far as 2017-18 but no spending details beyond 2011. The Committee Chairman, the right hon. Member for West Dunbartonshire (John McFall), from whom we will hear later, added his thoughts in the covering press release, saying:

> "We consider clarity, even if it is clarity about the degree of uncertainty surrounding the forecasts, as essential to strengthening this crucial credibility."

In addition, the Committee stated that it could

> "see no good reason for the Treasury failing to produce"— more detailed—

> "illustrative figures for future expenditure".

We are being asked to accept that the Treasury can forecast growth, set spending totals and allocate funding to Departments that will grow, but that there are compelling and overriding reasons why the Government cannot allocate funding to the Departments that will shrink—and shrink they certainly will. It has been widely reported that there is an internal Treasury analysis showing that those Departments not fortunate enough to enjoy the political patronage of the Prime Minister will face a 17 per cent. real-terms spending cut over three years. That would confirm the analysis of the Institute for Fiscal Studies suggesting a 16 per cent. cut—or 19 per cent. if the ring-fencing is extended for a third year.

That contrasts sharply with the Chancellor's words on the "Today" programme on 10 December, when he said:

> "Spending is going to be pretty much flat...Broadly speaking...we're assuming for the non-protected services it's going to be pretty much flat".

That was in nominal terms, but even after allowing for inflation, it is a long way from a 17 per cent. real-terms cut. He was asked on Monday to deny the existence of that Treasury paper setting out the reality of 17 per cent. cuts in all other Departments, and I asked the Chief Secretary twice on Tuesday to deny the existence of that internal paper, but neither of them could do so. Instead, they got their civil servants to engage in producing costings of a bunch of fantasy policies, which Labour party officials then worked into a dodgy dossier—that fell apart even more quickly than the pre-Budget report did.

So let me ask the Chief Secretary now—I will happily give way to him—whether the Government are going to address the biggest gap in their credibility by publishing a comprehensive spending review or departmental spending allocations for 2011-12 and 2012-13 before the general election. Will the electorate be told how the Government plan to deliver the fiscal consolidation that they have set out in aggregate in this pre-Budget report and that they claim is the proof of their commitment to restoring fiscal discipline? Or will we have to guess?

Mr. Byrne: Let me deal with the hon. Gentleman's second point first. I have set out clearly in my presentation to the House this afternoon how we see £82 billion of deficit reduction taking place. Some £25 billion will come from growth measures and £57 billion from discretionary measures—tax will account for £19 billion of that and the rest will have to come from cuts and efficiencies in public spending. As he will recall from 1998, when comprehensive spending reviews were introduced, the whole point of them is about certainty; they are designed to give public service leaders and managers certainty about budgets for a period of three years. If a £4 billion or £5 billion margin of error remained because one cannot be clear about how fast unemployment will fall, that would be bigger than the budgets of four or five different Departments. If one cannot provide certainty about how much money is available, that defeats the object. We are happy to provide certainty, where that is possible. We know that the Conservative party is more than happy to provide four or five different positions on departmental budgets over the course of a day, but that is not an example that we wish to emulate.

Mr. Hammond: So, as I said, we are expected to believe that it is possible to be absolutely precise about the protected budgets but not about the budgets that will be sacrificed. In addition, I did not hear the Chief Secretary answer the question about the paper on 17 per cent. cuts. That is important because in terms of defence, a 17 per cent. cut is equivalent to more than the entire pay and pensions bill for all the armed forces or a staggering 150 new Chinook helicopters every year. In terms of transport, it represents the entire budget for London and the south-east: for trains, roads, bus subsidies and the tube. For the Ministry of Justice, a cut of 17 per cent. of the budget is the equivalent of 50,000 prison places—that is 60 per cent. of the UK's total gone. No wonder the Chancellor thinks that this is not a time for a spending review. The Chief Secretary may not like my examples, but if he will not spell out the consequences of his plans, it will fall to us to do so. The Government want the political gain of setting budgets in certain Departments without taking the political pain of recognising the consequences of that ring-fencing for other Departments. That is dishonest and disreputable, and it will ultimately backfire on them.

Derek Twigg: I regularly hear the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) saying to the press that he is being open and honest with the British people. In that context and spirit, can the hon. Gentleman tell us by what date he will want the deficit halved?

Mr. Hammond: We have made this point emphatically and repeatedly: we will make an earlier start than the Government have proposed to do and we will go further than they have proposed to do within the course of the next Parliament, as the Governor of the Bank of England has suggested. Exactly how far and how fast we go must, of course, depend on the economic circumstances and on the context of the monetary policy with which we find ourselves dealing.

Derek Twigg: With respect, the hon. Gentleman has just talked about clarity, openness and honesty, so, given that we have already said what we are going to do, when will the Conservatives have halved the deficit. What is his plan? Does he have no plan for the date by which it will be halved?

Mr. Hammond: What matters at the moment is what is going to happen immediately. We have made it very clear that we will start in 2010-11 to reduce public spending. The current Government have made it clear that they will continue to increase public spending in the face of all the evidence that they are taking unacceptable risks with the UK's credit rating, creditworthiness and reputation in the markets by doing so.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hammond: I have to make a little progress or there will not be any time left for the rest of the debate.

If the Chancellor was in any doubt about the market reaction after the pre-Budget report and the immediate reactions to it, he should be in absolutely no doubt now. The UK 10-year gilt spread against the German bund, which is the benchmark, has widened alarmingly since the pre-Budget report. In less than a month, there has been an 18 per cent. rise in the spread—up to 62 basis points—and a rise of one third of a per cent. in the cost of servicing our national debt. The Government now need to find £5 billion more in spending cuts to balance the books than they did on the day that the Chancellor stood up to deliver his pre-Budget report.

At the end of 2008, the cost of insuring UK gilts against default was twice as expensive as the cost of insuring McDonald's corporate debt. At the time, a Government spokesman said that there was "obviously something odd" going on in the credit default swap market. Perhaps it was not so obvious—a year later, credit default swaps on 10-year Government bonds still trade at a 70 per cent. premium compared with those on 10-year McDonald's bonds.

Nearly half the economists polled by the Financial Times in a new year study cited the fiscal crisis as a key threat to the economy. We have already heard about the statement from PIMCO. Not only does it expect a credit rating downgrade, which it says is more than 80 per cent. likely, but it has announced that it will reduce its holding of UK Government bonds during the coming year. There might be all sorts of reasons why PIMCO has chosen to reduce its holding of UK Government bonds, but even the Chief Secretary would have to concede that it is not particularly helpful at a time when a country needs to issue £200 billion of new bonds over the course of a year to have the world's biggest holder of Government bonds saying that it intends to reduce its holding of that Government's paper.

Mr. Jeremy Browne rose—

Mr. Pelling rose—

Mr. Philip Hammond: I shall give way one more time, then I must finish.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Will he clarify a point in his position that I do not understand? The Government say that they wish to halve the structural deficit by 2014. He says that he will have to take account of factors along the way. For example, growth might not be as strong as the Government anticipate, or there could be another recession—I hope that there is not, but there could be. There might be other unforeseen circumstances. Perhaps we will have additional military commitments, for example. Given that his position is that we must be flexible—I think that he is sensible to have that position—will he concede that it is possible that the Conservative party, were it to win the general election, would fail to reduce the structural deficit by half by 2014? In other words, the Conservatives might reduce it more slowly than the Government plan to reduce it.

Mr. Hammond: I would not presume to give the hon. Gentleman a lesson in economics, but it seems to me that the possibility of growth's being slower or faster will not affect the evolution of the structural deficit, although it might affect the cyclical deficit. The difference between us is that we have consistently talked about targets for reducing the structural deficit, which is what the Governor of the Bank of England has suggested, whereas the Government talk about the total deficit, not differentiating between the structural and cyclical deficits.

I have talked a great deal about markets and some hon. Members are inclined, I think, to take a view of "Markets be damned." However, when one needs to borrow £200 billion over the course of the coming year, one needs to listen to what the markets are saying. When borrowing capacity depends on one's credit rating—

Mr. Pelling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I am going to have to do so eventually, so I shall do it now.

Mr. Pelling: As the hon. Gentleman is surely going to be in charge of these issues in May, how will he approach the issue of the triple A rating? What will he be willing to sacrifice in the Budget to defend the triple A rating? Does he think that there are some things that he will definitely want to keep, even if the rating were to be downgraded to double A plus or double A1?

Mr. Hammond: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his vote of confidence. Of course, sending a signal to the markets that restores confidence is a delicate business. We are in a party political debate, but I think that everyone understands that it is very difficult for a Government, at this point in the cycle with the opinion polls where they are and with the Prime Minister insisting on his ridiculous dividing lines, to send reassuring signals to the market. The trick—the task for an incoming new Government—will be to reassure the markets sufficiently to finance the debt and keep interest rates low and to do the absolute minimum that is necessary to maintain interest rates at that level. That is a constant balancing act, which requires constant trimming and tacking.

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

Paul Farrelly: Will the hon. Gentleman give way one final time?

Mr. Hammond: No, I shall definitely make some progress.

I have talked about the markets, and it is important to say—this answers the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) earlier—that although market confidence matters for Governments, it also matters for our public services. We must not lose sight of that point. Next year, we will spend £44 billion on interest payments on the national debt. By 2013, that figure will have risen to £63.7 billion if interest rates stay as they are. But interest rates on British Government debt have already started to rise. By 2013, for every extra 1 per cent. of interest cost that we face, another £14 billion of public spending cuts will be needed to finance it. We are already spending more than the schools budget on debt interest, and by 2013 we will be spending double that budget on debt interest. Britain plc has a huge vested interest in maintaining low interest rates and in maintaining the credit rating to support them.

This all matters to ordinary people, too—to home owners, families and businesses. Many people who faced this recession fearing that they would lose their homes and their jobs have been bailed out by the Bank of England's prompt action in reducing short-term interest rates to the lowest possible level and pumping liquidity into the economy. It is low interest rates that have kept Britain going through this recession, not the Chancellor's much-vaunted fiscal stimulus.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hammond: I shall in a moment, because the hon. Lady has not intervened before. However, let me make a bit more progress.

Low interest rates must sustain the economic recovery, allowing businesses to invest and to create jobs and allowing home owners to refinance mortgages at affordable costs. Anyone whose interest in the economy is focused on a horizon that stretches further than the next five months can see the huge risks that the Government are taking with Britain's future.

Ms Keeble: The hon. Gentleman has been very fond of quoting the Treasury Committee's report. Will he acknowledge that the report attributes in substantial part the fact that unemployment is lower than one would otherwise have expected and that repossession rates have been lower than would normally have been expected precisely to the Government's intervention?

Mr. Hammond: No. That is absolutely wrong—

Ms Keeble: That is what the report said.

Mr. Hammond: The facts are right, but that has happened precisely because of the intervention that has been made by the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England in lowering interest rates very rapidly to unprecedentedly low levels and in keeping them there. I look forward to hearing what the Chairman of the Select Committee has to say on that in due course.

Paul Farrelly: I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point on interest rates, and he will appreciate that point because the Conservatives have made major mistakes on interest rates—during the 1990s, for example. Does he accept that his answers to interventions from Members from all parties have been rather simplistic and old-fashioned in reflecting the monetarist versus Keynesian arguments of the past? I am sure that a respected former economist from Shell might have something to say on that very shortly.

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the implication of what he says is that any fiscal stimulus or any measures that the Government have taken to help the economy are not only not worth while but counter-productive, and that the Conservatives would therefore not have undertaken them? Is that his position? Is it also his position that they will protect health and overseas aid—that they will have their cake and eat it—without spelling out what departmental cuts they will make under a Conservative Government?

Mr. Hammond: The hon. Gentleman will recall that it was the leader of my party who first told the public that cuts would be required—six months before the Prime Minister was finally dragged kicking and screaming to that admission. It was our party that first started to spell out specific cuts that would have to be made—

Paul Farrelly indicated dissent.

Mr. Hammond: For the hon. Gentleman to shake his head is simply disingenuous.

On the big test of the PBR—that is, the restoration of economic and fiscal credibility—it was a resounding failure. Markets were dismayed, the deputy Prime Minister was incandescent and it was not much of a crowd pleaser either. I shall spare the House the list of quotations from various newspapers on the day following the PBR. It is astonishing that the Chancellor not only failed to begin the process of cutting spending but announced a further increase in public spending and financed it by slapping an extra tax on everybody who earns more than £20,000 a year by raising employee national insurance contributions. They will now go up by a total of 1 per cent., costing someone on £30,000 an extra £200 a year and someone on average earnings an extra £60 a year.

There is a similar burden on employers at a time when we are trying to create jobs. The Institute for Fiscal Studies has made the obvious point that employee and employer NICs are the same tax. Both are incidental on wages, so anyone who earns £14,000 or more a year will be hit by Labour's double tax whammy on employer and employee NICs. The Prime Minister is determined to fight the coming election on a class war battlefield, but it seems rather strange to start by feeding the Chancellor's spending addiction with a tax that impacts on the millions of decent, hard-working people in this country who earn £14,000, £15,000 or £20,000 a year. If we win the general election, our No. 1 priority will be to try to avoid Labour's new national insurance tax increases on the many.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that many of the couple of hundred thousand—no doubt, young—people who are now unable to get part-time employment will be students who use part-time employment to fund themselves through university? Does he agree that the worst hit will be low-income students who have to do such work because it is the only way that they can afford to get their degree?

Mr. Hammond: I am sure that my hon. Friend is absolutely right. She has identified just one of the many groups who will be hit by this Labour tax on the many.

There were a couple of other noteworthy points in the PBR. A Labour PBR would not be complete without some spectacularly unjustified rhetorical flourish and some sleight of hand that comes out only when we analyse the small print—and we did, indeed, get both. Some hon. Members, perhaps on both sides of the House, have not recovered from their mirth at the Chancellor's assertion that he was taking these decisions from a position of strength. There was a sleight of hand: an unannounced reduction in the NHS budget, which was caused by the £446 million that the Treasury will claw back from the national insurance tax hike. That means that Britain's biggest employer faces a real-terms budget cut rather than the maintenance in real terms that the Chancellor announced.

There was also a shockingly cynical pre-election bribe. We have got used to some of those. The Chancellor said in his pre-Budget report speech that there would be above-inflation increases for benefits, including disability living allowance and child benefit, but it later transpired, when the IFS started crunching numbers, that the Government's published plans include a 1.5 per cent. real-terms cut in benefits in 2011. The Prime Minister could not bring himself to be any more honest about that cut than he has been about others. The following day, he was reported on Sky News to have denied the charge by claiming:

> "Benefits will continue to go up".

If the Chief Secretary wants to put the record straight and confirm that benefits will continue to go up in 2011, I would be happy to take an intervention from him. Some of my hon. Friends might remember the council tax rebate for pensioners in the Budget of 2005, which was, surprisingly, discontinued in the Budget of 2006.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I look forward to responding to his points at more length later. On the benefit increases that he has just mentioned, what has happened is that increases have been brought forward. There will be no reduction subsequently. That is quite wrong.

Mr. Hammond: I see. So, increases have been brought forward. That means that benefits will go up this year and go down again next year, so that is not a reduction. I will remember that for the future.

This pre-Budget report is the dying gasp of a weak, divided and incompetent Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Here we go."] Yes, here we do go. This is a Government led by a Prime Minister who has betrayed the office he holds by blocking the tough action to deal with the deficit that the Treasury has advised is necessary. He is placing the prosperity of millions of British people in jeopardy for the sake of his wretched dividing lines, and he is gambling on their jobs to try to save his own. There will be £789 billion-worth of extra borrowing over the next six years, doubling the national debt again to nearly £1.5 trillion. There is no credible plan for dealing with the deficit, no honesty on spending and certainly no spending review. There will be a higher deficit in 2013-14, as a percentage of gross domestic product, than when Denis Healey went to the International Monetary Fund.

As Labour is too weak to take the action necessary to tackle the deficit, it has had to admit in the PBR that a Labour victory in the general election would mean, as has already been announced, an extra £7.8 billion-worth of taxes, which is £370 per family. The vast majority of that money will come from the national insurance tax increase, which will affect everyone who earns more than £14,000. It would also mean a further £30 billion-worth of tax increases, which are shown in the figures but unexplained. That is another £925 per family being hidden from view until after the election.

Despite the Government's best efforts at obfuscation, this PBR has made crystal clear the reward that the people of Britain would get if they were to re-elect this Government: higher taxes and higher interest rates. The PBR is an admission of surrender; it is the capitulation of new Labour. Labour is abandoning any pretence of being serious about restoring the public finances to health and getting Britain back on the road to prosperity. It is abandoning all those who are working, striving and saving for a better future for themselves and their children. It is retreating to its core support and turning its back on aspiration. It is failing the country in its hour of economic need. If the Prime Minister does not have the courage or the competence to deliver the change that Britain needs, let him at least do the decent thing and call an election at the earliest opportunity and let somebody else try to undo the damage that this wretched Government are doing to Britain's credibility and creditworthiness, before it is too late.

2.16 pm

John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I strongly welcome the Government's decision to accept the Treasury Committee's recommendation to hold a full day's debate on the pre-Budget report. That is an important step in parliamentary scrutiny of public finances. In that respect, I thank the staff of the Treasury Committee. We took evidence from the Chancellor, his officials and experts in the last week before the Christmas recess, and work was done to write the report during the Christmas recess. The report was agreed only on Tuesday and printed on Wednesday. I thank both the staff and my colleagues on the Committee for that.

The main issue that we considered was the macro-economy, which is best described by the word "uncertainty". Uncertainty is certainly present in the economy, whether in bank lending, the future path of unemployment or even GDP growth. We noticed that that is causing some businesses to delay making important decisions that could benefit the economy, such as investing and hiring staff. Mention has been made of the scepticism among some economists about the 2011-12 growth forecast, given the considerable degree of uncertainty. It is therefore critical that the Treasury should provide more quantitative information on the risks in relation to its forecasts, especially on economic output.

[John McFall]

As has been mentioned, there has been some good news. Unemployment has been substantially lower than was expected for such a severe recession, and there have been fewer repossessions than expected. Business insolvencies are also far lower than would have been expected in previous recessions, and the recent manufacturing statistics show promise. Much of that is due to the Government's policy of supporting households and businesses through the recession with fiscal measures. It is obvious that the fiscal input has worked in such cases; without them, the recession would most certainly have become a depression.

However, we must be vigilant about a further weakening in the labour market. As we feared, young people in particular have been hit by the recession. In November, youth unemployment in the UK reached a record high of 943,000, or 19.8 per cent. So, I welcome the Government's measures to support youth employment, but I urge them to do more to ensure that young people who are unemployed have the opportunity to get into the labour market, because statistics show that if young people are unemployed for a considerable time, their life chances are impaired as a result.

House prices have also settled, but at a historically high loan-to-income ratio that may be unsustainable, especially if monetary policy eventually tightens. The concern over repossessions means that the Government must remove support in this area very carefully. The Committee urges them to report in this year's Budget on the housing market's sensitivity to future fluctuations in employment and interests rates.

As we have known for quite a long time, bank lending, sadly, remains uncertain. As a Committee, we do not want a return to easy credit, but neither do we want the economy to be crippled by a lack of access to credit. That is particularly important for those businesses that still cite the lack of finance as their most pressing problem. I still receive communications on a regular basis from businesses telling me about their difficulties with the banks in that respect. There is a danger, therefore, that bank lending may not support recovery in the private sector, and the Treasury has assured the Committee that it will remain vigilant in this regard.

The Government have put in place measures to improve businesses' access to finance, and that is commendable. However, I would like future measures to be aimed at encouraging non-bank sources of finance for businesses, and especially for small and medium-sized ones, so that they are not so dependent on the banking sector in the future.

Adam Posen, a recent member of the Monetary Policy Committee, appeared before the Treasury Committee and said that the UK lacked a spare tyre for when the banking sector goes into crisis—a lack that means that any future recovery will be threatened. Posen compared the UK to Japan, saying:

> "The closer one looks, the more worrisome this specific parallel becomes", due to the concentration of banking in a few large firms, and the comparative lack of non-bank sources of finance for companies. The UK's banking structure, he said,

> "could impede the return of trend growth in the UK to its previous rate, and…could if things worsen put on persistent deflationary pressure", as the ongoing banking structural problems did in Japan.

Economies with up-to-date banking systems, or which have alternatives to bank lending, are the ones that recover faster and stronger. The need to reform our banking system is hugely important. We cannot continue with just five or six big companies: that spare tyre is needed, and it is needed urgently.

Going forward, we need to rebalance the economy away from consumption. Before the crisis, there was a steady decline in the household saving ratio, from over 14 per cent. in 1981 to zero in 2007. The recent bounce in the saving ratio up to 8.6 per cent. must be maintained if we are to have a strong economic recovery. Increasing household saving may not be achieved through macro-economic policy alone. I believe that we will need to widen access to savings products, and introduce new products appropriate for groups who were not targeted before.

The Treasury Committee has welcomed a number of Government measures in this area, such as the Saving Gateway, and I hope that further measures will be brought forward. I well remember the report that we published in 2004-05 on restoring confidence in long-term savings, in which we said that savings was a middle-class industry. A lot of people do not have access to savings and are not being encouraged to save, and that is an issue for the Government to take up.

On the public finances, there is a fine judgment to be made over fiscal consolidation, especially given the macro-economic uncertainty. The Committee said that withdrawing fiscal support too early could plunge the country back into recession, with dire consequences for growth and employment that would cost the Exchequer more in the long run.

The Governor of the Bank of England told the Committee that we needed to act "at the right time" but, as we all know, there is no consensus on what the right time for fiscal consolidation is. The Committee pored over that very question, but more clarity will be required to achieve that consensus.

Ms Keeble: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, when the Committee considered the scale and speed of fiscal consolidation, all the experts from whom we took evidence agreed that faster or deeper fiscal tightening would hit support for pensioners? Would that not be the unacceptable price of tighter spending cuts?

John McFall: I do recall that being mentioned, but I also recall that youth unemployment was mentioned as well. Like the pensioners, that is a really big issue for us.

The Treasury Committee also felt that the PBR did not provide enough information on how the structural deficit will be reduced. Because of that, we believe that the Government must bring forward a clearer and detailed plan. As has been mentioned, that should happen sooner rather than later, and this issue certainly needs to be tackled after the next election. We also feel that the Treasury could provide more quantitative information on the public finances. As the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury has said,

> "there is a sense that the Treasury are using uncertainty to suit themselves."

The PBR gives some forecasts to as far ahead as 2015, and illustrative projections to as far ahead as 2018, despite any worries about uncertainty. It could therefore be considered arbitrary that the Treasury fails to produce projections of future expenditure, or at least of the split between departmental expenditure limits and annually managed expenditure.

The Treasury must also provide more quantitative information on the risks around its forecasts for the public finances, given the degree of uncertainty surrounding them. We realise that the Fiscal Responsibility Bill will tie the Government into a fixed time scale for managing the deficit. The fact that that will require close parliamentary monitoring makes transparency all the more important.

The Committee notes the risk, however small, of another uncovered gilt auction and yields rising. Quantitative easing is slowing, and there will still be large gilt auctions in 2010-11. However, we also note the methods now employed by the Government to reduce the risk of uncovered auctions, and welcome the fact that there have been no further uncovered auctions since our Budget 2009 report.

The Treasury Committee report, like many earlier reports, also mentions child poverty. As a Committee, we remain convinced of the continued importance of the commitment to eradicating child poverty, despite the difficult economic circumstances.

Given the recent slow-down in progress on the child poverty targets, and the likelihood that this year's target will be missed, it is vital that the Government set out a credible plan to tackle child poverty, going forward. It is vital that the Government set out the steps that they propose to take to achieve the 2010 target, and to achieve the elimination of child poverty by 2020—a very bold but also a very proud manifesto commitment in 1997.

I turn now to the question of the bank payroll tax. The Treasury Committee has been at the forefront in calling for change in the culture of banking, but estimates suggest that the Treasury now expects to receive about £3 billion or £4 billion from the tax when it originally expected only £500 million. That shows that the banking culture has not changed—that banks have simply gone ahead and paid out the bonuses. That is hugely important, because there is public anger about this matter. People are not fooled, and they realise the extent of the bank bail-out. I made that point yesterday to the Economy, Energy and Tourism Committee of the Scottish Parliament, when I was giving evidence to its inquiry. It is important that we remind ourselves of that.

The Treasury purchased £37 billion of shares in RBS and the Lloyds Banking Group; it gave indemnity to the Bank of England for £200 billion of quantitative easing; it has also agreed to guarantee up to £250 billion of wholesale borrowing by banks; it provided about £40 billion of loans and other funding to Bradford & Bingley and the Financial Services Compensation Scheme; and it insured banks' assets to the tune of £280 billion. The National Audit Office, in a recent report, suggested that the net cash outlay for the purchase of shares in banks and the lending to Northern Rock will be about £117 billion, with a gross outlay of £131 billion. As a result, the Government's commitment to banks is 60 per cent. of GDP, and the value of that is 83 billion working days. The consequences for the UK are stark, but so are the consequences for the world. The International Monetary Fund says that 10 per cent. of global GDP will be lost for ever as a result of the banking crisis.

The banking crisis, which prompted the financial crisis, is at best halfway over. The IMF estimates the total non-performing assets in the world to be worth $3.4 trillion, of which only $1.7 trillion has been written down. So a second bank bail-out will not be tolerated in the United Kingdom or in other European countries. I have visited Germany, Austria and Belgium in the past few weeks, and I got that message. It will also not be tolerated in the United States, which I visited, too. Now is the time to fix the banking system, and I think that we have four to five years to change the financial architecture. That is why the Treasury Committee announced a few weeks ago that it would be undertaking an exercise on the "too big to fail" issue, which seemed to be brushed under the carpet last March, but has since been revived.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman is making a powerful point about the action that would need to be taken either to reduce the size of banks or to ensure that they were not too big to fail. Why does he think that, despite his Committee's report last year, his many comments and his input over the past year, the Government have not taken any action to deal with the issue that he highlights?

John McFall: The Government have taken some action, but the issue is complex nationally and internationally. We see that from the tax on bank bonuses, whereby we have had a kick-back from the City, because some companies have said that they want to relocate. However, there is an international dimension, too. Given that we exist in a globalised world, we need to fix the matter globally, and that is a very difficult job. Like the Treasury Committee, others have taken to the stage and commented for a considerable period.

For example, the Governor of the Bank of England, who has appeared before our Committee, has been explicit on the issue. When we visited America, we met Paul Volcker, a former chairman of the Federal Reserve, who said that there was an issue that needed to be tackled. Indeed, he went further than any of us by saying that he wanted sound evidence from the banking sector that any financial innovation in the past 20 years had led to economic growth. The only financial innovation for which he gives the banking system credit is the ATM. There is deep scepticism.

Nicholas Brady, a former US Treasury Secretary under Ronald Reagan, had an article in the Financial Times this week, in which he said explicitly that the "banking system is unsound." Core reforms are essential if we are to provide the system with safety and soundness. People want safe deposits. One of the hardest questions that I asked the bank chief executives when they appeared before the Committee was, "Do you agree with the 'Oxford English Dictionary' definition of a bank, which is an institution for the safe keeping of people's money? If you do, you have screwed up." That is the issue: the consumer wants trust and confidence in the banking system to be restored.

Adam Afriyie: My point was, given everything that the right hon. Gentleman says, which people widely recognise, the Government are responsible for ensuring that the banking system works better than he describes. My question was simply: why have the Government not taken action in that area over the past 12 or 13 years?

John McFall: I am saying that the Government have taken some action in that area. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, who sits on the Conservative Benches, believes in markets and free markets, but does he want Governments interfering in every single decision? I do not think that he does, so philosophically he will have to come to terms with the issue.

It has been proved that there is now no such thing as a free market, particularly in the banking sector. The Governor of the Bank of England came before the Committee and made this very point. It is a one-way bet for the banking system: if people do well, they get big rewards; if they do badly, they get big rewards. The Government need to go further on the issue of incentives in the banking system, because the incentive structure has distorted the long-term health of the banking institutions. People have had short-term returns but long-term instability. That is why we have joined all these eminent people such as Mervyn King, Paul Volcker and Nicholas Brady; no doubt I will add the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) to that list next time I speak on this issue.

Mr. Leigh: The truth is that nothing would militate more against recovery than for the Government to try to interfere in the banking system. However incompetent banks have been, that would be nothing to the levels of gross incompetence that would accrue were Governments to get involved in banking.

John McFall: The hon. Gentleman should take his colleague, the hon. Member for Windsor, for a quiet tutorial and make that point to him. The banking community has been absent from this debate; people have put their heads under the radar. If they do not want inappropriate legislation and heavy regulation, they will have to engage in this issue and ensure that we get a system that works—that we go back to a market system that operates in the interests of everyone in society. If the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) can join me in calling for that, I will be very pleased for him to do so.

Volatility and instability are at the core of the financial system at the moment. That is why the Treasury Committee has set up this inquiry. We are not saying that we should go back to the United States Banking Act of 1933 in its purest form; we are asking how we can make the system more stable and less volatile, and ensure that trust and confidence in the system is restored and that banks act in their own interests and those of their shareholders, the public, their customers, and society as a whole.

One aspect that has been missing from this debate is the public—the debate has been between the City and the political community. That is why, along with my colleagues, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), we have established the Future of Banking Commission, which has been supported by Which? and eminent economists such as Roger Bootle, John Kay and others. That is intended to give the public a voice so that their interests are looked after and safeguarded and we end up with an appropriate banking system that serves the interests of society—nothing less than that. Only by ensuring that that happens will we restore the trust and confidence in the system that we all desire.

2.38 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): We have had two debates on the economy this week. I judged, wrongly, that this would be the centre of attention, but the Chancellor and the shadow Chancellor clearly took a different view. Nevertheless, I persist in my belief that this is an important debate, for several reasons. First, it centres on the pre-Budget report, which was a very important event, however we judge it. As the Chairman of the Treasury Committee pointed out, the debate represents an advance, albeit a small one, in parliamentary accountability, because it represents an acceptance that the PBR should be subject to debate. Moreover, we now have access to the Treasury Committee's review of the PBR, which we did not have on Tuesday. There is therefore a lot to discuss today that we were unable to discuss properly then.

I want to say something about the deficit and the controversies surrounding it; something about the issue that dominated the PBR but has now largely been forgotten—the banking tax, and what has happened to it; and something about the long term, because we are very preoccupied with the short-term fiscal position. There was an interesting half one-liner in the PBR about the creation of an infrastructure bank and a vision of how the economy could develop in the very long term, and we need to refocus some of our attention on long-term structural issues.

I start with the deficit. This debate has been a good deal less emotional than bits of the one that I heard on Tuesday, in which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) among others proclaimed that the fiscal crisis was comparable to the crisis in 1940. Other speeches were at a similar level of emotion. Today everybody has been a little bit calmer, but we clearly have a serious problem and it is helpful to start by stating what the deficit problem is.

There are two linked problems: a deficit or borrowing problem and a debt problem—a cash-flow problem and a balance sheet problem. The problem of debt and the balance sheet is clearly serious, because the situation is deteriorating rapidly. However, as is often pointed out from various parts of the House, as things stand the level of British public debt in relation to the economy is actually one of the lowest in the developed world and much lower than at various periods historically.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cable: Perhaps I can anticipate the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I know he believes that there is a measurement problem, and that if we measured public debt differently, we would come up with much higher figures. I am merely citing the international conventions of the OECD and the International Monetary Fund; he might have something to add.

Mr. Cash: The figures on which I rely are from the Office for National Statistics, and indeed the researchers in the House of Commons Library have confirmed them. They illustrate the point that I, my right hon.

Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) have made that the figure is not £850 billion, as is suggested. The true figure, which I believe is now endorsed by our Front Benchers—it certainly appears to be—is nearer £3 trillion, and maybe more. If the measurement is out by a factor of three or four, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that that underlines all the difficulties about what the deficit is and what the definition of net debt should be?

Dr. Cable: I am sure it does but, equally, other developed countries have the same problem of incorporating public sector pensions. However, I accept the hon. Gentleman's broad point that there is clearly a problem. A more acute one is the borrowing problem. Some 13 to 14 per cent. of GDP is currently being borrowed, and it is being done in a very artificial way because the Government are buying up their own debt in the current strange monetary circumstances. The level of borrowing is unprecedented, I believe, and it is the highest in the developed world except possibly the United States, which is in the rather different position of being able to borrow in its own currency. There is a serious cash-flow problem, which we must take seriously and which is at the heart of the debate.

Two policy issues come out of that problem, both of which have been touched on. There is the historical problem of how we got into this situation and who is to blame, and the forward-looking problem of what we do next and how we manage what we all accept to be a difficult balance. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) summarised in numbers how we got here and why we have our public financing problem. Roughly a quarter of the problem is accounted for by the cycle, the ups and downs of the economy and the recession, and three quarters is structural. The problem is that the word "structural" is bandied around, but it is never terribly clear what people actually mean when they use it.

I know that the Conservative argument has always been that the structural problem is the "hole in the roof" showing the neglect of the budget over many years. That argument is partly true, but the problem with it is that the hole in the roof was actually quite small. I have been doing this job for five or six years now, and I remember debating the matter with the predecessors of the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and the former Member for Arundel and South Downs, who had an unfortunate slip-up at the last general election. When we talked about the structural deficit then, we were talking about roughly 1 per cent. of GDP. Now we are talking about something rather different—an over-dependence of the economy on the banking sector and to some extent on the ups and downs of the housing market as a source of revenue. It is quite right that we now talk about how to adjust the level of public spending down to one that relates to stable sources of revenue. That is what we mean by the structural debate.

In the wider context, it is a little disappointing that although we are talking about that very real problem, which we have to face, there is little discussion of how we can make the British economy much less dependent on banking in the long term. The Chairman of the Treasury Committee touched on this, but it is a fact that in the British economy, the balance sheets of the banks together account for about four times gross domestic product, which is about four times as large as in France or Germany, and much more than in the United States. We cannot sustain that position and it must be changed. Equally, our economy has become highly over-dependent on people's belief that property prices rise and rise, which we also need to address. That is the real structural debate, but we are not having it.

On the background and the history, it is certainly true that the bulk of the problem we are now dealing with is structural rather than to do with the cycle of recession. It is almost unique to Britain and it is not shared by the US and other countries. That takes us to what we do next and how we manage the situation. I was struck that in the more temperate passages of the speeches from the Government and Conservative Front Benchers, there was an acknowledgement that that is a very tricky balancing act.

It is certainly true that unless action is taken quickly, or at least unless action is seen to be taken quickly, there is a real risk of a sovereign debt crisis, with all the consequences that that brings—higher interest rates and the downgrading of credit worthiness, which is a real issue, not just a hypothetical one. On the other hand, we must balance that against the fact that precipitant action before private consumption and private investment get going risks aggravating and prolonging the recession, which in turn would make the public financing problem even worse. Getting that balance right is incredibly difficult, and nobody should pretend that there is any simple dogma that gives the correct solution.

The Government and Conservative Front Benchers quoted economists on various sides of the argument. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge cited the Financial Times survey of 80 economists that was taken over the new year period. The result was rather predictable: they were roughly divided 50:50 on what we do about the problem. Some were predictably in the half who argued that we should just get on with the job and start slashing the deficit—it included Professor Patrick Minford and Ruth Lea, and Philip Booth of the Institute of Economic Affairs, who have an ideological dislike of the public sector. However, it is fair to say that that half also included sensible, balanced people, of no obvious ideological inclination, who believe, for perfectly good economic reasons, that we must get on with the job.

The other half, who were equally reputable, interesting and varied, said, "Actually, we have got to be very careful, and it would be rather foolish to embark on big cuts in public spending before 2011." It is worth while going through some of the names in that half: David Blanchflower and Sushil Wadhwani, former members of the Monetary Policy Committee; Julian Le Grand of the London School of Economics; George Magnus of the UBS bank; Sir Samuel Brittan; John Philpott of the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development; Andrew Hilton of the Centre for the Study of Financial Innovation; and Peter Spencer of the Ernst and Young ITEM Club. I have no idea of the politics of many of those people, but they are all arguing on good economic grounds that it would be dangerous to embark too rapidly on slashing public spending. The argument is therefore finely balanced.

[Dr. Cable]

It is worth looking at what Ian McCafferty, the chief economist of the CBI, who is taken very seriously, says. He has probably got the balance about right. He said:

> "Whoever wins the next general election, fiscal consolidation is unlikely to start much before 2011. The exact starting point is less important than the credibility of the medium term plan, which requires…a clear direction of travel and sufficient detail on quite how the headline borrowing targets will be achieved."

That summarises what the central issue is and takes us to the Treasury Committee report.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman is making an excellent speech, but I think it would be useful at this point in the debate, since we have heard from Government and official Opposition Front Benchers on this subject, to ask him whether in his judgment the reduction in the deficit in the first year of the Government's plan should be faster, or whether the Government have broadly judged it right?

Dr. Cable: I do not think we should rush into rapid cuts. One of my areas of disagreement with the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge is that I do not think there is a strong case for that. It is a difficult issue and there is a balance to be struck, but rushing into expenditure cuts in 2010-11 would carry a greater risk of precipitating deeper recession. My party takes the view that the Government's eight-year plan, with a four-year halving of the deficit, is a reasonable starting point. My judgment is that we will probably discover that it is not enough, but we have to start somewhere, and it is a reasonable working assumption.

Stewart Hosie: I agree that precipitate cuts would be foolish and weaken the ability of the economy to recover. What does the hon. Gentleman make of the Government's already announced £800 million cut to the Scottish budget, which will start in the spring of 2010? Those cuts are already under way. Does he think they should be overturned or some other course of action taken?

Dr. Cable: I do not think that Scotland is fundamentally different from the rest of the UK. We all face the same problem and we are all experiencing the beginning of cuts. For example, I am meeting the Minister for Science and Innovation in a few days' time about the impact of cuts in that sphere. We cannot have an indiscriminate approach to public spending reduction, and my argument is not that the cuts should not happen, in Scotland or anywhere else, but that they have to be much more carefully thought through and targeted. That is the approach that I would adopt.

The Select Committee's report, although expressed guardedly as it represents a cross-party consensus, contains some serious implied criticisms of the pre-Budget report, which take two forms. The first is the acknowledgement that the Government have been nowhere near detailed enough in spelling out how they will approach future cuts in spending. The key conclusion reads:

> "However we note that although the Treasury believe the Pre-Budget Report contains sufficient detail about the way in which the structural deficit would be reduced, our expert witnesses all criticised the document for not providing enough information about how this will be achieved."

The Committee does not say that it agrees with the expert witnesses, but that is implied.

The second criticism is of excessive optimism about economic growth in the future. The report states:

> "There is, however, considerable scepticism among economists around the Government's growth forecasts for 2011-12."

That is a hedged-around comment, but its drift is clear. The criticisms have been made and need to be taken seriously. I would add the additional, and most serious, criticism that the Government have mobilised to raise taxes—£113.5 billion over four years—but instead of using that money to consolidate the budget, as they will surely have to do as they themselves acknowledge, they have committed it to additional spending. That is surely wrong and has sent all the wrong signals.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman will accept that a judgment has been made about the right level of deficit in the next financial year when the economy will still be growing at a rate below trend. In the subsequent year, there will be a sharp fiscal tightening, but that will be at a time when the economy will be growing at above trend. There is an element of judgment involved, and the Government have made a decision about the right level of deficit commensurate with the forecast level of growth in the economy.

Dr. Cable: I am sure that that is right: the extent and timing of the fiscal contraction have to reflect the state of the economy. I have suggested five tests that might be used to ensure that, one of which is—obviously—the rate of growth. Another is the growth of unemployment. Another one has to be the state of the borrowing markets.

I hope that the Government are right about the expectations of economic growth. I hope for rapid economic growth because hundreds of thousands of people's jobs hinge on it, but one has to be realistic: an awful lot of factors are holding back growth, and are likely still to be doing so in a year. Private consumers are unlikely to embark on another spending splurge when they are heavily in debt. We have an underlying problem that British consumer debt in relation to the economy is the largest in the developed world, and certainly the largest in our history for a very long period. It would be surprising—and probably unwise, in many cases—were people to rush out and start spending.

Private sector business investment is unlikely to take off rapidly. There is an enormous amount of spare capacity, but as the Chairman of the Treasury Committee just reminded us, there is a severe credit squeeze. That will be even more the case once we enter a period of expansion, because the banks are over-reacting to the crisis and not lending to sound British companies. We will not get any growth from public spending, whether consumption or investment. The entire expectation of economic growth rests on exports, but actually they are a relatively small part of the British economy. It will require a near miracle to achieve the kind of growth for which the Government, and indeed all of us, hope. Frankly, we have to be realistic about that.

I want to comment on two other aspects of the PBR that have not today received the attention they probably should have done. One is the Government's tax on bank bonuses, which was put together in a hurry. Given that it is a fairly short-term tax, I hope that, in the conclusion to the debate, the Chief Secretary or his colleague, having had a month's reflection, can summarise what, in their judgment, has been the impact of the tax. Furthermore, how are they meeting some of the criticisms that have been thrown at the tax, of which there have been several? The first was advanced from the Liberal Democrat Benches. We were very sceptical about the ability of the tax to capture bank bonuses because of the numerous opportunities for potential avoidance, through multiple payments of bonuses, payments in salary and payments in kind, and it would be useful to have an assessment of how far the Government think they have plugged those various potential holes.

Secondly, the Government themselves argued that the main purpose of the tax was to change the behaviour of the banks, to discourage them from paying out bonuses and to encourage them to build up their capital reserves. Are the Government in a position to estimate how much capital reserves will be changed—improved, from the Government's standpoint—as a result of the measure? It was all done in a hurry and we did not get much analysis at the time. Can the Government now tell us what they think?

Thirdly, we are being told by the banks themselves, rightly or wrongly, that they are all now stumping up the money, that they are paying it and that the Government will receive a lot more than £500 million. What is the current estimate of the amount of money that will be raised? Finally, over the holiday period, we heard many rumours and much speculation about banks running off to Switzerland and other places because they object to paying this high tax and other things. I suspect that much of that is rhetoric and an attempt to blackmail the Government.

Mr. Leigh: While we are on the subject of high salaries, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the public sector must set an example? There is understandable public anger about the fact that 50 people who work for Transport for London earn more than the Prime Minister and that 50 people who work for the BBC earn more than the Prime Minister. Would he support any proposal that would limit salaries in the public sector to what the Prime Minister earns?

Dr. Cable: Indeed, I think I was the first person to advocate that, and I am certainly willing to go along with other people who say the same thing. Our view on the public sector pay freeze that came in was that it should perhaps have been more progressive and there should have been a fixed cash award for everybody, rather than a percentage increase. However, I take the point that the public sector has to show similar discipline.

Mr. Pelling: When considering the performance of the banks, is it also important to focus on how the additional liquidity provided by the authorities can be used most effectively? There are issues and dangers of a return to the high-risk culture that drove the banks before in terms of performance. I unders[illegible] the Department for Business, Innovation a[illegible] summoned many senior bankers to discuss that very issue.

Dr. Cable: Yes, although I think the hon. Gentleman is making several different points. The short-term intervention in the form of the bank tax must not obscure the much bigger issue of how bank bonuses will be regulated in future in such a way that banks do not take excessive risks. That is the important long-term question. However, I would like to ask a final question about the bank tax. In view of what appears to be its rather greater success in raising revenue than some of us predicted, do the Government now intend the tax to be a permanent feature or, as was implied at the time, does it merely cover the period up to the end of March this financial year?

My final point relates to a small detail in the PBR, but none the less an important one in the long term, which is the concept of an infrastructure bank. We must not constantly be sucked into negative thinking about cuts in the short run, overlooking the problem of how we create a more viable and balanced economy in the longer term. Several serious people—not just in the engineering industry, but in the insurance industry—have surfaced in the past few weeks to indicate that this area represents both a big challenge and a big opportunity. The chief executive of Legal and General, for example, has pointed out that he has hundreds of billions of pounds sitting in his institution in annuity funds, much of which is currently going into buying American corporate bonds. He has asked, "Why can't I put this money into British infrastructure?", to build railways, barrages or other forms of useful infrastructure on a commercial basis, albeit with some Government pump-priming.

Although the Government's proposal is modest—there is a suggestion of a co-ordinating body in the Treasury—I wonder whether the Financial Secretary could set out in his conclusion to this debate how they envisage what seems to me a constructive and sensible idea evolving in future years. What scale of operation are we thinking about? What might the Government's role be financially? The insurance companies are not asking for guarantees; they are asking for Government equity in any funding. How can that be done on a sufficiently large scale to make a difference and help to create a more balanced economy?

Mr. Cash: In the light of the disaster that we have just experienced on the economic front with the banks, just as we did in the 1850s, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that his line of reasoning perhaps leads to the idea of companies similar to the water, gas, electricity and even railway companies of the 19th century, which were supported by debenture stock, so that the elements of loan that he has mentioned are in place, but focused on companies that are not exclusively under Government control?

Dr. Cable: That is exactly the idea being promoted. The problem that we start from is that it is not now possible to envisage making large-scale investments in British infrastructure. The banks will not do it, because they are de-leveraging, and the stock markets will not do it, because of their short-term perspective in most cases, while private equity companies are worried about over-borrowing. The only mechanisms are likely to be what we now think of as new ideas, but which have a precedent in the 19th century, as the hon. Gentleman said. It would be interesting to see how far that idea can be pursued.

With that, I would like to listen to the remainder of the debate.

3.3 pm

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): Once again, the Tory party appears to be in full swing in its campaign to convince the people of this country that the only function of Government after the forthcoming general election will be to cut public investment to reduce the current deficit. Needless to say, the Tories have been backed up in that by their friends in the news media and their friends in the finance industry, whose bail-out caused most of the problems in the first place. The deficit needs to be reduced. However, it should not be allowed to take priority over the continuing duties of Government to ensure that the people of this country have jobs and homes, schools and hospitals, pensions and policing, and transport and other local services at home, and peace and security abroad. However, this debate is substantially about the deficit, so I shall concentrate on that.

[Frank Dobson]

There were three main causes of the present financial crisis. The first was the need to find the money to bail out and prop up the banking system. I would remind the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) that most of those people whom he has described as wise and wonderful and able to prognosticate the future would not have a job if the taxpayer had not bailed out their businesses and propped them up to prevent them from collapsing.

Mr. Philip Hammond: Just for clarification, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman that not one penny of the deficit projected for the coming year will be used for direct financing support for the banks? The money that the Government have put into the banks is of course cash, but it does not form part of the revenue deficit that the Government face.

Frank Dobson: I do not think that we needed that explanation, and I did actually understand it.

The second cause of the crisis was the cost of the measures to counter the recession that the banking crisis has brought about. The third was the loss of tax income that resulted from the recession, which was caused by the bankers. So it all goes back to the bankers. This is all the inevitable result of the worldwide banking crisis, and it is no use the Tories and their friends, or the bankers and their apologists, trying to blame this Government in general or the Prime Minister in particular. It is also true to say that, at almost every stage in this crisis, those on the Tory Front Bench have opposed the crucial measures that the Government have taken to save the banking industry from catastrophe, to protect jobs, homes and businesses from a deeper recession, and to get recovery under way. The Tories have opposed them all. It might be the duty of the Opposition to oppose, but surely there are limits. A bit of common sense would not go amiss now and again.

The recession caused by the bankers has led to unemployment, repossessions and business failures, but those outcomes have been nothing like as bad as the City analysts whom the Tories keep quoting were predicting. One reason for that is that, unlike the hysterical analysts in the City, most people running businesses live in the real world and are level-headed. They are trying to keep their firms and their work forces together so that they will still be in business when demand for their goods and services rises again. Their efforts have been backed up by the Government's determination to keep pumping money into the economy to make up for the damage caused by the bankers. This included bringing forward investment projects, the public purchasing of goods and services from the private sector, and the quantitative easing that has poured money into the economy. It also included the temporary reduction in VAT, which was derided by those on the Tory Front Bench and their analyst friends when the Government introduced it, although it is now acknowledged as having been a considerable help.

We all have to recognise, however, that the effects of the recession are far from over. The recovery is under way, but it is quite fragile. Yet this is the moment that the Tories are choosing to demand massive, immediate cuts in Government spending. They claim that this would reduce the Government's deficit, but it would not, because it would involve more people being thrown out of work. Throwing people out of work does not reduce the deficit. Quite the reverse: throwing people out of work increases it. Every job lost is a triple whammy for the taxpayer. First, the taxpayer has to go without the goods and services that the job-losers used to produce. Secondly, the taxpayer has to fund the benefits needed to keep the jobless and their families. Thirdly, the taxpayer has to do without the tax that the job-losers would have paid if they were still in work.

Mr. Jeremy Browne: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: No, I must get on.

Even without counting the reduction in economic activity, keeping someone out of work costs at least £12,000 in benefits paid out and tax not taken in. That is £12,000 per person that is added to the deficit. To put it another way, throwing someone out of work is like turning a useful member of a ship's crew into a passenger who then has to be looked after by the remainder of the crew.

Mr. Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman is rightly concerned about the prospects for employment. Given that concern, does he support the Government's proposal for a 2 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions, and what does he think that that will do to the job market?

Frank Dobson: It will not help the job market—[Interruption.] Unlike the Tory Front-Bench team, I am not living in a world of fantasy. It will not help the job market, but it is a better proposition than what we have heard from the Tories. There should be no question, in my opinion, of making cuts in public investment until the economy is well on the way to recovery and the joblessness rate is way down from what it is now.

Apart from the cost of bailing out the bungling bankers, the main cost of the recession is the result of the reduction in economic activity. We are not producing all the goods and services that we are capable of producing. The economy is not fully operational and the best way to clear the deficit is to get the economy working at full capacity again. The only way to do that at this stage is to keep on pumping public money into the system until the private sector recovers.

No doubt prompted by the recent disclosure of the official papers covering the first days of the Thatcher Government, the Tories, their media friends, the bankers and auditors and the infamously incompetent ratings agencies and their friends have started saying, "Well, yes, Mrs. Thatcher's policies may have been tough, but they worked. She transformed the economy." That myth—and it is a myth—is sadly subscribed to even by many people who should know better. The fact is—and it is a fact—that the average annual economic growth under the Wilson-Callaghan Governments who preceded Mrs. Thatcher was higher than the growth in the Thatcher years, so revered by the Tories and their City analysts.

The Thatcher Government succeeded in creating a feel-good factor by spending the massive tax takings from North sea oil and gas and the huge capital receipts from the privatisation of electricity, gas, telecommunications and other industries. These one-off assets were squandered: they were not put into a sovereign wealth fund; they were not used for long-term investment in the country's future in new manufacturing industry, in science, in research or in education; and the money was certainly not invested in training, as apprenticeships were abolished. The Tory Government used it to fund tax cuts with massive tax benefits going mostly to the rich, which appears to be the Tory policy still. Contrary to free market economic theory, the Thatcher Government did not increase economic growth; they actually reduced it.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab) rose—

Frank Dobson: I give way to my hon. Friend and neighbour.

Ms Buck: On that same point, does my right hon. Friend agree with me that during those years and as a consequence of the particular employment policies he outlined, the number of children living in poverty increased threefold? The Institute for Fiscal Studies has calculated that if the policies in place in 1997 when the Tory Government were last in office had continued until the present day, 2.1 million more children would be living in poverty than are now and that as a result of the Government's policies, including those in the pre-Budget report last week, a million children will have been lifted out of poverty by the time of the election.

Frank Dobson: I agree with my hon. Friend's point.

When the Tories went into that general election 30 years ago, of course, they had an election manifesto. Needless to say, they did not keep to it. I have been reading it and it should be filed under fiction. The fact is that they did not keep their promises. They promised to honour the pensions system they inherited, yet practically the first thing they did was to cut the link between pensions and earnings. They promised, and I quote,

"a competitive and efficient coal industry", yet they closed it down. They promised to simplify the tax system and came up with the poll tax. They promised to make better use of training resources; they closed down the Training Agency and abolished apprenticeships.

The Tories promised, and again I quote, "to master inflation"; under them, inflation ripped to record levels. In one Thatcher year, inflation hit 18 per cent. while over her whole period as Prime Minister, it averaged 7.6 per cent. a year and never fell below 3.4 per cent. They promised to make better use of NHS resources, yet they gave tax breaks for private medical insurance and left the NHS with decrepit hospitals and staff shortages. That is only a sample of what happened in response to the Tories' famous manifesto.

Ms Keeble: History lessons are sometimes very useful. When expert witnesses appeared before the Select Committee, they said that in the event of a faster fiscal tightening, what would certainly have to go would be our proposal to bring back the index-linking of pensions to earnings.

Frank Dobson: Again, one of my hon. Friends has made a valid and important point.

That Tory manifesto was soft soap. The Tory reality was hard-faced. The Tories' real policies were not in their manifesto, but they were being advocated by think-tanks and pressure groups, and they were then put into practice when the Tories came to power. I believe that they are trying the same trick again. The Tory leadership present their party as reformed and rehabilitated, but it cannot be trusted. To find out what the Tories really intend, we need look no further than what the Tory think-tanks and supporters' groups are saying. That way, we find out what the real Tory policies are.

The TaxPayers' Alliance—a real Tory outfit if ever there was one—and the Institute of Directors are jointly advocating all sorts of slashing attacks on services that make life decent for millions of our fellow citizens. They are threatening the elderly with a freeze on the basic state pension and the income guarantee, the withdrawal of free bus passes, and the abolition of free television licences. They are threatening children and young people and their parents with the abolition of Sure Start, the ending of the education maintenance allowance, the abolition of child benefit and the child trust fund, and the ending of the interest subsidy on student loans. They are even threatening a 25 per cent. cut in spending on the arts and theatre. Furthermore, they are threatening people in the impoverished third world with reductions in aid.

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: As long as the hon. Gentleman promises not to mention Brussels.

Mr. Cash: I give the right hon. Gentleman that guarantee. What I do want to ask him is this. I suspect that he is keeping his prescription to himself until the end, if indeed he is going to produce it at all, but he has said many times in the past that it would be far better if we resorted to a policy of nationalisation. Does he think that that would be the right thing to do in the light of the present crisis in our banking and economic circumstances?

Frank Dobson: As far as I can make out, even bankers are in favour of nationalisation provided that it nationalises them and saves their bacon. I am not fanatically in favour of it, although I accept the point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Colin Challen)—who is no longer present—that it would probably be a good idea to keep the east coast main line in the public sector rather than handing it back to the collection of incompetents who were running it before.

[Frank Dobson]

It is not just the TaxPayers' Alliance that is advocating cuts in services. Reform, which portrays itself as another influential Tory pressure group, advocates penalising pensioners for the banking crisis by abolishing the winter fuel allowance, free television licences and concessionary bus fares, and ending retirement pensions, council tax and housing benefit, widows' and war widows' pensions, carer's allowance and disability living allowance for people receiving considerably less than average pay. It is also urging the Tories to impose the same eligibility threshold for maternity pay and child benefit, and to scrap the employer-supported child care scheme, the health in pregnancy grant, the Healthy Start scheme, the Sure Start maternity grant and the education maintenance allowance.

We should beware the Tories' claims to have changed. Their supporters and paymasters have not changed. The people who will be paying for their forthcoming advertising blitz have not changed. We should resist their attacks on pay and pensions. This crisis was not caused by the potential cost of pensions for postal workers or teachers. It has not come about because social workers or nurses or bank clerks are overpaid, or because refuse collectors or shop assistants or factory workers or people gritting roads today are not working hard enough. It has come about because the overpaid bankers and their auditors could not distinguish between an asset and a liability, and the famous rating agencies could not have spotted a wrong 'un even if they had been trying.

I believe in accountability and responsibility. The banking industry and its hangers-on caused the crisis. They should have to meet the bulk of the cost of clearing it up. It is simple. It is the "polluter pays" principle. The bankers polluted the world economy. The bankers should have to pay for clearing up their pollution. Therefore, I welcome the new top rate of income tax and the bankers bonus tax. I support the proposal for a tax on all international financial transactions. I urge the Prime Minister to continue to press for a Tobin tax in collaboration with his French and German counterparts and, hopefully, shame the Americans into accepting it.

The only way we can get out of this recession and create a fairer and more equal society is if the bankers meet their fair share of the costs that they have imposed on the rest of us. The bankers have shown no signs of reining back on their excessive rewards. If the self-rewarding excess of the bankers continues while everyone else has to tighten their belts, it will lead to bitterness and social unrest. As the bankers and their public relations machines deploy their wealth and influence to scapegoat others for the consequences of the banking crisis, we are already seeing a major campaign to lay the blame on hard-working people providing vital public services. Once that sort of irrationality takes hold, once scapegoating becomes acceptable, there is no knowing where it will end. It could set loose forces that set one part of the country against another, one generation against another. It could risk giving right-wing extremists such as the British National party a hell-sent opportunity to promote petty nationalism and the politics of race and religion.

I believe deeply that our response to the recession that the bankers have created will not just determine the future of public finances. It will determine whether the second decade of the new millennium is faced by our people united in the pursuit of fairness and prosperity, or whether we are to be torn apart by strife that could threaten our very democracy.

3.22 pm

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), if only because it reminds us how far the rest of us have moved on over the past couple of decades. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not return to fight the old battles, which he enjoys fighting even though he lost. I see no need to re-fight them, because we won.

I have found that I can begin almost any speech on any subject, and I do, by reminding people of the slogan that Bill Clinton used to have above his desk to remind him of what was really important: "It's the economy, stupid." As we are focused on the economy today, we need another sign above our desks saying, "It's the deficit, stupid" and below that perhaps another one saying "It's public expenditure, stupid." Unless we focus on getting a grip of public expenditure and on eradicating the deficit more rapidly than the Government want, we will not get the economy of this country right. The supreme weakness of the pre-Budget report—some of us may have forgotten that we are supposed to be debating that today—is that it does not focus on those things. One has to get more than halfway through the overview at the front before there is even the covest of mentions of the deficit:

"The Pre-Budget report announces action to maintain the path of fiscal consolidation".

It goes on to say that the three measures that maintain the path of fiscal consolidation are all tax increases. That is how the Government see the priority of solving the deficit. The report refers to public expenditure only in the last sentence, when it mentions that the Government plan is to embed their measures to halve the deficit. The substitute for action, as far as the Government are concerned, is the deficit-reduction Bill. We debated that at length on Tuesday. I did not have a chance to participate then, so I hope I will be forgiven for saying now why I consider that Bill to be a mistake.

"in legislation through the Fiscal Responsibility Bill"

First, it is obnoxious in principle to try to bind future Parliaments. That cannot be done in practice by passing a law, but time and again this Government try to bind future Parliaments by passing legislation that has a bearing on what future Governments must and must not do. Secondly, the Bill is nonsense. It is not even legally enforceable. It is not even justiciable; it is one of those rare Bills that actually has a clause that effectively says that the courts may not take note of the law incorporated in it. It is imprudent, too, because it seeks to bind, albeit unenforceably, future Governments to follow a particular path when we cannot be sure what things will be like over the next four years—let alone the next eight or 10 years, as the Bill envisages. I think that we should probably pursue a fairly ambitious path, but it is foolish to try to lay down a law on what needs to be done in future. The Bill is also a displacement activity; it is a substitute for action because the Government want to avoid action and facing reality.

What is most wrong with the Bill, however, is that it is a recipe for delay. St. Augustine said, "Make me chaste, O Lord, but not yet" and St. Alistair says, "Make me fiscally responsible, but not until 2011." At least St. Augustine saw himself ultimately becoming chaste, but the Chancellor and the Prime Minister are probably passing on the task of fiscal responsibility to their successors, rather than to themselves.

I believe that it is better to act sooner rather than later, because there is a positive benefit in doing so. If we act sooner in taking steps to get the deficit under control, that will restore confidence; and with confidence, growth will come—and with growth, jobs will come, not least for our young people who are currently languishing on the dole queues at the very start of their careers.

There is also danger in deferring action on the deficit in that every month we do so the risk increases of our having a sovereign debt crisis and a financial collapse. That would mean higher interest rates, which would not only make controlling the deficit less easy, but hit all those people with mortgages. One thing about this economic downturn is that at least there is a section of the community that is reasonably well off, and in some cases better off, because interest rates are low: the mortgage payers of this country. They face the greatest threat from this Government's refusal to tackle the deficit speedily and strongly, because it is their interest rates that will increase.

Justine Greening: Does my right hon. Friend agree that because other countries have already come out of recession, our taking a long time to get our public finances back into shape will be a double disadvantage—both domestically and globally in competition with other countries?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. If we leave this too late and as a result there is a crisis, we will have to take much more brutal action: instead of companies simply not recruiting, they will have to sack people; instead of voluntary redundancies, there will be compulsory redundancies. That will be the inevitable consequence of taking too long over implementing the measures that we need to take to bring the deficit under control.

The Chief Secretary said that worries about major holders of Government bonds selling their bonds were overstated. He said that PIMCO was selling bonds because it was looking for riskier assets elsewhere. He must be the only person who thinks that PIMCO and other bond holders are selling UK bonds because they think that they are not risky enough—because they think that the Government's finances are not putting us in sufficiently great danger of bankruptcy. The truth is that they are selling them because they think that the price does not yet fully reflect the risks and dangers of financial collapse. They know that if that happens there will be higher interest rates, and they would prefer to buy them back then rather than experience the collapse in the price and rising interest rates while still holding them.

The Government argue that withdrawing the fiscal stimulus too soon will risk provoking a double-dip recession. That is wrong for several reasons. The first reason is that it is an argument for never taking action. If withdrawing the supposed stimulus has a negative impact, it will do so next year, the year after or the year after that; after all, it was several years after the recovery had begun that the double-dip recession occurred in the United States in the 1930s. That was not because action was taken in the first or second year of the recovery; the action was taken three or four years later, in 1937. Like a lot of the arguments that the Government put forward on many of their policies, it is an argument for not doing anything.

The second reason is that the stimulus effect of a deficit is grossly exaggerated. This country has a bigger deficit than almost any other comparable country in the world, yet it is the last to come out of recession, so there has not been a vast stimulative effect. Likewise, its removal will not have a vastly depressive effect.

The third reason is that the Government's argument ignores the fact that the effect on improving confidence of action to get the deficit under control far outweighs the impact of the loss of Government expenditure feeding into the economy if the fiscal contraction and consolidation take place sooner. The fourth reason is that we are dealing with a structural deficit, and the way to tackle that is to make structural changes, which takes time. If we do not start thinking them through and implementing them now, we will not get the benefits until it is too late.

So, there are sound reasons in principle for disagreeing with the Government's view that there is a great danger in starting the process of fiscal consolidation at the first possible opportunity, and there is plenty of evidence in practice. We have seen Governments do this before. This country has previously started the process of fiscal contraction before the recovery has been long established. In 1976, the Labour Government did just that—they had to, because the International Monetary Fund told them to do so. At a recent seminar in the City, players in those past crises revealed that Jim Callaghan was quite keen to do it anyway and found what the IMF said to be a useful excuse. Lord Donoughue, the head of his policy unit at the time, said that having argued internally and with the IMF about whether they could avoid taking such action, they were struck by the fact that when they did so renewed growth in the economy came much more rapidly and strongly than they had anticipated and that the effect was positive, rather than negative.

In 1981, the Conservative Government took such action. Some 364 economists wrote to The Times saying that any attempt to reduce the deficit at the bottom of the recession would turn that recession into a continuous downward spiral from which there would be no hope of recovery. Almost from the day that their letter was delivered and published in The Times, and, simultaneously, Geoffrey Howe—now Lord Howe—introduced his Budget, the economy started to recover. The effect on confidence outweighed the direct Keynesian effect.

Plenty of evidence from overseas supports what I am saying. An excellent study that I have mentioned before in this House—I have still seen no evidence to suggest that the Government have yet read it—has been produced by the European Central Bank. Its occasional paper series No. 38 "Economic reactions to public finance consolidation: a survey of the literature" is very revealing. It reveals that on many occasions the effect of reducing Government spending, and even sometimes of raising taxes, in order to produce fiscal consolidation is positive. It states:

> "The issue attracted much renewed interest in the light of the experiences of fiscal consolidation in Denmark (1983-86) and

[Mr. Lilley]

> Ireland (1987-89). In spite of the severe restrictive policies pursued in the two countries during the periods concerned, their rates of growth showed significant increases on previous years."

There was also a study of some 18 OECD countries over the last 30 years of the previous century which showed a range of expansionary and contractionary episodes. The conclusion was:

> "The effect of fiscal policy therefore becomes non-Keynesian"— that is to say that a contraction of the deficit produces expansion of the economy—

> "when large and persistent budgetary adjustments are implemented."

That is precisely the circumstance that we find ourselves in today. By contrast, another study mentioned in the document considered five rather similar OECD countries: Australia, Canada, Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States. It concluded that

> "the effects of fiscal policy on GDP and its components" have tended to

> "become substantially weaker over time" and that since 1980, the > "effects have been mostly negative".

In other words, a contraction in the deficit produces a sufficient return in confidence to produce expansion in the economy.

So, we have the evidence to know that we ought to be taking action now. The sad truth is that we have a Government who are unable and unwilling to face up to reality, who are putting their party political interest before national interest, who are using tired economic dogma against actual experience that has been studied and seen to operate on the ground, and who make easy promises before the election, leaving tough choices until afterwards.

Mr. Timms: I am listening to the right hon. Gentleman's speech with interest. He presented the handling of the 1980s recession to us as a success. He will recall, as we all do, the fact that unemployment reached 3 million in that recession. Surely there are lessons to be learned and we should not be repeating that experience.

Mr. Lilley: We should not. We started then from a very different situation, with massive over-manning in both the public and private sectors. Because of changes in the economy and in trade union law, that situation was seen to change. That happened in other countries that moved from a very socialised economy to a more liberal one, as a result of being too socialised and too syndicated in the first place—of having that mass over-manning. My point was that the contraction in the deficit produced an expansion in output of activity. That surely meant that there was less unemployment than there would otherwise have been, unless the Financial Secretary is saying that we should—well, I cannot see any alternative.

Ms Keeble: I want to underline the point made by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. Does the right hon. Gentleman not accept that in the early 1980s and early 1990s the social unrest created by the fiscal consolidation sparked riots in most of our inner cities? One of the telling things about this recession is that although we have seen such a level of unemployment and repossessions, the country has held together—touch wood—remarkably well. There has been a sense that we are pulling together to get people through a real crisis.

Mr. Hands: Better than the Government.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend on the Front Bench makes a valid point—the country might have been holding together, but the Government clearly are not. However, let me address directly the hon. Lady's serious and important point. I do not want to return to the previous speaker and to re-fight the battles of the '80s, but my point is that the Keynesians argued that that consolidation of the budget deficit would intensify the recession and they were proved wrong. That is the simple point that I want to put across. The economy, far from going into a deeper recession, began a strong and prolonged recovery. Perhaps the hon. Lady can think of other ways in which that recovery could have been made even greater and stronger, but she has not pointed out what they might be and nor has anybody else I know. I want to allow other people to take part in the debate, because I want to hear what they have to say.

How do we cut expenditure? We want to cut expenditure in ways that do not throw people out of work and that do not undermine public services. We have to recognise that we have one of the most expensive public sectors in the EU. It is heading for, and is set to reach, more than half of our GDP. Moreover, one of the biggest impacts within the sector has been the increase in the pay budget. I draw the House's attention to a study produced just a few days ago by the Centre for Economics and Business Research, which gives all the facts and figures and says that if the public sector pay bill had risen in line with the private sector pay bill over the past two years, then taxes, or borrowing, could have been £11 billion lower. One of the main agents of the growth in the deficit has been the fact that the public sector pay bill has been out of control in the past couple of years. It must be brought back under control in the interests both of controlling the deficit and of reducing the impact on jobs in the public sector. We do not want to lose a single job if we can help it, if those jobs are valid or if people can be moved to do something more useful.

We must learn to say no to new ideas—that probably applies as much to Opposition parties as to the Labour party—and we must not be in the business of adding to our spending commitments. We must also learn from the private sector the lessons of lean production and how constantly to improve the value for money that one gets from any given number of people. The way to do that is not through top-down statements that we are going to change it all through a few edicts from some great man, even though we can recruit some great experts in efficiency. Ultimately, it means doing in each Department what I started to do in my Department—the Department for Social Security—and asking people at the sharp end of the Department how they could do their job more efficiently.

It was quite difficult to get my managers to do that. They came back and told me that they had spoken to the area managers. I said, "I didn't ask you to do that. I want you to speak to the people who actually fill in income support claims, or who help to monitor invalidity benefit claims, and ask them how they could do their job better." No one had asked those staff that before, and they came up with an enormous range of sensible ideas for improving efficiency. The target was to improve efficiency by 25 per cent.—in other words, to reduce the number of jobs by 25 per cent.—but they participated in the exercise because no one had ever asked them before how they could do their job more effectively. They knew that they were doing lots of things in very inefficient ways, and they wanted to do them better. Most people in the public sector want to do their job better and have the public interest at heart. We must do that at the micro level, through every Department, to harness the experience and expertise of the people at the sharp end of each Department.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lilley: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I am just drawing to a close.

If we do that, we can make the process of fiscal consolidation less painful than it would otherwise be. However, no one should pretend that it is not going to be painful, and no one should forget who is to blame for getting us into this crisis.

3.43 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): What has been rather depressing about listening to the speeches of Opposition Members is how exclusively they seem to be concerned about the interests of the financial markets and how little concern they appear to have about the wider interests of the people of this country. All this is rather like a double-take of the Geoffrey Howe Budget of 1981, to which the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) has just referred. That Budget decimated the industrial economy and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) has said, produced a lower rate of growth over the relevant period than in the preceding period of the 1970s, which was extremely difficult because of hyper-inflation due to oil prices. It is rather tragic that minds seem to be closed to the idea that there are alternative ways of dealing with the deficit that will not be so socially destructive and that could be more effective in the long run. That is what I want to discuss.

I shall focus on one crucial aspect of the pre-Budget report, which has had a little attention today but which has not been properly faced up to: the Treasury's assumptions about growth over next year and the year after. The Chancellor's view, as he expressed it, was that the worst is over. As we all know, the contraction of 4.75 percent. in 2009 is a post-war record and borrowing this year is on course to reach a peacetime record of 12 to 13 per cent. of GDP, yet the economy is forecast to rebound by 1 to 1.5 per cent. this year, rising to 3.5 per cent. in 2011-12. That would enable the Government to achieve their target of halving the deficit within four years, without the savagery of the full cuts that the Tories are clearly planning if they were to win the election. That projected growth is absolutely crucial to the PBR strategy but where is it going to come from? That is my question.

It is true, of course, that there are some real signs of recovery. They include the unprecedentedly fast turnaround of financial markets, which some say has never happened so quickly in 300 years. The assumption is that somehow that will drag the real economy up behind it, but that remains to be seen. Other factors are the slowing in the increase in unemployment, which is very welcome, the lower rise in home repossessions than in previous downturns, and the greater support for youth employment brought about by the Government's present expenditure of £5 billion on job placements for 18 to 24-year olds and the increase in training and apprenticeships. However, my question remains: all that is important and useful, but will it add up to a huge surge in growth to 3.5 per cent. within two years?

In the boom years before the crash in 2007, household consumption contributed 1.75 per cent. of growth each year, with business adding about another 0.25 per cent. for a total of 2 per cent. That, of course, was in the fat years but now—after the worst recession since the war, the collapse of large elements of the banking industry, a big drop in house prices, a record fall in investment and with tax rises and spending cuts being promised by all parties—the Treasury is looking to household spending contributing 2 per cent. to growth in 2011-12, and to business adding another 1 per cent. I simply ask again whether that is credible.

Unemployment is still expected to rise to 2.8 million, and family budgets remain tight. Pay cuts, pay freezes and short-shift working are still spreading across the country. I ask again: where is growth on a sufficient scale going to come from?

In my view, the essential element missing from the PBR is a major injection of demand in the public sector. The private sector will not provide that demand, because there is no prospect of profitability until there is a much more visible turnaround in the real economy. Quantitative easing even of £200 billion has not provided the necessary level of demand up to now, as the banks have used the money not to increase lending to struggling businesses but rather to consolidate their balance sheets. In any case, we understand that the Bank of England seems minded to call a halt to quantitative easing once gilt purchases hit £200 billion in February.

Moreover, the injection of demand that we need will certainly not come from private consumption because, as we all know, the level of consumer debt is not far short of the whole of GDP. So the only way to inject the necessary demand into a very weak and fragile economy is through massive public investment in job creation: not £750 billion, which was spent bailing out the banks; and not £200 billion of quantitative easing, which has been much less effective than expected. A fraction of that could be used to underpin large-scale job creation in sectors where it is desperately needed, such as house building.

There are 12,000 people in my constituency alone on the waiting list for a house, and I am sure that the situation is much the same throughout the country. House building is at its lowest ebb for 80 years, and with a recession that is an extraordinary combination. We need such investment for the restoration of our creaking infrastructure and to blaze the way for the new green and digital economy, which I think all Members agree is where the future lies.

Why do the Government not make that investment? I suspect that it is because they came into office committed, after the Thatcherite monetarist years, to a complete repudiation of Keynesian demand management. The Opposition absolutely share that view, but I had rather higher hopes for the Government. We certainly heard that view in the speech from the Opposition Front Bencher, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). The story is well known, but I am embarrassed to recall that in 1997 the then Chancellor, the current Prime Minister, said that he was pursuing a regime of neo-classical endogenous growth theory. Shorn of the unfortunate terminology, it means that demand should be generated by the enhancement of supply within the economic system: from education, improvements in training, increased research and development, which is necessary, the commercialisation of science and so on. That, combined with Friedman's quantitative money theory, which was prevalent in the 1970s, certainly provided the basis for Mrs Thatcher's macro-economic policy. It is a quixotic, old-fashioned and perverse Tory theory, and regrettably—very regrettably—new Labour took it over wholesale in 1997.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

The policy works fine when other vigorous, external sources of demand such as strong export demand from other countries, major technological breakthroughs or continuing private sector investment are in place to drive the economy, as they were in the boom years of 1994 to 2007. The policy works disastrously when there are no strong external sources of demand, as there were after the infamous 1981 budget, which over the next four years pushed unemployment up to 3.2 million; and as there are now, after 2008, when unemployment is still heading towards 3 million and when even the type of fiscal expansion that in 2000 countered the downturn from the dotcom collapse is not possible because of the budget deficit. If there was ever a time for Keynesian measures to restore demand in a very fragile economy, it is now.

The black hole in the PBR is not the opaqueness about where the cuts will fall, as the Opposition have repeatedly taunted, but the lack of any action to create the 500,000 to 1 million jobs that the economy desperately needs. Of course, the enormous budget deficit must come down; we all agree about that. But it is far better to do so by getting people off unemployment and housing benefits and back into work, where they start contributing to income tax, national insurance and VAT. The alternative, of rapidly making drastic cuts in public expenditure, clearly appears once again to be Conservative policy—but probably on a greater scale than any of us have yet realised. However, that could well have the opposite effect of turning a deep recession into a vicious spiral of decline, and prompt an even worse double-dip slump.

That is exactly what happened in Japan in the late 1990s, when after a lost decade the Government increased public expenditure but also increased taxes. They did that prematurely and suffered the consequences of another lost decade. It was the same when Roosevelt came to office. He was a balanced-budget man, but he saw the plight of the country and got expansion going with the new deal. By 1935, two years later, there was an improvement—an expansion—in the economy, but at that point he started to raise taxes and the United States went into a fairly serious further decline from which it did not escape until the war.

Of course, it will be objected that with the deficit as high as it is, we cannot afford to increase it any further, but that is simply not true. Our current debt-to-gross domestic product ratio is 61 per cent.—slightly higher, I agree, than that of France and Germany, but less than in the United States, where it is 69 per cent., or Italy, which is perhaps not the best example, where it is 102 per cent., with Japan still on 107 per cent.

Mr. Hands: Surely the right hon. Gentleman must realise, first, that our indebtedness is rising incredibly quickly, which is in itself a cause for alarm; and secondly, that the savings rate in countries such as Italy and Japan, as opposed to our utterly anaemic domestic rate, makes that comparison a very difficult one. If we had the savings ratio of Japan or Italy, perhaps we would not be as alarmed as we all are and should be.

Mr. Meacher: If we are looking at Japan and Italy, that is a perfectly fair point. The hon. Gentleman says that our indebtedness is rising quickly, and I accept that, but the question continues to be what is the best way of reducing it. The point that I was about to make—he did not give me a chance because he intervened a bit too quickly—is that the best comparison is with Britain's position during the second world war, when our debt-to-GDP ratio reached 250 per cent.—two and a half times our entire GDP. What happened after the war—did we tackle the situation with gigantic cuts in public expenditure? No, it was tackled in exactly the opposite way with large public expenditure programmes of just the kind that I am talking about to get the economy working again and to get unemployment down. I hate to say this but, in some says, that inaugurated the golden age of capitalism between 1948 and 1976. [Interruption.] I say this ironically. The fact is that that was a highly successful policy.

Let us not forget that, under the Thatcherite policies of the 1980s, we had not just one collapse, but two. It is all very well to talk about Geoffrey Howe's Budget producing a great deal of growth—it did in the end, of course, because of growth in other countries and the rise in exports, and the end of the oil inflation of the 1970s, but it then produced another collapse in the early 1990s.

I should make it clear that I am not at all opposed to public expenditure cuts where they are justified. We should always be looking to see whether public expenditure is justified. I think—a significant number of very senior military chiefs, if not most, agree with this—that the £75 billion planned over the next 30 years for continuing with Trident is not justified. I also think that the £10 billion or so for identity cards cannot be justified on a cost-benefit rationale, and that one cannot justify expenditure running into tens of billions of pounds on massive Government Department IT super-computers, which is pretty wasteful given all the experience we have had.

Let me say to the Conservatives, who may agree with some of what I have said, something that they may not agree with—that taxes on the wealthy should be boosted so that they pay their fair contribution at a critical time for the nation. The Government are beginning to do that, but in my book nowhere near to the degree that is justified given that the wealthy and the bankers have produced the problem and that the rest of the country are expected to pay for it. That simply cannot be justified—that is the bottom line.

We should crack down much harder on tax evasion, which is reckoned to cost the economy something like £25 billion every year, and significantly increase the penalties for those who are caught. We should end the non-dom abuse, as it is insufferable that it has carried on for so long in this country, and we should certainly introduce a Tobin tax on financial transactions. We should raise capital gains tax to the level— dare I say it?—at which Nigel Lawson left it at the end of the 1980s of up to the 40 per cent. that is the higher rate of income tax. It is only fair that there should be a rate of 50 per cent. on incomes over £100,000 and 60 per cent. on incomes over £150,000. If the situation is as critical as many people believe, such rates are fair and equitable.

We need public expenditure cuts where justified, tax increases where necessary but above all a massive public investment programme in job creation to swing the economy out of recession and decline and back into growth and expansion. There is no other realistic foundation for the Government's prognosis of 3.5 per cent. growth by 2011-12. I trust that the Government will make that the highlight of their last pre-election Budget in March. It would be thoroughly good for the economy and extremely popular in the country, so I ask my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary whether we can have that assurance.

4.1 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), who asked exactly the right questions—how can we stimulate demand and get confidence back into the economy? We differ, however, on how to resolve it. A bloated public sector, which is already extended, is certainly not the way forward, but his central point was correct.

There are two groups of key questions that must be asked when considering the pre-Budget report. First, what is the present and future state of the economy, is it acceptable to the capital markets and what are the threats that are facing it? Secondly, does the PBR do anything to resolve the economic mire into which we have fallen? The answers are that the economy is in a far more perilous state than the Chancellor indicated in the PBR, and that the PBR has if anything made matters worse.

Our whole economic system is based on confidence—confidence that the currency will be stable and that what we can buy today will be the same tomorrow, confidence that a job will not be taken away and confidence that an overdraft or bank loan will be there when it is needed. That confidence keeps money flowing around the economy and keeps people in work, businesses alive and factories producing. The central question is whether the PBR has done anything to improve that confidence. Has it dealt with the real risk of a strike by the purchasers of our debt, and what would that do to our economy? Equally, has it dealt with what will happen if and when interest rates begin to rise in both nominal and real terms as quantitative easing comes to an end? Of course the £4 billion that was sold yesterday in the gilt markets for 2015 and that fact that that went well is undoubtedly good news, but investor sentiment will be tested again next week for the year 2049 and far beyond, so there is still much to be concerned about in that regard.

At the heart of the answer to all those questions is whether the fiscal policy for the next 12 months will be credible. Our ability to borrow is the key to the market's judgment about that and will determine the outcomes in the economy, from how much and in what terms we can borrow to how much individuals can spend. The whole object of policy should be to keep the fiscal reins sufficiently restrained so that interest rates can stay as low as possible for as long as possible. That is not what we received in the PBR—it is as simple as that.

In the PBR, the Chancellor talked about the deficit as a percentage of GDP rising to 12.6 per cent. this year. Very regrettably, that may be an underestimate. The Economist Intelligence Unit believes that the figure will be more like 14.5 per cent., by far the highest in the list of 43 countries that it monitors each week. The Government's ambition is to cut their deficit in half. When viewed in the context of any borrowing record before 1997, that makes the current forecast look unrealistic in the medium term, because it is based on some very optimistic growth assumptions. On top of that, the Treasury Committee yesterday said that > "although the Treasury believe the Pre-Budget Report contains sufficient detail about the way in which the structural deficit would be reduced, our expert witnesses all criticised the document for not providing enough information about how this will be achieved."

The same report expressed concern about the Chancellor's growth projections, which are fundamental.

Why is that so fundamentally important? Owing to the huge amount of money that we have to borrow and raise each year and roll over, even relatively small changes in the interest rates offered on Government bonds could punch huge holes through our finances in future. That is the key point. That is what will make investors—at best—more cautious.

Investor confidence in our yawning fiscal chasm remains crucial. If that fails, two things may well happen: we would have to fund the deficit through further cuts in spending or increases in taxes elsewhere, or we would regrettably find ourselves heading towards the situation that Ireland and Greece face. There is a vicious cycle of deteriorating confidence: worsening confidence leads to a further deterioration in fiscal problems, which leads in turn to a further deterioration in confidence, and so on, until we are forced to take actions that would be wholly unattractive and unacceptable to all hon. Members.

How large are the holes that could be punched through the national finances? The Debt Management Office said that it needs to sell £225 billion of gilts this year to cover the Budget deficit, and that debts need to be rolled over. A rise in the borrowing rate, for example from 3 per cent. to 4.5 per cent., would certainly cause difficulties. As it is, the Treasury is forecasting paying more than £60 billion a year to meet interest charges on the national debt. How would the Chancellor do that? If his plans for taxation and national insurance contributions are anything to go by, he would raise taxes on jobs and undermine that very employment so as to protect unsustainable levels of spending. I hope my hon. Friends agree that it would be good if he did not get the chance to do that for electoral reasons, but there is always the risk that he will.

That may well be the consequence of a steadfast refusal to plan for the future reduction of the deficit for the short term. In essence, that is what makes the PBR so unacceptable. The Government are refusing to publish their predictions of future interest rates costs on Government debt or say what they are likely to be.

[Mr. Richard Spring]

When challenged by the Treasury Committee on why that information was not provided, the Chancellor said that

> "at the best times there is a degree of uncertainty, now there is a great deal of uncertainty."

The Government make other projections on many other key variables in the economy, but not on that most crucial one, though it is at the heart of our ability to borrow. The Chancellor confirmed that

> "within the Treasury we have estimates".

Frankly, he should let us hear what they are.

Many will be asking themselves what is going to happen when the Bank of England asset purchase facility stops buying gilts. The supply and demand relationships in the gilts market will alter markedly. If next year the Debt Management Office tries to sell a similar amount to the £225 billion of gilts it sold this year, what will be the price with a £200 billion buyer effectively missing from the market? David Scammell, the fund manager at Schroders, said:

> "With the Bank of England seemingly set to phase out its quantitative easing buying programme—which has seen it effectively fund the Treasury to the tune of £200 billion over the last nine months—the supply/demand imbalance will clearly tilt towards higher yields...A 'buyers-strike' would accentuate the move. This would be bad news not just for gilt investors, but also for the economy, the banks and the government".

That is at the heart of the dilemma.

Since the publication of the PBR, it is becoming progressively more expensive for the country to finance its deficit. The PBR failed to achieve the credibility that the markets were expecting, which is what led to the view that the Government are currently able to hold down the cost of servicing the nation's debt only because those who are buying our gilts expect a change of Government in the very near future, and a Government who inspire confidence in their competence. Frankly, after the shambles of their management of the economy in the last few years, it is hardly surprising.

We have heard a lot about PIMCO, the important American investment group. It has said that there is an 80 per cent. chance of Britain losing its triple A rating if the Government do not move swiftly. Scott Mather, head of global portfolio management, told Dow Jones Newswires that the current debt reduction plan

> "is lacking in conviction and lacking in details".

When asked about a downgrade, he said:

> "I think so...it's just a question of when...not if. Based on what we know today about the debt trajectory and about the inability to adjust that, I think it's greater than a 50 per cent. likelihood. Call it more like 80 per cent."

This comes a day after PIMCO, which is the world's largest bond fund manager, decided to cut back on UK gilts—yet another buyer missing from a market where the Debt Management Office is desperately trying to sell our national debts.

A clear measure that can be used to underline this erosion of confidence is how much someone would have to pay to insure themselves against losses suffered by holding our nation's debt. The figures are as revealing as they are shocking. As of last month, the annual cost of insuring $10 million of British debt for five years is $72,000. This is in the same league as Malaysia and Chile and $2,000 more than it costs to insure Slovakia's debt. How do we compare to countries such as France and Germany? One would hope that Britain would be in a similar fiscal position to such countries, but we compare extremely badly. It costs just $22,000 per year to insure $10 million of Germany's debt, and $24,000 to insure France's—a third of what it costs to insure ours. That is a clear judgment by outside markets on the risks caused by the fiscal situation in this country.

Mr. Hands: Does my hon. Friend agree that investments in German or French bonds in the last two years have borne far less currency risk than a sterling-denominated investment, which makes our task even more difficult?

Mr. Spring: My hon. Friend is right. We have had a dramatic devaluation of our currency, although I suppose it will ultimately be helpful to the recovery. The markets have made a judgment on our currency based on their view of our economy, and it is not exactly an A-plus judgment.

Other statistics are also revealing. Not only are we a considerably less acceptable risk than other countries, but we are less creditworthy in fact than many firms and private companies. On the same basis as I mentioned a moment ago, it would cost $11,000 per year more to insure our debt than Vodafone's, $15,000 more than McDonalds', $32,000 more than BP's and an astonishing $35,000 more than Gap's. The sad fact of the matter is that the finances of large numbers of companies, in the midst of the biggest recession in living memory, are considered more creditworthy than those of the United Kingdom. That is an incredible judgment.

The Chancellor has kept quiet on the specifics of the pain to come. That is of course simply naked politics. He steadfastly refused to go into the detail of how and where he would cut spending, or how and where he would raise more money, and therefore how, in reality, he would go about dealing with the crisis that the country faces. The IMF says that $36 billion needs to be cut from Department budgets by 2013-14 to meet the borrowing requirement.

The few measures that the Chancellor did announce included an increase in national insurance contributions. That is a tax on jobs and affects everyone who earns as little as £20,000 a year—hardly progressive politics. That is why Richard Lambert, director general of the CBI, wrote in his editorial page in the CBI's magazine:

> "The Chancellor managed to annoy almost everybody with his Pre Budget Report. Yet despite imposing higher taxes on business, he failed to show how he would restore the public finances to health."

He continued:

> "Put simply, the extra taxes he announced are being used mainly to support current spending for the next couple of years, rather than to reduce borrowing."

That view can only be reinforced, because the Prime Minister has claimed that, if there is better than expected economic news in the next few years, some of the extra money could be used to sustain public spending rather than to reduce the deficit. And of course the Chancellor has disagreed with him. That is part of the problem of a disunited and dysfunctional Government.

As the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton effectively said, the key issue is what effect these policies have had on consumer confidence in the UK.

According to the most recent survey by the Nationwide building society, in December consumer confidence suffered its biggest fall in more than a year. The proportion of consumers who thought that the economic situation would be better in six months fell to 34 per cent.—down from 41 per cent. the month before. The proportion of consumers who felt that now was a bad time to make a major purchase rose by 4 per cent. to 38 per cent. last month.

Expectations for employment also worsened in December, with the proportion of people who thought that there would be many or some jobs available in six months falling to 25 per cent. from 27 per cent. Nationwide's chief economist said that although it is still early days, those lower expectations might foreshadow a more sluggish consumer outlook in 2010 as stimulus measures are withdrawn—we certainly hope that is not the case, but it does not look good. Consumer confidence, which is at the heart of our system, is one of the fundamental elements that the Government should be working to improve. It is what keeps money flowing around an economy and people in work. In that, I am afraid, they are clearly failing.

When we look at these statistics, we have to ask ourselves whether any of this is in the least surprising given that since last year the Government have been borrowing at the fastest rate ever and the Bank of England has printed enough money to purchase the economic output of Denmark. People are crying out for somebody to show the way out of this mess. Regaining the confidence of the British people should be the job of the Government now. That is what will decisively break the country out of this vicious cycle of debt and decline. That is what will keep interest rates in this country as low as possible for as long as possible. In turn, that will help to lead to a sustainable economic recovery. We are now borrowing net nearly £500,000 per minute. It is simply not sustainable.

I accept some of the points made by Labour Members—of course this debate might be arid, and I accept that we have to relate what we say to the reality of people's lives. Of course it is a matter of some satisfaction that, for a variety of reasons—not least the growth of the public sector, but also flexibility in the labour markets—unemployment has not reached the levels that some had forecast. Ultimately, however, we simply cannot deal with problems of employment, confidence or interests rates if we do not grasp that particular nettle—borrowing. However, that simply is not being dealt with.

The whole picture of chaos and contradiction in this Government was truly exemplified by the Prime Minister on Sunday talking about his pursuit of aspiration—one could not make it up—while attacking the Conservatives for wanting to make cuts. Absurdly, the next day, the Chancellor, and indeed the Chief Secretary, launched a document attacking the Conservatives for excessive spending promises. One need not have graduated from a kindergarten class to know that that is completely contradictory and shows that the Government have no clue how to respond.

When the Government leave office this year, we will have seen a decline in our international competitiveness and relative educational achievement, the longest ever recession and our international reputation in tatters. How dismissive our European partners are of a country whose tripartite regulatory system so failed us that we now have so little credibility in influencing the key area of European financial services regulation! We have been led not by Presbyterian frugality, but by the most profligate Chancellor in history. When this tired, broken-down, dysfunctional and disunited Government leave office, this PBR will simply be a milestone on the path to the electoral oblivion that they deserve.

4.19 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): This opportunity to debate the pre-Budget report is an excellent innovation. It should have produced an interesting debate—indeed, a compelling one—on the state of the economy, but all that it has produced are a lot of sterile platitudes about the interests of finance, which caused the recession in the first place, through risk-taking and excessive lending, as against the concerns that we on the Labour Benches have been trying to express about jobs, employment, production and the real economy of this country.

Nowhere was that contrast more typified than in the speech by the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), who has just sat down. What he was saying, essentially, is that the problem is confidence. How do we get confidence? Only by returning a Conservative Government. How do we return a Conservative Government? By creating such a state of fear, alarm, panic, depression, horror and misery about this country's economic prospects that we just have to have one. That is a political strategy of knocking Britain and knocking our financial future. Frankly, it is damaging to the economy and to the jobs and the real people out there, and it is unworthy of the Opposition. What we should be debating is how to keep the economy going at a high level in the face of a recession that has been produced by the irresponsibility of the financial sector.

This pre-Budget report is a difficult one, because it is difficult to predict the future, as the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) said. Indeed, we cannot predict the future—he went on to predict it in the gloomiest possible terms, but his essential point was that we cannot predict it. We are probably out of the recession now, in the technical sense of several quarters of negative growth, but its effects will linger on, in more closures, more unemployment and more economic difficulties. That is what we must combat. We cannot now know how long we will have to do that; therefore, it is difficult to make firm assumptions about the economic future in the pre-Budget report.

The other problem with the pre-Budget report is that, because the Government feel obliged to look at the prospects for debt repayment and cutting the deficit, it predicts action in those areas. That has the result of moving the debate on to Conservative ground and the ground of a financial sector concerned with deficits and borrowing. However, in a recession, deficits and borrowing are not the problem; they are the solution. They are the only way of keeping the economy going at an effective level. In opposing deficits and borrowing, as they have done consistently for the past year, the Tories are preaching a system of economics that is not pre-Keynesian, but pre-Cro-Magnon.

In my view—it is a personal view, but it is echoed by several Members who have spoken, or are yet to speak, on the Government Benches—the big problem in the economy is this. Although we have provided it with a stimulus, which has undoubtedly saved about 500,000 jobs—if we had not given the economy that stimulus, unemployment would now be at Tory levels, which they achieved twice in their period of government—that is not enough. The stimulus has to continue—indeed, we need a bigger stimulus—because that is the only way that we will get back to growth. The only way to deal with deficits and borrowing is through economic growth. With economic growth, those problems fade away.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

Let us look at the amount of debt that the incoming Labour Government paid off in the first three years of their existence, in a very powerful performance. That happened because of growth. With growth now, we can achieve the same results. That is why we must stimulate the economy to get back to the level of growth that will pay off those debts as quickly as possible. That is the crucial issue: not moaning about debt and creating imaginary threats to our credit rating to frighten the City into supporting the Conservative party financially, which is essentially what the Opposition have done, but getting back to growth as soon as possible.

In the light of that, it is disappointing that the pre-Budget report does not envisage a stronger building performance, or a bigger spend on housing. The big expansion in housing was the main means of recovering the economy in the 1930s, before we moved on to the stimulus from rearmament. The housing drive in this country built many houses. I am sorry to say that this Government's performance on housing has been pathetic. The house-building rate is lower than it was in the 1950s; it is back at the 1920s level.

Kelvin Hopkins: I apologise to my hon. Friend for not being here for the beginning of his contribution. Does he agree that the Government would be well advised to concentrate their spending on direct job creation, and not just on reflating demand?

Mr. Mitchell: Absolutely. That is why I am arguing for a big housing programme. Housing means jobs; it stimulates demand. People need to buy carpets and furniture to put in their houses, although, in the main, the stimulus benefits employment in the construction industry. The kind of housing that we need to build is public housing for rent, because that is where the demand is now. That is what the 1.8 million people on council waiting lists around the country need. They cannot afford to buy, even after the fall in prices during the past year or so. We need a big housing drive, particularly for council housing, which has been the main area of inadequacy in our performance.

One fifth of the population have a standard of living that is not adequate. They are, in a sense, deprived, and they need public housing. We have not built enough of it, but that is the only way of providing for the future. It is also a guarantee that, when the economy begins to recover, all the money does not go into escalating house prices as it did before. If we build a strong public housing sector, people will not be forced to buy when they cannot afford to maintain a mortgage. They will not be pushed into sub-prime ownership. What they really want and need is public housing for rent, and we provided that in the past through a housing drive. We now need a bigger housing and construction drive than the pre-Budget report proposes.

In America, a useful measure has been introduced whereby construction projects that are shovel-ready can be financed to go ahead. That is eminently sensible in a recession. In this country, 140 college building programmes were cancelled as a result of the debacle at the Learning and Skills Council. Most of those programmes were shovel-ready, including the £150 million project for the rebuilding of the Grimsby institute. That project should have been started. It would provide jobs and an economic stimulus. Why are we not doing it? The allowance for housing and construction in the pre-Budget report is inadequate. We need both in order to boost the economy, particularly in the construction industry, which is stalled everywhere.

There is also a need in this debate on the pre-Budget report to grapple with another issue that is more basic than the deficit and borrowing—namely, the need to rebalance the economy, which has been lop-sidedly developing a huge financial sector on a shrinking manufacturing and production base. No economy can function efficiently or generate growth and jobs when it is unbalanced in that way. The process of rebalancing it will be painful, but it must be started. I had hoped that the pre-Budget report would place a greater emphasis on this matter.

We cannot pay our way in the world now, because manufacturing has shrunk so much. It has been decimated in this country over the past few decades. It has been weakened partly by the rise to dominance—even to hegemony—of the financial sector and the City of London, under whose spell I am afraid the Government fell for far too long. The rise of the City has been damaging to the real economy of manufacturing for three reasons. The first is that the City and the financial sector would rather invest in Dubai than in Doncaster. They were never concerned with the industrial needs of this country. Secondly, the City does not exercise enough long-term thinking to support the manufacturing sector, while thirdly, of course, it always wants a high and stable exchange rate. Why? So it can manipulate money around the world to acquire assets overseas. The interests of manufacturing, however, lie in a low and competitive exchange rate, which allows more exports and the selling of products on the world markets.

Frank Dobson: Does my hon. Friend also agree that it is a remarkable irony that despite the massive growth in financial services to the disadvantage of manufacturing industry, manufacturing industry still provides a bigger proportion of our overseas earnings than the much-vaunted lot in the City?

Mr. Mitchell: Over the last decade or so, manufacturing has provided an average of about 60 per cent. of our overseas earnings, but it cannot now support the economy or jobs in the way it did in the past—unless it is expanded, unless it is rebuilt and unless we shift the balance in the economy back to production and away from financial manipulation. That is our future, which will be bleak unless we do that; it will be a future of increasing debt in order to pay for imports that we are not currently paying for.

For a couple of years our trade deficit has been higher than that of the Americans—a deficit that caused such a panic and alarm in the US. We should be alarmed and concerned about ours. All the experience of developing countries is that it is possible rapidly to develop a strong manufacturing sector if policy is focused on that by having a low and competitive exchange rate. That is what all the developing countries—starting with Germany, now finishing with China—have done. They started from a low exchange rate, which makes exporting profitable, building up a powerful internationally traded sector, which then achieves economies of scale and follows a process of continuous causation and improvement.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend correctly emphasises the importance of manufacturing. Is it not also worrying that if manufacturing is allowed to dwindle even further, recreating the necessary skills in manufacturing will be much more difficult?

Mr. Mitchell: That is absolutely true. We have networks of skills and surviving skills, which have been thrown on the scrapheap, but they could and should be mobilised for any expansion. It is true that we need a big training programme, as this is one of the bottlenecks in the expansion of manufacturing that needs to be cleared. That can be done through an industrial policy, which we have fought shy of for far too long, but which is necessary.

As I was saying, the big expansion overseas, based on a competitive exchange rate in overseas countries, shows that manufacturing can expand and rebuild. It can do so by having a lower competitive exchange rate. We now have the opportunity for a 25 per cent. devaluation, which would make industry and investment in this country profitable again, which it has not been for the last few years. It was certainly not profitable under Thatcherism, which was based on the policy of destroying manufacturing to weaken the trade unions and the power of the country's workers. It was based on the assumption that as a phoenix rises from ashes, the more ashes created in manufacturing areas, the better would be the future of this country.

I am afraid, I have to say, that that destructive process was continued under Labour because our concern was to fight inflation, which was done by keeping the pound high at an uncompetitive level, which subsidises imports. That also forces industry to cut its costs and shed labour in a pathetic and almost doomed attempt to stay competitive. This destruction continued and manufacturing shrank—to our shame, while we were in power—from 20 per cent. of GDP to perhaps 12 or probably 11 per cent. now in this recession. We must revive manufacturing and get it back to what it was.

But as I look at the policies we have adopted up to now, I see that we are not effectively achieving that. We have "saved the banks", but our treatment of the banks defies belief. Whatever happened to moral hazard? The Governor of the Bank of England goes on about it, but as soon as moral hazard is affected by the banks, which were brought by their own follies and excesses into a disastrous situation, we rush in with money to pour into them. Manufacturing does not get that money. We poured money into the banks—that is a large part of the borrowing that we are arguing about—and we probably had to do so to save the banks, but nothing is going to, for instance, the steel industry in Teesside. What has gone to Vestas on the Isle of Wight, which is the country's only remaining wind turbine producer? What has gone to the manufacturing firms that are closing down and shedding labour, making people redundant? What is happening to them? We shall need their production, skills and output if there is to be any recovery of manufacturing and the economy, but we are allowing them to close down without Government support.

The Government have poured money into the banks, and all that the banks have done with it is build up their reserves. They have not passed it on or relaxed their credit arrangements. Manufacturing is experiencing a double whammy. Money is being poured into the organisations that caused the crisis in the first place rather than into manufacturing, which has suffered the consequences, and the organisations that caused the crisis in the first place—the banks—are starving manufacturing of credit, refusing to tide it over until it can inherit the better times.

This is a pathetic economic policy. Even the Government's policy of printing money—which is effectively what we are doing—does not really help manufacturing. What printing money does is, by buying back Government debt, buoy up the stock market and asset prices. It helps the financial sector, which holds the debt—primarily the hedge funds that have been selling that debt back to the Government at an inordinate profit to themselves—but it does nothing for manufacturing, the sector that we need to help and support.

All the devaluations of the past—the devaluations of 1949 and 1967, the Tory devaluation of 1972-73 and the classic devaluation of 1992, when we were forced out of the exchange rate mechanism—have boosted manufacturing. Productivity and growth have increased, and the whole economy has been stimulated. We cannot let the boost that we have provided now, with a 25 per cent. devaluation, slip away as the last few prizes of devaluation slipped away. We must maintain a competitive exchange rate.

More important, we must have an appropriate industrial policy. Exchange rate competitiveness, which means a low exchange rate, is a necessary but not sufficient condition for manufacturing revival. There has to be an industrial policy that will channel investment into manufacturing, help to see it through its difficulties, and break the bottlenecks. Whether we support planning, training, investment, research, design, development or marketing, we must help industry to move forward. We cannot wash our hands of manufacturing if we are to have a viable economy.

Mr. Timms: I am listening to my hon. Friend's speech with great interest. Like the rest of us, he will have been pleased to hear what the Engineering Employers Federation said the other day about manufacturers bringing manufacturing back to the United Kingdom, partly for the reason that he has cited—the exchange rate change—but also because of the benefits of greater reliability and better quality. Before the events of the last couple of years, engineering employers were talking of a renaissance in United Kingdom manufacturing. I think we can afford to be optimistic about the future.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has made a valid point. I was delighted to hear the news that people who had been outsourcing—which produced a series of holes in the fabric of Britain's industrial society—are now bringing the work back to this country, partly because of the devaluation. I want that process to continue, but the Government, and my hon. Friends in general, must bear in mind that this manufacturing recovery is starting from a low and damaged base. It must go a great deal further, and must be encouraged and supported by Government, before it can produce the effects that I have described.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

We have a mountain to climb before we can again provide jobs for the people, pay our way in the world, and rebuild the manufacturing base from which innovation, productivity and national survival spring. That should have been the main message of the pre-Budget report, and because it is not, I am a little disappointed in it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No time limit was applied to today's debate, but the average length of the speeches from the Back Benches has been about 20 minutes. On that basis, we will get only three more contributions. Speeches need to be half that length if everyone is to have an opportunity to speak. I appeal to Members to be as friendly as they can to their neighbours.

4.40 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I will do my best, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

On Tuesday, the Government's flagship Bill, the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, attracted the active interest of just two Government Back Benchers—and they both opposed the Bill. I am not entirely sure that the support that the Government have received from the Back Benches today will be much more welcome. That is not to say that I disagree with everything that all those Members have said. My good friend the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) spoke about the importance of manufacturing. I entirely agree. Nevertheless there are ways of getting there.

I hope that I will be present for the winding-up speeches. There are some issues about travel this evening and I apologise to Front Benchers if I am not here for their speeches. I will check my trains once I sit down.

> "There were two tests for this Pre-Budget report. First, would it increase the credibility of government plans to restore the public finances? Second, would it be a platform for job creation and economic growth? The government has failed on both counts."

Those are not my words but those of the CBI director general speaking on the day of the pre-Budget report. It is not just big business that has spoken in that way. The Federation of Small Businesses reported that 44 per cent. of small businesses were less confident as a result of the PBR. I do not think that it has been said so far in the debate that we need to remember that the PBR bombed comprehensively on the day and calm and more careful consideration has not made it look much better.

It is important to remember that this is a tragedy not just for the corporate sector, small, large or medium, but for thousands of individuals. The number of 16 to 24-year-olds out of work was 952,000 in the three months to October, a quarterly rise of 6,000 and the highest figure since records began in 1992. The OECD said in September that Britain now has the highest level of youth unemployment in Europe. That for me, of all the shameful failures of this Government, is perhaps the most shameful. I think that that statistic is not properly understood outside this place. I can imagine what would happen if a Conservative Government presided over youth unemployment on that scale. There would be shrieks of horror and outrage from Labour Members, who are very muted today, and tragically so.

I am grateful to the Chairman of the Treasury Committee for his thoughtful contribution to the debate. It was measured, as was the Treasury Committee report that came out yesterday. It is important to remember that it, too, called for much greater clarity over spending reduction plans. It expressed concern about future gilt sales and highlighted fears about Britain's future credit rating. The PBR is being debated in an extremely worrying situation.

I am fond of metaphors. I hope that this is an appropriate one. I see the Prime Minister a little like an arsonist who helped to start a blaze and then wants credit for stopping it from destroying the whole town. Stopping the blaze before it destroyed everything should not be a cause for congratulation if one is the author of the blaze itself.

Three specific and serious mistakes by the Prime Minister when he was Chancellor, which are the background to the PBR, led directly to the recession, or at least its severity. The first was excessive spending in the good times—not mending the roof while the sun was shining. In fact, I would add that his plans added holes to the roof, funded by taxes on the bubble of finance and housing—a bubble that could never endure.

The second problem is excessive debt, built up not just in the public sector, but in the private and corporate sectors, encouraged by the Prime Minister's false promise when he was Chancellor of an end to boom and bust. Thirdly, there was poor regulation of financial services. At least two of those factors were present in the United States of America too, but it will not do for the Prime Minister to claim that the problems that underlie the PBR have their origins in the States or the international economy. They have their origins here, too. The Prime Minister is to blame for the crisis that this country now faces. He has earned no right to be praised, as this country has been mired in the deepest recession since the 1930s and he is part of the reason for that.

It cannot be said too often that Britain is the only G20 country officially still in recession. We might come out of recession in the current quarter, but the fact remains that this has been a huge and severe recession. It has been a personal tragedy for many thousands of our fellow citizens, and the UK has suffered a 6 per cent. cut in the size of its economy, beaten in that regard only by Japan, Italy and, I think, Germany. We have lost that for ever; as growth returns, we will still have lost that part of our economy.

According to a construction survey, the British building industry suffered its 22nd successive monthly fall in activity in December, and employment in the contracting sector fell again last month. Many businesses still fear a double-dip recession, and consumer and business confidence is still fragile, to put it mildly. The PBR succeeded in denting consumer confidence further. Yet, for all this, the Prime Minister wants credit.

The tragedy for our nation is that this is a pre-election PBR. At this time of great economic crisis for the nation, it would be better if we were not on the verge of an election. The PBR has become a product of electoral expediency, not economic necessity. Tragically, it has also exposed the deep divisions at the heart of Government, as well as a very unwelcome desire to create divisions and add dividing lines in politics in general at a time when we should be doing precisely the opposite.

Yesterday, Lord Mandelson made a very thoughtful speech, which was occasionally devalued by political point scoring. In it, he said:

> "We need a politics of long-termism over short-termism; of a smarter, more effective and affordable state; of a return to the values of hard work, enterprise, corporate stewardship and mutual commitment over those of dodging responsibility, making a fast buck, and putting self before others; of working together as a nation to address the shared challenges of the future."

I agree with that, but all we got on 9 December was short-termism by the bucket load. We got a larger, less effective, less affordable state. We got taxes on hard work and enterprise, and deliberate dividing lines designed to split us apart, not bring us together.

Lord Mandelson was right, and the PBR was wrong. As was said in The Guardian recently:

> "The Government remains at war with itself, with Brown, Balls and Cooper pursuing the line of 'Labour spending versus Tory cuts' and Mandelson and Darling favouring a pragmatic, deficit-slashing PBR. We can see who won. Lord Mandelson is apparently still seething with anger—'incandescent' at the outcome of the PBR."

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) said in his thoughtful remarks, this Government's reaction of retreating entirely into increasing taxes rather than attacking public expenditure is the problem. The large increases in national insurance on all of us in society—including those on below-average earnings—and the 50 per cent. income tax rate are taxes on aspiration, enterprise and hard work.

Lord Mandelson tried to justify that in his speech yesterday. He said that > "there is never a case for punitive taxation", but he also said:

> "As for the new top income tax rate, I believe that is justified in the quite exceptional circumstances we face."

What are those exceptional circumstances? As was said in the Financial Times on 11 December, the national insurance increase

> "will raise £3 billion a year from 2011, but that money is not being used to pay down the £178 billion deficit; the tax rise is needed to offset Mr. Darling's surprise decision to increase public spending by almost £15 billion in 2011 and 2012 compared with previous plans."

As the Centre for Economics and Business Research put it:

> "If public sector wage inflation had risen at the same time as that in the private sector over the past two years, £21 billion of the national insurance and income tax rises to be introduced in April would have been unnecessary."

These are Government decisions that are making our problems worse, not better. They are taxes on jobs, aspiration and enterprise. They may win some short-term cheers in the run-up to an election, but in the long run they will cause more pain, suffering and economic problems.

The same is true of the bankers' bonuses tax. I loathe the scale of the bonuses, and I agree with the Chairman of the Treasury Committee, the right hon. Member for West Dunbartonshire (John McFall) on that, but not only have the measures to address that been brought forward in a technically incompetent way which caused massive confusion in the City, but they will have a negative impact on our competitiveness. We cannot duck that. We do not live in an isolated country any longer, and I do not see our chief economic competitors—the United States and Germany, for instance—following our lead on that matter.

The scale of our debt mountain is great, and I find it incredible that Government Members are advocating still higher debt. In this week's edition of The Economist, estimates of various countries' budget balances as a percentage of GDP for 2009 are listed. By a long chalk, Britain's is the highest, followed by the United States. Only Spain joins us in having double-digit figures. All the rest of the major industrial nations of the world, and some very minor ones as well, are running smaller budget deficits than us.

In September—before the PBR—The Times illustrated that dramatically in a leader entitled, "Fainting by numbers". I had hoped to have the time to recite quite a few of those numbers, but bearing in mind your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will not do so. I shall just use one. The article stated:

> "The most succinct statistic is also the scariest: by the 2013-14 financial year, government spending on welfare and on servicing the national debt will total £257.1 billion. How much does that amount to exactly? Just over £1 in every £3 that will be spent by the Government."

In other words, these are the bills of failure. I remember what Tony Blair said when he was in opposition about what he described then as the "bills of failure". Those bills pale into insignificance by this scale; we are talking about massive borrowing and massive social security expenditure. Those bills of failure have been brought about by this Government. Richard Lambert's new year message from the CBI stated:

> "The Government has not yet established a credible path back to fiscal stability for the UK. The longer this is delayed, the greater the threat to long-term interest rates and sterling. Everyone knows that painful decisions are going to have to be made sooner or later about public spending and tax. But the timing and shape of these moves remain unclear—and that is another significant concern for business."

I have already said that the problem is that the Government did not fix the roof when the sun was shining, and that is true—the structural deficit is alarmingly high. It is a structural deficit; it is not the product of bank bail-outs and so on. It is the problem of systemic Government failure to manage the public finances appropriately. The Institute for Fiscal Studies wrote the following on the day of the pre-Budget report:

> "The Treasury now believes that the structural budget deficit—the portion of government borrowing that cannot be explained by the temporary weakness of the economy—is 'only' 9 per cent. of national income this year, rather than the 9.8 per cent. it estimated at Budget time. This means that the underlying fiscal problem looks somewhat smaller than it did in March, although still huge by any standard."

It is indeed huge by any standard, but I must add that that is predicated on the very optimistic forecast of a return to above-trend growth rates in two or three years' time. I do not believe that forecast; I do not think we will do that well. Thus, the problem of dealing with this situation is still worse.

I had wanted to talk in detail about one or two specific issues, but I shall just run through them very briefly. I wished to discuss the lack of finance for manufacturing and businesses in general, but that has been done and so I shall not reiterate the point—I should just say that the situation is extremely worrying. I would have liked to talk about the comments made by those on the Liberal Front Bench about across-the-board cuts in science, but I shall not do that either.

[Peter Luff]

However, I wish briefly to mention manufacturing. I do not want to talk it down—not for a second. It is right to say that, notwithstanding the current recession, manufacturing has grown over the past 13 years under this Government, but it has shrunk massively as a proportion of gross domestic product; it has done that so much more over this period than it did under the so-called Thatcher years. The Government need to think carefully about their policies to deal with that problem and this pre-Budget report does not do that. It talks a lot about future growth, high-technology industries and low-carbon industries, but many traditional industries, for example brick making in my constituency and glass making, have been hit very hard by decisions in this PBR about alterations to the climate change agreements. We are talking about very sharp stealth taxes on traditional manufacturing industries that will lead to further manufacturing job losses in this country, the import from abroad of the products that would have been made here and carbon leakage—no gain, just loss. I urge the Government to think a bit more about traditional industries, as well as about future industries.

I also urge the Government to examine the reasons for the failure of the automotive assistance programme, which has still not delivered a single penny to any automotive business in the United Kingdom a year after it was launched. I welcome the extension of the enterprise finance guarantee scheme, despite the cynic in me thinking that it may have something to do with the fact that the scheme has not got money out of the door quickly enough and the money is still left in the bank, so the Government are extending the period in order to use the same amount of money over a longer time.

The one other issue that I wish to raise is that of a windfall—there is some good news—about which I know the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is aware. It comes from the digital dividend review. I am talking about the sale of the spectrum, which will result in the digital dividend. That spectrum is used largely by television, but it is also used by radio microphones, which are crucial to community halls, outside broadcasting, music, theatre and a range of interests. The Government originally promised to compensate such interests in full for evicting them from the spectrum. The cost of that eviction is about £70 million to £75 million, but it should unlock a windfall of £2 billion for the Treasury. I hope that the Government will stick to their promises, and I have received some encouraging answers from the Minister, who was wearing both of his hats this morning—operating as a Department for Business, Innovation and Skills Minister and as a Treasury Minister—to suggest that they might just do that. I hope that he will stick to that, because that £75 million is the permission to unlock a £2 billion windfall for the Government.

We are not out of the woods yet. The international banking crisis could still get worse. Net lending to companies is still shrinking and we face huge structural problems, but I believe that they can be faced in the lifetime of the next Parliament. As Richard Lambert put it

> "the job of political and business leaders is to focus relentlessly on those policies that will enable a different and more sustainable pattern of economic growth for the future—education and skills, enterprise and innovation, competitive taxes and flexible labour markets, private sector investment, trade growth and open markets."

Sadly, there is little sign of that in this PBR.

4.55 pm

Derek Twigg (Halton) (Lab): First, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I apologise for the fact that I will be unable to stay for the closing speeches? It has been a pleasure to listen to the debate and some excellent speeches have been made.

The PBR represents firm action to help secure recovery, to go for growth and to halve the deficit in four years while protecting key services, and the subject of key services and public services in general will form a major part of my speech. I believe that the PBR offers a balanced package, and the best economic approach for long-term stability. The Government are taking tough decisions to halve the deficit and to make a range of savings and efficiencies that we know, in some cases, will be very difficult indeed.

I particularly welcome the commitment in the PBR to spending on schools and to NHS expenditure, the increase in the basic state pension and the child element of the child tax credit.

I also want to highlight the issues to do with the tax on bank bonuses, which is very important. We should not be put off by scaremongering. Many of my constituents welcome that tax, as do most people in the country. Some people in the banks got off very lightly indeed. I also welcome the measures to do with tax evasion and tax avoidance, which are very important for fairness and will raise a significant amount of money. They will play an important role in ensuring that we get that money in and that we stop people avoiding and evading tax.

I want to spend some time discussing the issue of employment. I was pleased to see in the PBR that £300 million will be brought forward to offer a job, training or a work placement to every 18 to 24-year-old who has been claiming jobseeker's allowance for six months. Unemployment is a great concern and many people in my constituency have suffered from the economic downturn. However, unlike the Opposition, we have not walked away from that and we are doing all we can not just through the fiscal stimulus but through the other methods that I shall come to shortly. When the Opposition were last in government, they said that unemployment was a price worth paying. We should never forget that.

In Halton in the 1980s, almost one person in five in my constituency was unemployed. Many were pushed on to incapacity benefit. Let me give some figures that I mentioned before. For instance, in August 1985, 19.1 per cent. of the 16-to-19 age group were unemployed. In August 2009, 6.7 per cent. of that age group were unemployed. That is still obviously too many, and we have to do more, but the fact that one in five of my constituents were unemployed for many years shows the massive scale of the problems that we faced then.

We should also not forget the record interest rate of more than 15 per cent. Rates were very high for a very long time, and many people lost their homes. We saw record levels of repossessions with no help from the Government of the time. I am pleased that we are doing more on that. We have helped people to stay in their homes and I hope that the Government will continue to do more. Of course, it is still a personal tragedy for those who lose their homes.

I also want to welcome the improvement in support for debt counselling and advice services and access to them. The PBR provides extra money for citizens advice bureaux, which have helped many people to stay in their homes and to get their debts under some sort of control. Only this week I had a call from a constituent who thanked me for helping her by putting her in touch with the right people to get debt advice. She was then able to get an agreement with the mortgage provider and can now stay in her home. That is not untypical of what has been going on during this economic downturn.

The stimulus has been very important in dealing with unemployment, but my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will not be surprised to hear that infrastructure projects are one of the big areas in providing employment and stimulus. May I remind him of the proposed new Mersey crossing? It is a £400 million project and the report of the inspector's recommendations and the inquiry that took place last year is due to land on the desk of the Secretary of State in the next few weeks. The crossing will provide hundreds of construction jobs over the next few years, if it is approved, and about 4,000 or 5,000 jobs thereafter through the economic benefits that it will bring. So, as well as improving the congestion problems in my constituency, and in Merseyside and Cheshire, it is very important for jobs. I hope that when the report lands on the Treasury's desk, the project will get the quickest approval possible.

I want to spend a little of the short time available to me talking about public spending, which the Conservative party sees as a great evil. There have been massive improvements during Labour's time in government: Labour Government expenditure has brought great improvements throughout the country, not least in many public services in my constituency. Many people now take those services for granted, and it is worth reminding them what has happened. The greatest contrast is between hospital waiting lists now and previously, when it was common for people to wait two years or more for an operation. Those waiting times are now down to a few months or even weeks in some cases. That has been a massive turnaround. If anything shows the differences between now and previously, that change is it.

Other benefits in my constituency are the modernisation of many schools with the provision of new buildings and sporting facilities. There have also been tremendous improvements educationally, with many great improvements in exam results. There have been improvements in transport and significant improvements in local health services and access to such services. Whiston hospital, for example, which serves many of my constituents, has received investments of £250 million. There are many private rooms in that hospital. We would like to know what the Tory promise is on private rooms, because they seem to be backtracking again. That brand-new, modern facility will serve my constituents and the wider area, replacing the Victorian buildings that the Tories always thought were okay for treating our people in. There are also improved cancer services, and more doctors and nurses.

Let me make a point about the current weather situation and public expenditure. We should not forget the cold weather payments that are being made. The winter fuel allowance is particularly important to pensioners and the disabled. I want to make that point very clear. The free bus pass for pensioners and the disabled is another thing that is often taken for granted now, and is another example of good public expenditure.

It is important to remind people what life was like under a Conservative Government. We have only to remember Black Wednesday and what happened to the pound then. There were record unemployment rates of more than 3 million, two recessions, long NHS waiting lists, as I have mentioned, and record numbers of repossessions. That is what life was like under a Conservative Government. Even on tax, the Conservatives' record was dodgy. It took them almost 18 years to reduce the tax burden—that was a long-held promise that they made early on in their years of power—so even they had trouble doing that. We should remind people about that.

I believe that our approach to the economy is the right one, and that the Conservative approach lacks credibility—whatever that approach will finally be. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) refused to give a date for when he wanted the deficit to be halved when I asked him to do so. He was asked about that two or three times. It is clear that a Conservative Government would revert to type, would introduce massive cuts in public expenditure and would not support public services or maintain the improvements that the Labour Government have made.

Any Government will have to make significant savings, but the speed and scale of the savings will be crucial. That is the difference between the Conservatives and us: we will continue to put whatever stimulus we can into the economy and will also improve public services. The scale of cuts could be horrendous under the Conservatives, but we do not know what the full scale would be because they are not being open and honest about what they intend to do. I believe that we have the right approach to deal with the situation.

I also believe that the people of this country will not be fooled by what the Conservatives are saying. They know what the Conservatives are like and what will be reintroduced if they get back into power. I believe that they will stick with and trust the Labour Government, having seen Labour's good management of the economy. The economic downturn has been handled well, and we have been seen as a world leader in that regard. The downturn has been very difficult for millions of people in this country, but by having a stimulus, by improving public expenditure in certain areas and through good stewardship, we can continue to bring improvements for the future of this country, its public services and the economy.

5.4 pm

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): When the Chancellor introduced the pre-Budget report, the focus was rightly on the big deficit and big debt numbers. Those numbers included the £178 billion to be borrowed, the £1.7 trillion of national debt forecast for 2014-15 on the Treasury calculation and a share of national debt that will exceed £60,000 per household. They captured the headlines, along with the tax rises, the return of VAT to 17 per cent., and the introduction of the 50 per cent. top rate of income tax. Other headlines were devoted to the introduction of a fuel duty escalator from this spring, and to the national insurance increases for the employed, the self-employed and for employers.

[Stewart Hosie]

Those were the things that captured the headlines. The Government concede that their total package of measures, and the tax rises in particular, will make up about one third of the £57 billion deficit reduction that they need to make after growth, with the remaining two thirds coming from cuts.

Labour has already announced cuts worth £800 million to the Scottish budget, but it is the cuts to UK spending Departments that will almost certainly have a huge impact across the UK and in Scotland. Those cuts have been hidden due to the lack of a comprehensive spending review, which will not now happen until after the election.

However, the Chancellor did say many things in the PBR. He said that his task was

> "to ensure the recovery and promote long-term growth".—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol.502, c. 359.]

Yet the PBR and its measures will do no such things, as they will apply the swingeing cuts in public investment that are to come. The Fiscal Responsibility Bill confirms the total level of the cuts, which will do nothing in the short term to secure recovery and promote longer-term growth. Quite the reverse: the cuts—dishonestly presented without a CSR—will suck the lifeblood out of the economy, and make recovery more difficult.

I suspect that there are few people left in the House who fail to understand that it was the 2.2 per cent. increase in Government consumption that pumped some life into the economy at a time when household expenditure fell by 3.6 per cent., business investment fell by 22 per cent, and gross fixed capital formation declined by 17 per cent. I want to spend a little time on the latter point: it is not much spoken about, but it is vital.

Gross fixed capital formation is the investment in capital assets such as the plant, machinery and technology that will be needed in the future. So where were the plans to help that grow? There were few, or none, in the PBR.

The problem is not just with this PBR and what the Government are planning in the middle of the recession, but that the Government's track record when it comes to encouraging investment in gross fixed capital formation has been so weak. Since 1997, the UK has had the lowest average investment of any G20 OECD 12 country. Our investment has averaged 17 per cent., while the OECD G20 group has averaged over 21 per cent. For the six years between 2003 and 2008, our investment in capital formation was the lowest of any of the G20 countries. Between 1997 and 2007, only Russia spent less, and between 2001 and 2002, only Turkey invested less.

Even in the broader list of G2O countries as a whole, only Argentina and Brazil have invested less than this Labour Government have since they came to power. Indeed, since 1997 there has not been a single year when the Prime Minister—either as Prime Minister or Chancellor—has seen a UK investment level that was not below the EU average. That demonstrates that the problem is not confined to now or this PBR, as we have had a systemic problem of under-investment in productive capacity since this Government came to office.

Why is that important? Many hon. Members who have spoken today have said that we have to get back to inventing, developing and making things, and providing the jobs in manufacturing—of all sorts— that our people need. I agree: to paraphrase what the Chief Secretary said earlier, we need to rebalance the economy.

This is all about jobs and, to be fair to him, the Chancellor spoke about jobs and employment a great deal in his PBR speech. He did not tell us that unemployment now is higher than it was under the Tories in 1997, when Labour came to power, and he glossed over the problem of the 943,000 youngsters who are unemployed under Labour now. That is a higher figure than when Labour came to power in 1997.

However, those are not the key things. The key question is: what is the Chancellor's plan? The plan, it would appear, is to slash public investment too quickly and so weaken the chances of recovery. The result of that will be that tackling the deficit and the debt will be rendered more difficult, as will creating employment and jobs—especially if the heroic growth rates fail to materialise, or if we tip back into a double-dip recession. I am afraid that unemployment will keep on rising, as it did for two years after the technical end of the 1991 recession and for three years after the technical end of the 1980-81 recession.

In the pre-Budget report, the Chancellor said that > "we need to invest in the dynamic sectors of the future—in digital".—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol. 502, c. 359.]

Here are some responses from those who work in the digital industry, which is vital to Dundee. Colin MacDonald, studio manager at developers Realtime Worlds, described the PBR as a "missed opportunity". Alan Mitchell, the chief executive of the local chamber of commerce, said that there were encouraging signs, but that many measures were a waste of time and that > "there was no specific mention of the games industry."

Dr. Richard Wilson, of TIGA, the software firms' association, said:

> "While the public finances need to be brought under control…the UK economy desperately needs to go for growth."

But, of course, there was nothing in the PBR for the games sector in particular.

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that there was a substantial announcement of support for a centre of excellence, including for companies in Dundee. We will continue to look at the industry's case for a change to tax treatment.

Stewart Hosie: I am delighted that the case for a change in the tax regime will continue to be monitored. I am also aware of the announcement of the project in Salford.

Mr. Timms: And in Dundee.

Stewart Hosie: I shall return to the Dundee aspect.

A great deal of public money is to be spent on that centre, but I wrote to the Minister or one of his colleagues to suggest that they needed not only to be very careful of unintended consequences, but to ensure that the vast amount of public money being invested in the new centre did not have a detrimental effect on the sector and on employment in the city. I am very well aware of the centre and the potential risks that follow it.

The Chancellor spoke about the need to invest in the digital and other dynamic sectors of the economy, but for those at the coal face of the digital economy there was little but let-down in the PBR. The reason I cite the software and games sector is not just because it is important to Dundee, but because it is an export business; it generates revenue for the UK. In the PBR the Chancellor said that export trade had been hit hard, and boy was he right.

We had a total trade deficit of £37 billion last year, and a colossal £93 billion deficit in the trade in goods—all that, as others have said, at a time when sterling was down massively against the dollar and the euro. As a result, GDP growth was suppressed by about 1.5 per cent., but there was nothing in the PBR specifically to stimulate export activity other than the statement's vain hope that demand from the US and the euro area might pick up.

The Red Book suggested that GDP would be enhanced by about 0.5 per cent.—that there would be a 0.5 per cent. contribution to GDP growth from 2010 onwards. But, given that, on average, the balance of trade deficit suppressed such growth between 2000 and 2007, I hope that that is not Government wishful thinking.

I am conscious that other people want to speak, so I shall make three final brief points. First, the Chancellor said:

> "We must continue to support the economy until recovery is established."—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol. 502, c. 359-60.]

But on Tuesday he said that we are still in recession, yet the cuts have already been announced, so that makes no sense.

Secondly, the Chancellor said:

> "To cut support now could wreck the recovery. That is a risk that I am not prepared to take."—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol. 502, c. 360.]

However, the International Monetary Fund has confirmed that the UK will be the only G7 economy fully to withdraw its fiscal stimulus measures in 2010.

Finally, on the low-carbon economy, the Chancellor said that he was determined to build on strengths today by maintaining what he called the UK's

> "leadership in the low-carbon sector".—[Official Report, 9 December 2009; Vol. 502, c. 364.]

However, we have heard it all before. The 2005 Budget stated:

> "The Government is…examining how it might support the development of CCS"— carbon capture and storage. The 2005 pre-Budget report stated:

> "Carbon capture and storage protects the environment from carbon emissions by containing them at source."

In the 2006 Budget statement, the Chancellor said that following a joint study with the Norwegian Government, the Government were going to take measures on carbon capture and storage, and the same thing was repeated in the 2006 pre-Budget report and the 2007 Budget statement. We had one such statement after another up until early 2007, and by 23 May BP had pulled out its £500 million investment in Peterhead and taken it to Abu Dhabi because this Government could not make a decision. That shows the systemic problems that we have. There is talk about investing in digital, and then disappointment for those in the sector; talk about not withdrawing the stimulus before the recovery, and then doing precisely that; and talking a good game on the low-carbon economy, and then failing to deliver. That has been the hallmark of this Government over many years.

At its heart—this is a tragedy, because there is a big job of work to be done to tackle the problems in the economy—the PBR was an invented political dividing line whereby the Government pretended that one party was not cutting and that another one or two parties might do so. The truth is that whether it is a Labour cut, a Liberal cut or a Tory cut, making it too early and too quickly will damage everybody's chances of recovery.

5.16 pm

Phil Wilson (Sedgefield) (Lab): This is a general debate on the pre-Budget report, but it is a good opportunity for Members in all parts of the House to get various points across on a very important issue.

For me, the PBR was about whose side the Government are on. I believe that the Chancellor proved in his statement that they are on the side of the people from hard-working families who were left behind in previous recessions because unemployment was seen as a price worth paying. This Government do not believe that it should be the function of financial markets to make money out of other people's misery. The PBR was about making choices and naming priorities. The Government's whole economic strategy, since the global economic crisis started in autumn 2008, has been to be on the side of the people.

In my constituency, unemployment currently stands at 2,361. Yes, it has gone up during the recession, but it is still half what it was during the 1980s, when 5,500 people in my constituency were out of work—40 per cent. of them, or more than 2,000, for more than 12 months. Today, about 88,000 people in the north-east are out of work; in the 1990s, at the height of the recession, the figure was more than 100,000, and in the 1980s it was more than 200,000. Today, 1.5 million people are on jobseeker's allowance; in the 1980s, more than 3 million were claiming the equivalent benefit. Today, youth unemployment, if we strip out those young people who are in full-time studies, stands at 9 per cent.; in the 1990s, it was 12 per cent., and in the 1980s it was 13 per cent. Some people expected home repossessions to go through the roof; they have not, but they did in the 1990s. People thought that businesses would go to the wall more rapidly, but they have not, unlike in the 1990s. Today, 70 per cent. of people who are out of work find a job within six months, and the future jobs fund will guarantee that every 18 to 24-year-old receives training after six months. A package of £5 billion is being spent to ensure that our young people get through the downturn. Some people would not have spent that money because they believed the recession should have been allowed to take its course, but surely this initiative is underpinning the economy by helping consumption, which in itself helps to create growth.

However, things are still tough. It was right that the Government intervened to introduce the fiscal stimulus, which has prevented the economy from entering a second great depression; the rest of the world is doing something similar. We are able to borrow money to aid the recovery because before the global economic crisis our debt levels were lower than those of a lot of our competitors. In the Fiscal Responsibility Bill, the Government have said that over four years they intend to cut the deficit by 50 per cent. from 12.6 to 5.5 per cent. They have identified billions of pounds of savings through "smarter Government" reforms. There is a new 50 per cent. tax band, an increase in national insurance, and a payroll tax on bank bonuses. Because of the fiscal stimulus measures taken by the Government, growth will also enter into the equation eventually.

[Phil Wilson]

The Tories lack the political judgment that is needed in tough times. They were wrong on the recession and they are wrong on the recovery. To me, that is a fundamental dividing line between the Government and the Opposition. The Conservatives are the only main political party that aspires to government in any of the 186 states of the Iinternational Monatary Fund that actually believes the fiscal stimulus was a mistake.

The Opposition want to do away with dividing lines, and they have started to say that the Government are using class war. That is not the right attitude to take, and in a democracy it is the wrong way to approach politics. The success of this Government is based on a broad coalition of beliefs in the country and it cuts across so-called class divides, which is why in a few months' time we will win the next election. The other reason is that my constituents are deeply concerned about what would be taken away from them if ever the Tories got into government.

In all my years of political involvement, the only evidence of class war that I have ever experienced was the division created within, and the ultimate closure of, the communities that I grew up in by the Conservative Government during the 1980s. Communities were closed and left behind. To me, the backdrop of "Billy Elliot" is not just a west end show; it is something I lived through. I will never believe the Leader of the Opposition when he purports to be a progressive Conservative until he apologises for the callous behaviour of his predecessors. Class war should remain back in the 1980s—I actually agree with the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) about that.

Since then we have had 13 years of a Labour Government, and now we have something called the "progressive Conservatives" because the Opposition know that to stand any chance of getting elected, they have to prove that they have moved on and been reincarnated into a more cuddly version of their former selves. But they have not changed. We now see dividing lines that they interpret as class war. I do not really care whether the Leader of the Opposition went to Eton; my predecessor went to Fettes college, which was seen as being the Eton of Scotland. However, I must say that as a parent I would be really disappointed if I spent all that money on my children's education and they still turned out to be Tory MPs. At least my predecessor obviously learned something.

I understand that there are something like 15 Etonians on the Conservative Front Bench. What would they say if there were 15 Members on the Government Front Bench at any one time who had attended, let us say, Sedgefield comprehensive school or Wellfield community school in my constituency—two perfectly good schools with excellent teachers and pupils—or any other state school, for that matter? What would be the reaction of some? That it was a conspiracy and that the old school network had penetrated the highest echelons of the establishment. Surely that should not be allowed to happen.

I want people from all backgrounds, including from all state schools, to be given the opportunity that has been the preserve of the few for so long. That is why this Government have invested so much in education and the Opposition have opposed it. Any pupil of any school should be allowed to aspire to serve in government, and the broader their experience the better. That is aspiration, and it is what the PBR is intended to underpin.

For me, the PBR is symbolic of the Government's intent, and the Opposition's criticism of the report's fundamentals also speaks volumes. I am not surprised that they want to do away with any talk of dividing lines and are trying to say that it is about class war, because they are on the wrong side of the argument. For all their efforts, they have not changed. They are not progressive Conservatives at all—how can a person be? They can be either progressive or conservative. A progressive would have voted for the creation of the NHS; a conservative would have voted against it. A progressive would have voted in favour of the minimum wage; a conservative would have voted against it. A progressive would vote for investment in health and education; a conservative would vote against it. In this House, I am pleased to be on the side of the progressive. A progressive looks for consensus and acts accordingly. A conservative, in the country's hour of need, makes it his priority to cut tax for the 3,000 largest estates. In this recession, who is looking after the concerns of the many and who is looking after the vested interests of the few?

I wish to say one thing about bankers and bonuses. I read a report in The Times on 4 January stating that Deutsche Bank, which incidentally lost $10 billion during the credit crunch, wants to spread its UK tax across the pot that it holds globally because, as its chief executive officer said, it would be "unfair to treat the UK bankers differently".

He wants all his bankers around the world who are due bonuses to do some of the heavy lifting. Basically, that gives us an opportunity. The Government should be acting internationally to ensure that bankers are treated the same all around the world. The problem we have is a global challenge. Economies acting in concert should consider a Tobin tax. Even if we do not have a Tobin tax, we need to create mechanisms that help to stabilise international transactions, so that financial planning is a long-term objective and transactions are not used as a means of short-term gain.

While hundreds of thousands of our constituents pay the price for the bankers' failures, the Opposition do not think twice about filling their election coffers with millions of pounds from the City, including from Stanley Fink, the supposed godfather of hedge funds, who has given £1 million to the Tory party. In fact, on the way to half the cash raised by the Tories has come from the City. It is no wonder that one of their priorities is to cut tax for 3,000 large estates. So much for progressive conservatism.

I want to say one last thing about how we get out of this recession and about the Tories' approach to the PBR. They basically want to create a quango rather than have Parliament oversee how we get ourselves through this time and pay down the debt in the next four years. Ultimately, that is about what kind of society we want. We want a good society, governed by smart government. The only way that we are ever going to achieve that is through this PBR and this Government acting with the people to ensure that we elect a Labour Government in a few weeks' time.

5.26 pm

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I recognise the difficult balancing act the Chancellor faced in compiling the pre-Budget report in the most difficult economic and financial circumstances that we have faced in many years, as he will with the Budget proper. However, on fairness and taxation, I and many others believe that he has not quite got the balance right.

Every economy will have its peaks and troughs. No Government are potent enough to abolish the economic cycle, and no Government in the free world can dictate human nature, with its swings of optimism and pessimism, and the credit cycle, which results from the expansion of banking and credit over the centuries. However, it is important that the Government recognise the dangers and weaknesses within the modern free market and act accordingly, through fiscal and monetary policy in wider economic management, and through a robust framework of regulation, and the willingness to act promptly, when the public interest demands it, in the financial markets.

Before becoming an MP, my career was in banking and then in financial journalism. Latterly, I was the City editor of a national newspaper. From the early 1980s, I either witnessed close-up or reported in detail on each major financial and economic crisis as it unfolded, including the 1987 stock market crash, the 1990s recession, sterling's ignominious exit from the European exchange rate mechanism, the problems that engulfed the Lloyd's insurance market—the so-called LMX spiral—when nobody knew where the risks really lay, and the bail-out in the late 1990s of the massive US hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management, which happened because the Clinton Administration and, importantly, Wall Street, did not know where the liability merry-go-round would stop and how much damage could be done to the global financial system. The unique problem in my working life—it forms the context of this PBR—is the current credit crunch and global recession. In this crisis, the aspects of those other crises, save for the problem of maintaining a fixed exchange rate, have descended on us at the same time.

History will tell, but arguably the key individual action that crystallised the credit crunch, ignoring previous lessons from the 1990s, was the Bush Administration's decision to let Lehman Brothers go to the wall. Equally arguably, the single most important policy action to contain the damage was taken first not in the United States but here in the UK—prompt and decisive action to rescue the banking system by the Chancellor and the Government. That happened not in the bankers' interests, but in the public interest. Also in the public interest, the Government responded to stimulate demand and to contain a more damaging downward economic spiral, as any intelligent reader of history would have done. That is the background against which the Chancellor delivered the PBR before Christmas.

The key difference between this recession and the one in the 1990s is that in this one, the Government have taken positive action to ameliorate its effects—they have not simply let events take their toll on industry and ordinary families. The key difference with the 1980s is that this recession was precipitated by a massive shock to the financial system. True, it was not helped by over-lax financial regulation, with the Government, in good economic times, continuing the previous Conservative approach. But unlike the 1980s' recessions, it was not brought on by the Government themselves through ideological experiments in monetary policy as a dose of harsh medicine, a self-inflicted pain that harmed much of our manufacturing industry, especially in areas such as mine in north Staffordshire, and permanently blighted much of our economy and many of our local economies.

Any reasonable person should welcome the individual measures in the PBR to help industry and businesses, as well as the determination not to jeopardise recovery by cutting Government spending too far or too fast. However, I would have liked the Government to go further on manufacturing. The financial crisis has delivered the sharpest lessons on the dangers of over-reliance on the financial sector and the City of London with all its short-termism. It is vital that we have a whole new emphasis on and encouragement for manufacturing. Our major competitors—Germany, France and Japan—do this. There, it would be inconceivable that only a fraction of the machinery for one of the UK's biggest renewable energy projects—the London Array—would be supplied by domestic companies. We have simply not taken enough advantage of new or existing industries.

Anyone who had cause to go to the old Department of Trade and Industry to seek help for industry would have been dismayed by the "hands off, can't do and won't help" mentality of officialdom. That was another painful hangover, like the so-called light-touch regulation of the City, from the Thatcherite days. A whole new attitude and approach is needed. I encourage the Chancellor to take up that theme strongly when he presents the Budget proper.

The Chair of the Select Committee has already addressed at length the City and financial regulation, including in particular the importance of getting performance incentives right—

Frank Dobson: What is my hon. Friend's response—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) is giving way, he must not remain on his feet.

Frank Dobson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the public should be slightly daunted by the fact that no fewer than 50 of the new and improved Tory candidates actually work in the City of London and must have been involved in some of the dubious transactions that got us into the mess we are in?

Paul Farrelly: I was involved in the City myself many years ago, and I had very good reasons for leaving it. My right hon. Friend may not be surprised to learn that the City will be well represented in the constituency of Newcastle-under-Lyme during the next election, as my Conservative opponent is 27 and a City lawyer with Sullivan & Cromwell, which advised Lehman Brothers just before it collapsed. He will be close at hand on Monday, when bankers and lawyers will be emptying their wallets at the Carlton club—president, one Margaret Thatcher—for a £65 a head fundraising dinner. I have the invitation here if my right hon. Friend wishes to take it up.

[Paul Farrelly]

It is clear that the behaviour of City bankers has not changed, even in cases when the banks have benefited from the public purse, even given the reduced competition after the turmoil. The extra levy on banking bonuses is therefore welcome. It is only a short-term measure and it may be subject to fancy avoidance schemes, but it is important in encouraging a greater sense of responsibility in the City. I wish that the Government had done it and been tougher in action and rhetoric before. Shareholders—the major pension funds and insurance companies investing our money—should also have taken a more active stance in the past.

In the PBR, the Chancellor also said it was important to take tough decisions on tax now. He said that he was determined that any tax increases would be guided by our values of fairness and responsibility. In a decent, civilised and progressive society, that overall philosophy is surely right. In the PBR, the Chancellor has finally recognised that a quarter of all the money spent on pension tax relief goes to the top 1.5 per cent. of earners. He will now reduce those benefits. I welcome that limited measure, but again wish that the Government had done it before.

With respect to fairness in taxation, there is one glaring issue that this PBR, like its predecessors, does not address. That is the rate of capital gains tax which, at 18 per cent., remains lower than the basic rate of income tax and much lower than the higher rate of income tax. As such, it remains unfair: some of the lowest-paid workers will pay a higher rate on hard-earned income than many wealthy people will on unearned income. Also—this is very important—it constitutes a continuing huge incentive to tax avoidance. To eliminate that incentive, therefore, and to protect the tax base, capital gains tax should be aligned with the marginal rate of tax. I hope that the Chancellor will address that glaring anomaly in the Budget.

We inherited that position from the Conservatives in 1997. Progressively, we reduced it under taper relief, which between 2001 and 2008 cost the Treasury an enormous amount of money—£28.1 billion. To put that into context, it is £6 billion more than the £22 billion proceeds from the 3G mobile phone licence auction, which itself reaped more for the Treasury than all previous privatisations put together. Far from taking the long view, the move has encouraged exactly the opposite: a constant churning of deals and investments. The British disease became ever more rampant, and frankly it was a huge tax break that in great part went to the City and private equity.

I do not yet have figures for how much the change to 18 per cent. is estimated to have cost. In the future, it would be useful if the Treasury could provide them and explain why we have yet to address the glaring anomaly that I have highlighted. According to the Treasury's own figures, a rise in the marginal rate of tax would raise £2 billion for the public finances. The proposal to lift the rate of national insurance by 0.5 per cent. would raise £3 billion and mean that, however regrettably, ordinary families would share the burden. In the interests of fairness, however, it is important that the anomaly be addressed.

In conclusion, I welcome much of what is in the PBR, but in many respects, particularly on encouragement for manufacturing and fairness in taxation, we could be much bolder. I hope that the Chancellor will address those issues in the Budget.

5.36 pm

Mr. William Bain (Glasgow, North-East) (Lab): The pre-Budget report safeguards vital investment in schools, hospitals and policing, and more importantly helps to create employment and training opportunities across the country as we prepare for the return of economic growth this year, after what was, in 2009, the most difficult year for the UK economy since 1922.

No country has been insulated from the devastating effects of the collapse in the derivative markets, which has been the root cause of the recession. This has been the first global recession of a globalised financial system. However, the Government have taken strong action to recapitalise the banks and save the financial system through £850 billion in recapitalisations, loans and other guarantees. They have also shown strong leadership at a time of economic crisis.

The Bank of England has also taken decisive action in monetary policy in maintaining interest rates at 0.5 per cent., and in my view the policy of quantitative easing has been broadly successful in injecting almost £200 billion into the economy through asset purchases. As the Japanese recession of the 1990s and early 2000s has shown, interest rate reductions on their own cannot generate a lasting recovery. On that point, I take issue with the shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). In Japan, quantitative easing was used too late and too weakly to produce a strong stimulus for recovery. To produce a strong recovery here, fiscal policy is as important as monetary policy, which is why we need to maintain an equally bold direction in fiscal policy in 2010, to make it a steady year of recovery that benefits everyone.

The real issue dividing the House is whether that stimulus should continue this year to allow for stronger growth in 2011 or whether we should engage in fiscal retrenchment through deficit reduction now. In my view, taking the latter approach this year would be disastrous for our prospects and run the risk of a double-dip recession. I take issue with the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) on this point: despite her many mistakes, which generated great hardship for my constituents in the 1980s, the noble Lady Thatcher did at least not cut public spending in the immediate aftermath of a recession, which the Conservative party is proposing to do now.

Time is marching on and the wind-up speeches are about to begin. I urge the Government to continue the fiscal stimulus this year. It is a policy that will promote much-needed employment in my constituency and those of many right hon. and hon. Members. I commend the pre-Budget report to the House.

5.39 pm

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): It seems like an awfully long time since the publication of the PBR for us to be debating it now. If the Government had followed the Opposition's advice and moved the start of the Christmas recess, so that it was actually closer to Christmas, we could easily have debated the PBR when it was truly tropical. Nevertheless, as we know, this debate is all about the deficit and how we secure economic recovery in this, the last G20 country still in recession.

I will deal with the deficit and bond markets in due course. However, it is interesting that today, in the week that PIMCO, one of the world's largest bond funds, starting dumping UK Government gilts and only a few weeks after the OECD, the CBI and the Bank of England all warned that there was no proper plan in place to deal with the deficit, we have seen no response from the bunker, other than the pathetic Fiscal Responsibility Bill, which panned so badly on Tuesday. Not only is there is no plan; as I said from this Dispatch Box in October, the Government seem to be reverting to the view that there is actually no problem, returning to their position of last June, which is that there will be growth in spending after all.

I want to digress for a moment and mention one item in the PBR that has not been mentioned today, namely the one tax cut in it, which is actually another tax con. The Chancellor has reduced bingo duty from 22 to 20 per cent., without bothering to mention that it was 15 per cent. before the last Budget. The Government claim that removing VAT offset the damage, but their sums were a mess. Even with duty at 20 per cent., bingo players today are paying more.

Listening to the Back-Bench speakers, I noticed a curious tale from those on the Government Benches. Perhaps they thought better of it, but on Tuesday there were no Government Back-Bench speakers whatever, on the Government's flagship Fiscal Responsibility Bill. Clearly the Whips put out the call today, and the call was answered. The first three speakers were, again, mainly opponents of the Government, which I think is a sign of Labour's lurch to the left. Perhaps the Whips decided to bring them in here to prevent them from plotting.

We heard similar themes from the right hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) and for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) and from the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—real "Back to the 1980s", old Labour socialism. We even heard an incredible and wide-ranging attack on the financial services industry as a whole from the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, which I found remarkable coming from the man who not so long ago ran to be Mayor of London.

We also heard from two or three other Government Back Benchers who were perhaps a little less opposed and a little less socialist. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Phil Wilson) seemed to be rather obsessed with class and what school people had been to. I shall have to disappoint him, because, in 386 years, I am the only former pupil of the state school that I attended to become a Member of Parliament, which would seem to contradict his overall thesis that everybody on the Conservative Benches comes from Eton.

Among Opposition speakers, we heard from my right hon. Friend the Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), who made a sound attack on the Fiscal Responsibility Bill and powerfully outlined the urgent need to close the deficit, the dangers of high interest rates across the economy and the lessons to be learned from domestic and international experience. My hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) also eloquently outlined the challenges ahead if the Government do not get a grip on the deficit. Indeed, his insights on financial matters will be much missed in the next Parliament.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), who has had to go back to Worcestershire, also made a good speech—a real tour de force—about the PBR, and in particular about how it affects industry. I should also mention my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening). She tried to get in, but there was simply too much demand to speak.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie), who was the only Back-Bench speaker from a party other than the two major parties, also returned our focus to the PBR and Government failings in industrial investment, and highlighted high youth unemployment.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) made a slightly more thoughtful contribution, and we also heard a short but useful contribution from the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-East (Mr. Bain).

To return to the deficit, the British people clearly get the message that they have over-borrowed. According to the most recent figures that I have seen, new consumer borrowing per household has fallen, from £11.11 a day in January 2008 to just 34p a day in October 2009. The equivalent figures for new Government borrowing over the same period have risen from only £3.65 to a staggering £18.44 per household per day. I applaud the efforts of the British public to get to grips with their own debt. As the shadow Chancellor said, we are all in this together. Imagine our dismay, therefore, that the good work done by the British consumer to repair his or her own balance sheet has been submerged by the explosion in Government borrowing overseen by those on the Treasury Bench.

There is a link between consumer credit, our disastrously poor savings ratio over the past 10 years, and the all-important bond markets. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who is going to wind up the debate, knows that I used to work in the international fixed income markets, so he could take heed of my warnings. Official and market interest rates are currently very low, but great care will be needed in the future. Forward interest rates—the indicator of where the market thinks rates are heading—are much higher than short-term rates. In fact, the multiplier of headline long-term rates, at about eight times the level of short-term rates, could represent a historical record. It is worth remembering, as I have said before in this place, that a half per cent. increase in interest rates is far more significant when rates are low than when they are high.

So the market is already anticipating substantial rises in interest rates. Even before any such rises have taken effect, debt interest is projected by the Treasury itself to rise from £22 billion this year to £67 billion in 2013. Obviously, the debt interest bill will rise substantially if interest rates rise significantly. That is another reason why fiscal responsibility is so important. If the Government continue to borrow uncontrollably, not only will the interest bill rise substantially, and potentially unsustainably, but the public sector will crowd the private sector out of the credit market. Members on both sides of this House rightly urge that more credit be offered to small and medium-sized enterprises, but this will be made much harder if we do not get a grip on the public finances and, at the same time, do all that we can to keep interest rates low.

[Mr. Greg Hands]

Our deficit is the worst of any major country. As I pointed out earlier in an intervention, the overall amount of debt in countries such as Italy and Japan is higher, but they have the saving grace of having a significant savings market. This country does not have such a market, due to the appalling decline in our savings ratio over the past 10 to 12 years. This is also where the public finances link in to our consumer debt problems. The crucial point is that if we divide the percentage of GDP that each country's outstanding debt represents by its domestic savings ratio, we find that we are actually in a far worse position than other countries—possibly even than Japan.

We are already highly dependent on foreign demand, which means that we have to keep an eye on our currency strength as well as on our international credit rating. There has been a great deal of talk in recent months of credit rating downgrades and the possibility of gilt buyers' strikes. Neither of those risks should be underestimated, but another risk is that uncontrolled borrowing will lead to higher interest rates, both for the Government and for the wider economy, almost regardless of what happens to our credit rating. The market could make borrowing much more expensive than should ordinarily be the case, and the Government could end up paying large premiums for their borrowings. So whether long-term Government borrowing rates are at 4 per cent., 6 per cent. or 8 per cent. will make a huge difference to the public finances and to how much we can spend on our cherished public services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) called for clarity and honesty from the Government, as did the Chairman of the Treasury Select Committee, the right hon. Member for West Dunbartonshire (John McFall). The biggest failure of this Government is their failure to be honest with the public, or even with themselves. Everyone knows that the deficit will require cuts to public spending, but still the Government will not reveal their plans for departmental spending.

This fraudulent approach was displayed in all its glory by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on Monday night in his appearance on "Newsnight". With incredulity pushed to the limit, Jeremy Paxman asked him:

> "Do you mean to say that a government which only two or three years ago was giving us public spending forecasts for the next three years will go into this election unable to tell us what will happen over the next eleven months?"

What was the clear, honest answer from the right hon. Gentleman?

> "No, because the comprehensive spending review is about three years; that's starting in about eighteen months time."

Having digested that, Paxman tried again:

> "So, we are going to have a budget, are we, that is not going to tell us what's going to happen to departmental spending?"

This time, there was an admission from the right hon. Gentleman:

> "I think that is possible."

What a shoddy excuse for a Government!

In conclusion, the facts are these. In 1997, Labour inherited an economy in very good shape, characterised by low national debt, flexible labour markets and strong private pensions. All three of those areas have been gravely degraded.

I end with this thought. When it comes to spending and the deficit, the Government are behaving like a set of habitual drinkers, gathered around a table in a dingy pub as chucking-out time approaches. Everyone else in town, even those in the pub, can see that it is time for them to be slung out, but they are discussing going for one last binge. The way to avoid the hangover, they say, is to carry on drinking to the end. The worst offender is the boss himself, sat there with his two mates. Suddenly, the slightly more responsible Chancellor, who is actually the designated driver, weakly suggests that it might be time to stop. Heated discussion ensues: the Chancellor suggests that it is time for the boss to give up entirely, but suddenly, the boss's best mate of all returns from the bar clutching two bottles of whisky. Last orders are approaching for these people. The binge needs to end, the Government need to sober up and the whole country can see that it is time urgently to change course.

5.51 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): We have had a good debate. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor delivered the 2009 pre-Budget report after a very difficult period for the world economy. As we see signs of recovery, new confidence has been achieved through co-ordinated action by Governments and central banks around the world, co-ordinated successfully through the UK presidency of the G20. Britain's Prime Minister deserves enormous credit for that achievement.

What we can now do is compare the effect on jobs and families of the recessions of the 1980s and '90s—home-grown problems those, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) pointed out, not worldwide ones—with the recession that we have just been through. Those comparisons are made in the Treasury Select Committee report before us and they were also made by a number of contributors to the debate, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), who rightly set out in sombre terms the consequences of some of the policies urged by Conservative party supporters.

In the 1990s, home repossessions reached 75,000 a year. The Council of Mortgage Lenders forecast 75,000 repossessions again in 2009. A few weeks ago, it cut that estimate by more than a third because the policy of protecting home owners through the recession has worked. The alternative policy urged upon us—of letting the recession take its course—would have led to far more repossessions, such as we saw in the 1990s.

In both the 1980s and 1990s recessions, the number claiming unemployment benefit reached 3 million. Many of us remember all too well the damage to our communities that resulted. We heard about that in the excellent speeches by my hon. Friends the Members for Halton (Derek Twigg) and for Sedgefield (Phil Wilson). Today, the number is just over half that—less than 1.7 million. In the most recent figures, it went down. The increase in unemployment has been half of what was forecast. Our policies of supporting the economy and supporting jobs have been working.

Let me say to Conservative Members that the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), in an interesting speech, really let the cat out of the bag. The policies urged upon us by the Conservative Front-Bench team are exactly the policies applied by the Tory Government in the 1980s. The difference between us is whether those policies were successful or not. The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden clearly takes the view that that was a successful experience of management of the economy, but I have to tell him that that is not the country's view. As my hon. Friends have said, the realities of that experience should be taken to heart by Conservative Members.

We have not seen in this recession the big increases in long-term unemployment that were so damaging in the 1980s and 1990s, or the big rise in the number receiving sickness benefits, which was in some ways the worst aspect of the 1980s recession, when jobcentres were incentivised to move people from unemployment benefit on to sickness benefit. Quite a lot of those people who went on to sickness benefit in the 1980s never worked again. We are still paying the price for the way in which that recession was managed by the Tory Government. As we have heard, businesses are failing at about half the rate that we saw in the earlier recessions. To put it bluntly, Labour policies have worked a great deal better than Tory policies did.

The pre-Budget report, however, did not look back; it looked forward. Big challenges remain in the world economy, and our challenge now is to secure the recovery. That is why, in the pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor decided to continue support for the economy now, which is what we should be doing. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-East (Mr. Bain) was right to underline that point. We must continue to invest in services on which people rely, and in industries that will support our future.

The pre-Budget report also spelt out our commitment to halving the deficit over four years. The shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), appeared to edge towards agreeing that that was the right period in which to tackle the task—which would constitute a striking U-turn, given all the U-turns, forwards and then backwards, that the Conservatives have performed this week. The Conservatives have demanded greater detail from the Government, but we still have not heard their target for the deficit.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) made a characteristically thoughtful speech. He was right to spell out the dangers of precipitate spending cuts, and I welcomed his assessment of the PBR stance, which I think he described as reasonable. He asked whether the bank bonus tax should be made permanent. My answer is no, it should not. It is a one-off measure. For the long term, we shall have the Financial Services Bill and the G20 rules on bankers' remuneration.

The Chairman of the Select Committee, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dunbartonshire (John McFall), spoke of the importance of keeping an eye on the problem of child poverty. We announced in the PBR that households receiving full tax credits and with incomes up to around £16,000 a year would qualify for free school meals for children of primary school age. That will boost the incentive for parents to obtain work and will reduce child poverty. The Select Committee was right to underline the continuing importance of our goals in that regard.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has observed on numerous occasions, support in the downturn goes hand in hand with steps to rebuild our fiscal strength once recovery is firmly established. The right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden suggested that the pre-Budget report had not had much to say about that. He was entirely wrong. Across the world, countries are borrowing more. Stabilising the banking system and supporting the economy impose costs, although those costs will be much lower in the long run than they would be if we decided to let the recession run its course. Now, support during the downturn needs to be followed by steps to restore the public finances once recovery is established.

We have set out clear goals for the consolidation. We have specified in the pre-Budget report how much we expect to spend in each year up to 2014-15 and how much we expect to receive in tax payments in each of those years, given the tax measures that we have announced and published. As a result, the deficit will fall to 5.5 per cent. of GDP by the end of that period, less than half the current level. Given further consolidation thereafter, debt as a share of GDP is projected to fall in 2015-16. To secure consolidation, the pre-Budget report announces tax rises for those with the greatest ability to pay, while ensuring that those on the lowest incomes will be protected.

The pre-Budget report was right to support the economy in the way that it did and we were right to support the economy during the downturn, but now, as the economy starts to emerge from the crisis, we must not think that the job is finished. We have a great deal more to do over the next few years. The pre-Budget report set out actions to secure the recovery, to restore the public finances as we must, and to build our future. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House has considered the matter of the Pre-Budget Report.

Umbilical Cord Blood

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—(Lyn Brown.)

5.59 pm

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have secured this Adjournment debate. I think that I was the first Member to raise the issue of umbilical cord blood as a private Member's Bill, and subsequently I raised it with other hon. Members during the passage of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008. Courtesy no doubt of Google word searches, my interest has led to a number of academics contacting me about their research into cord blood. I imagine that this debate will keep me at the top of the umbilical cord blood search page. However, my concern is to increase the understanding and application of cord blood.

After I first raised the issue, several hon. Members spoke to me of their previous ignorance of umbilical cord blood. It is an ignorance that I shared, despite being a parent of six children and living close to one of the NHS hospitals that collects umbilical cord blood.

Like the majority of parents in Britain, my wife and I thought that the umbilical cord once clamped was simply a waste product. We were totally unaware of the potential benefits of donating our children's umbilical cord blood. My understanding has grown over the years, aided by some excellent individuals in the charitable, private and public sectors who are passionate about cord blood. I pay tribute and thank the Anthony Nolan Trust and UK cord blood working group for their work and assistance and for rubbing off some of their passion on me. What inspires me to keep flying the flag for umbilical cord blood is meeting those children who are alive because of cord blood. This is a subject that can be literally a matter of life and death.

Patients in the UK requiring a bone marrow donor currently have a one in four chance of survival. Only 50 per cent. of those looking for a donor will find one, and of those only 50 per cent. will survive. For those who find a bone marrow donor, many get their donor too late in their disease for the treatment to achieve success and that contributes to the 50 per cent. failure rate. Greater provision of cord blood could help those patients to get treatment faster and improve their chances of survival. For those who currently have no bone marrow donor, a larger provision of cord blood would give many of them a potentially life-saving option.

Despite an increase in the awareness of those reading or listening to this debate, I feel that a short explanation of umbilical cord blood is in order. The baby's blood which is left behind in the umbilical cord contains many different types of cells. Some of these cells are stem cells, which have been shown to have a number of medical applications. Over the past 20 years, collected cord blood has been used for transplantation in the same way as bone marrow. It has been used to treat patients suffering from diseases such as leukaemia, sickle-cell diseases, immune deficiencies and others. Currently, there are over 85 treatments based on cord blood and there are more clinical trials in the pipeline.

Researchers believe that cord blood has the potential to treat many more diseases, once adult stem cells are properly understood. There have been trials that show that cord blood may be helpful in treating brain injuries in children. It is also being developed for other possible treatments such as diabetes, liver therapy, multiple sclerosis, testicular cancer and to regenerate damaged heart cells. The medical and financial value of cord blood should not be underestimated. Early indications from research conducted in the UK suggests that many of the patients currently receiving enzyme treatments at a cost of well over £100,000 per annum to the taxpayer, could find a cure through a cord blood transplant.

Cord blood is particularly valuable in the treatment of leukaemia. It can be used as an alternative to bone marrow transplants. Collection of umbilical cord blood is a far less invasive procedure than extracting bone marrow. Units can be collected, frozen and then stored for years. That leads to fewer complications and makes transplants more readily available than bone marrow. Most importantly, it is easier to find matching stem cells from cord blood than from bone marrow. A properly developed infrastructure for the collection and storage of cord blood will do much to alleviate the severe shortage of life-saving stem cells needed for transplantation and to facilitate research.

Cord blood is a natural, safe, ethical and sustainable resource. It offers many advantages over using traditional bone marrow transplants from adult donors and would offer researchers an alternative to using embryonic stem cells.

The previous time cord blood was debated in the House was during the passage of the HFE Act in the context of allowing so-called saviour siblings. I took part in the debate, and an irony was revealed in it: the contrast between the Government stretching ethical boundaries to accommodate so-called saviour siblings, but restricting the natural, safe, ethical and sustainable life-saving resource of cord blood, with 99.5 per cent. of umbilical cords thrown away.

However, it is important to be charitable, and over the years there has been success and progress in the field of cord blood. The NHS was one of the first bodies to recognise the potential importance of cord blood, and some of the most important breakthroughs were made here in Britain. The NHS cord blood bank was established in 1996, and at the time it was one of only a handful in the world. Last year, the fifth umbilical cord blood collection facility, at St George's hospital in Tooting, was opened. The NHS CBB has moved into a state-of-the-art facility in Filton, which provides greater capacity and the flexibility to meet future clinical standards. I have visited one of the collection hospitals at Barnet, near my constituency, and I was impressed by the professional service, with all donations collected ex utero in a separate room so that the focus remains upon the care of the mother and baby.

As of October 2009, the NHS CBB had banked approximately 14,000 donations and provided 279 units of cord blood to British patients, with 34 per cent. coming from black and minority ethnic communities. Given that there is only a 30 to 40 per cent. chance of a BME patient finding a matched unrelated donor, it is right that there is a focus on increasing cord collection within these communities.

However, this progress has not gone far enough. The vast majority of parents in this country do not have access to NHS umbilical cord blood collection centres, which are in London, Luton and Watford. Expecting parents are not being informed about the many benefits of donating their baby's cord blood. Even parents who have a history of blood-related disorders are not properly informed and have limited options to have their cord blood collected. Last year, an Enfield resident whose family had suffered from a rare anaemic disease contacted me in a desperate state. Her daughter was due to give birth any day and she had only just discovered by chance the value of collecting the cord blood. Fortunately, they lived near Barnet hospital, which collects cord blood, but only then at certain times; they were told that unless the birth happened between 9 and 5, Monday to Thursday, the collection would not take place. Therefore, even if someone is fortunate enough to live near one of the five NHS collection hospitals, and even if they are fortunate enough to be fully informed about the potential life-saving value of cord blood to their child if they are at risk of developing a family blood-related disorder, the cord blood may still be thrown in the bin.

At a time when the health service is so mindful of the need fully to inform patients about their health care, the issue of the collection of a mother-baby's cord blood does not seem to get the same level of attention. The principles of full information and consent do not seem to apply to cord blood, which is generally treated as a waste product, unbeknown to the parent apart from in exceptional circumstances.

These circumstances of collection are more often dictated by the NHS collection targets than the wishes of the parents. It is hardly surprising that private companies come in to fill the void. Competition and tight regulation by the Human Tissue Authority have ensured that good practice predominates, but at a financial cost to parents. Private banking has its place, but what is lacking is access to sufficient cords available for public benefit from whatever source.

In previous debates, I have said that the NHS bank of 14,000 blood cord units is too low. Last year, academic research confirmed that for a truly effective transplantation infrastructure to operate in a country of the UK's size and population, we will need to bank about 50,000 units of cord blood, and some people think the bar should be raised even higher. Either way, there is an urgent need for a sound projection of what is required, which should form the foundation of a comprehensive strategy for cord blood in the UK.

At present, many patients—particularly those from ethnic minorities—who need transplants are unable to find matches. That has resulted in the NHS importing cords from the continent. The Anthony Nolan Trust has responded by collecting cords at King's College hospital, and has plans to extend this to 10 collection centres in maternity units around the country. At the request of the Government, a funding bid was submitted last June. The cord blood working group is also putting together the clinical and economic case for expansion. Will the Minister give a view on the progress of these plans?

The UK is falling behind our European neighbours and other developed countries. Our NHS cord blood bank is smaller than those of countries of a similar size, such as France. Greater attention and resources are paid to this issue in other countries such as Spain, Italy, Germany and the United States. At present, cord blood can be used only to treat a fairly narrow set of illnesses, but scientists believe that with more research and investment it could be used to treat a much wider range of illnesses. Research in this important area has been hindered by lack of public awareness and by embryonic research crowding out other forms of research into stem cells. As a result, leading figures in this field such as Professor McGuckin and Dr. Forraz have left the UK to pursue their research in other countries that are more open to the possibilities offered by cord blood research.

A key difficulty with cord blood transplants is the problem of engraftment where the body rejects the transplants, particularly in adolescents and adults. Until recently, UK transplanters have tended to opt for other established treatments because the reported results of cord blood usage have not been as promising. Indeed, I received news today of a health commissioner asking for a business case to be made for a prospective cord blood transplant—perhaps the Minister would comment on this worrying case.

However, recent overseas advances in the use of cord blood and the launch last month of the first UK clinical trials of cord blood have greatly encouraged clinicians. At the instigation and under the management of Dr. Rachael Hough of University college London hospital, two clinical trials are running across the UK. The aim is to establish the safety and efficacy of using unrelated cord blood to bridge the engraftment problem, and to establish conditioning protocols. For example, it may be that by increasing the amount of cord blood stem cells—given the unique mobility involved—unrelated cord blood can provide safer and more effective life-saving treatments.

The scientific development and application of cord blood in other countries has reached a point where it would be neglectful for the UK not to embrace to the full this exciting option. It is becoming clear that having a large range of cord blood donations available for patients to find compatible transplants would save both lives and money. It is not just the Government who need to keep up with progress in the field of umbilical cord blood; the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists' last word on this was a 2006 report in reaction to perceived problems with some private operators, but the umbilical cord blood world in the public, charitable and private sector has made significant advances since then.

To its credit, the Department of Health agreed to undertake a review of the collection and use of umbilical cord blood, and seminars and discussions have taken place. However, the progress of the review has been very slow. In October 2008, I asked the Secretary of State when the conclusions of these studies would be published. I was assured by the relevant Minister that the report would be made available later that year. When that did not occur, I asked the same question again—this time in March 2009—and the relevant Minister replied that these conclusions would be published in due course. It is now January 2010—happy new year—and the Department of Health has still to publish its findings.

It is not sufficient for the Minister simply to rely on the report published by the consultant Technopolis. Indeed that report made the point when it concluded:

> "No explicit national policy has been formulated on cord blood banking in the UK, either as part of health or science policy or as part of blood bank policy."

It went on to say:

> "We recommend that the UK…consider… Creating a high-level advisory committee to provide the Minister and policy teams with advice on the detail of such a policy."

[Mr. David Burrowes]

What is the Government's response to this recommendation and progress on it? I hope that we will hear something of the Government's conclusions from their review but will the Minister at least accept the long-standing invitation to speak to the all-party group on umbilical cord blood and adult stem cells, which I have the privilege of chairing?

May I also ask the Government to provide regular updates on how many units of cord blood have been collected, stored and transplanted in the UK? The Government must make their views clearly known. Do they recognise the need to collect 50,000 units of cord blood? Does the Minister have a view on plans to increase numbers of blood cord transplants? I hope the Government will demonstrate a clear commitment to funding cord blood research and to the many lives that it could save.

In September 2008, the then Health Secretary opened the Anthony Nolan Trust's excellent storage facility for cord blood with a stem cell research centre in Nottingham. He called it a "crucial development" and went on to say that there was a "wonderful opportunity to take advantage of"

in terms of cord blood. There is an opportunity for more lives to be saved, for valuable scientific research to be undertaken and for the UK to become a centre for excellence in cord blood. Two people die every day waiting for a stem cell transplant and 65,000 litres of cord blood are discarded every year. Will the Minister assure the House today that the Government are taking advantage of the wonderful opportunity offered by cord blood rather than, as seems to be the case, literally throwing it away?

6.16 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Gillian Merron): I congratulate the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) on securing this debate. I well know of his interest in this matter as chair of the all-party group and I look forward to taking up the invitation that he has generously extended to me. I understand his passion about and interest in the subject and I have come to share them as I have become more familiar with it.

This is a very interesting and extremely exciting time for the people who stand to benefit from the possibilities held out by improving science and clinical practice. New approaches to stem cell transplantation hold out fresh hope for patients with leukaemia and other blood disorders and, of course, cord blood is becoming an increasingly important source of stem cells, particularly for those with rare tissue types not served by the bone marrow register.

Our knowledge of the potential of cord blood is growing year on year as a result of the Government's investment in research and our commitment to supporting those who seek to find new answers for those who seek transplants and, because of this, the use of cord blood is increasing in terms of numbers and is broadening in scope. For example, it is likely that more adults than children will receive cord blood treatments this year for the first time, just one sign of how these treatments are evolving in use. I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman: cord blood can play an important role in treating blood disorders and cancers in the future and we want to be in a strong position to take advantage of these breakthroughs.

I know that the efficient and co-ordinated collection and storage of cord blood are crucial to that ambition and change. Our NHS cord blood bank is a world leader, holding the second largest inventory of unique tissue types in the world, and it is the world's fourth largest bank. As we have heard today, the bank will shortly be entirely based at the new £60 million blood processing facility in Filton, Bristol, which will be the largest facility of its kind in the world. Our current focus is on collecting from groups that are under-represented on the bone marrow register, because this is where we believe cord blood can make the most immediate and biggest contribution by extending new hope and providing life-saving treatment to those who have difficulty finding an appropriate tissue match.

In England, we now have five NHS hospitals that can collect cord blood, all chosen because they serve families from a diverse multicultural mix, as was correctly pointed out by the hon. Gentleman. In October, I had the pleasure of opening the newest site at St. George's hospital in Tooting. While I was there, I was lucky enough to witness the collection of a cord blood unit. My officials told me that I could not have chosen a better time, as a woman had conveniently just given birth, and she donated cord blood while I was there. I was struck by how such a simple procedure could provide such a valuable resource, and it left me absolutely determined to promote cord blood collection and use.

We have taken massive strides forward in recent years, but I am conscious that there is more to do. That is why we have agreed to provide a further £10 million to increase the size of the cord blood bank to 20,000 stored units by 2013. That reflects our commitment to support cord blood treatments into the future.

Mr. Burrowes: Will the Minister give way?

Gillian Merron: In a moment. I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's arguments about the need for a larger bank. I understand his points, and I will keep an open mind on whether further expansion may be necessary. Before I take his intervention, though, I want to add that the issue goes even deeper, because we cannot settle on an optimal size for the bank until we have a clear view of how cord blood fits within the whole landscape of stem cell transplantation.

Mr. Burrowes: Those comments help with my question. Is it not the case that we need a comprehensive strategy to deal with all aspects of collection, storage, use and transplantation? We need to consider those issues and come to a settled view on what should be the optimal level, which might well be more than 20,000 units. I should like to know whether the door is open to consider the established academic figure of 50,000 or more.

Gillian Merron: Perhaps if the hon. Gentleman allows me to continue a little, he will be pleased with some of my comments about how we should move forward. I hope that the all-party group will be part of that moving forward.

The hon. Gentleman argued that we should move towards the routine collection of cord blood. Again, I understand the point about widening the range of collection, but there is not a strong call for that approach from the research or medical communities.

Mr. Burrowes: Let me clear up this point. I have called not for routine collection but for the routine provision of information. It should be a matter of routine that all expectant parents are advised about cord blood, its value and benefits, and where it can be collected.

Gillian Merron: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification, and I understand his point, but we need to give routine information that is linked to a whole approach to dealing with cord blood collection. Our priority has to be a focus on quality rather than quantity. That means finding good matches to treat those with rare tissue types.

If we want to go further in utilising the benefits of cord blood, we need to understand how it best complements other sources of stem cell transplants, most notably bone marrow. We have to decide what the future of stem cell transplantation should look like, and what resources we will need to support it. Only when we have that can we make an informed decision on the size and scope of the NHS cord blood bank. I know that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about that.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Technopolis report on cord blood that the Department of Health commissioned in 2008. That report was an important starting point, and I am happy to support many of its recommendations. Since its publication, departmental officials have been in lengthy discussions with NHS Blood and Transplant, the Anthony Nolan Trust and other players to take forward many aspects of the review. We are now working closely with the recently established umbilical cord blood transplant working group, and I believe that that will give us real insight into what is really holding back cord blood collection and use. It will delve into the practicalities of improving clinical awareness and the need for better patient information, which the hon. Gentleman has called for. It will also help us to understand where the latest research may take us in future.

The key recommendation that came out of the Technopolis report was the need for a national strategy on cord blood. As I have said, we cannot approach the issue of cord blood transplantation in isolation. We have to think about how bone marrow and cord blood collection can complement each other and about the challenges facing us, now and in future, in relation to those sources of stem cells. We also need to define the role for all key partners, and start to bring together the various systems and structures that support stem cell transplantation to ensure even closer working. There are, of course, many different interest groups involved and I want to be absolutely sure that their views are fully represented as we take things forward, but we all have the same, singular objective—to help save more lives.

That is what this work is really about. We can discuss bank size, the pros and cons of one system over another or who is best at doing what—and those are all important discussions and decisions that we have to make—but all that really matters is whether we can make the difference between a person living or dying. We have to make choices that will make the biggest difference to those patients so, for me, that is what will drive our work in the future.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be delighted, therefore, when I tell the House that we are establishing an expert strategic forum that will be led by NHS Blood and Transplant, in partnership with the Department of Health and other stakeholders. This group will operate as a high-level taskforce to advise Ministers on the best options going forward, and that will mean getting to the heart of many of the issues that he quite rightly raised today in the House.

I shall also write to my ministerial counterparts in the devolved Administrations to ask if they will be represented, so that we can get strong dialogue and co-operation across borders. My intention is for this group to produce a discussion paper in the spring of this year that will provide the basis for a new strategy on the collection and use of stem cells for transplant.

In conclusion, like the hon. Gentleman I am extremely enthusiastic about the role that cord blood can play in the future. The reason is simple—it saves lives. It holds out the possibility of saving people who would otherwise die because of a lack of matched tissue.

We have to make the right strategic decisions for the future, based on real expert insight into how stem cell technology is evolving and on what will deliver the very best results for patients. I am confident that the new forum, drawing on the work of the cord blood working group, will help to guide us to the right answers.

Mr. Burrowes: Do we not need some form of mechanism, as well as the regular reports, for making information available—for instance, about the number of units of cord blood that have been collected or are in storage or used in transplants? That information is important, because it will allow us to see the progress being made and to make adequate responses.

Gillian Merron: I shall be very happy to make that information available, as it will of course assist us as we move forward.

We have a strong heritage in this area or work, having pioneered bone marrow transplants in the 1970s and 1980s. As science opens up new possibilities, I am determined that we maintain that tradition, because we are well placed to take advantage of the great promise that cord blood—indeed, that all forms of stem cell transplantation—can offer patients.

Mr. Burrowes: I thank the Minister for giving way one last time, but I want to use all the time available for this important subject. She will be aware of the proposals put forward last June—with Government encouragement, I understand—from the Anthony Nolan Trust, and she has already referred to the work of the core blood working group to develop an economic case. How do those proposals fit into the timeline of the April date that she gave?

Gillian Merron: By way of clarification to the House, I should say that I referred to the spring because I want to make sure that the work is done properly, but my intention is that the work will be done sooner rather than later in the year ahead. The hon. Gentleman's comments can of course be read into the review, and I shall be very happy to discuss this matter in even greater detail at the all-party group, whose meeting I look forward to attending.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising what I believe is a very important matter, and for his commitment to taking it forward.

Question put and agreed to.

6.29 pm

House adjourned.

House of Commons

Monday 11 January 2010

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

National Security

1. Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Whether his Department's forthcoming Green Paper will include an assessment of the contribution to national security of the UK's EU and transatlantic relationships. [309564]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): Effective international partnerships are crucial to our security as a nation and we will benefit from strengthening multilateral and bilateral co-operation. We expect to build further on both our European Union and transatlantic relationships. Those who think that it is a choice misunderstand where our interests lie. The EU, NATO and our bilateral relationships are complementary one to another. The Green Paper will address that issue.

Chris Ruane: The world faces threats from global terrorism, global warming and global poverty. Those international issues require international solutions. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the UK's defence is best served by strong alliances with mainstream parties in Europe, not with those on the lunatic fringe?

Mr. Ainsworth: Totally. Those who believe that the EU has no effective role to play in our security, of whom there appear to be some in the House, really miss the point. As I said, the EU is complementary to our other alliances and relationships and can play a very significant part in our security. We should welcome that and build those relationships.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Although I agree with the burden of what the Secretary of State says, it is nevertheless true that because of the European Union's poverty of ambition and its disorganisation, it needs to be directed towards the military operations for which it is equipped and in which it is able to take part. Does he agree that stabilisation operations are ideal for the EU, but that we need to look to NATO for the serious war-fighting operations?

Mr. Ainsworth: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman says, but not exclusively. The EU can play a role. We should not build concrete alternative structures, but what the EU can do and is doing should be complementary to NATO. After all, most of its members are also members of NATO. I was at fleet command in Northwood only a few days ago, where the EU is working well with NATO on anti-piracy and making a real contribution.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): Although the transatlantic relationship will obviously remain our most important alliance, does the Secretary of State agree that in the 21st century the Americans will increasingly look towards the Pacific and less towards the Atlantic? Will the Green Paper offer an opportunity to reappraise the military relationship with some of our key European partners and move it on to a scale that we have not seen in the past?

Mr. Ainsworth: Our bilateral relationship with the United States is, as the hon. Gentleman said, the most important security and defence relationship that we have and will stay that way for the foreseeable future. However, no serious people in the US expect us to do anything other than build good working relationships with our European neighbours and the European Union. They see that as a positive thing, so there is no competition in that regard, as some people appear to think there is or should be.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Given the state of the defence budget, the fact that we are fighting a war and the possible danger of duplication by investing sums of money in European alternatives to NATO defence structures, what possible justification can there be for spending any significant sums at all on the duplicatory European defence capability?

Mr. Ainsworth: The hon. Gentleman would have to explain exactly where we have done that and where there has not been effect from European Union involvement in the operations that it has undertaken. As I said, I recently visited fleet command, where we have run Operation Atalanta without any structures and without building any unnecessary bureaucracy. We have got that operation up and running in pretty short order, under a European flag and co-operating with NATO. Why is his party so totally opposed to such effective operations?

Force Levels (Afghanistan)

2. Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had on the contributions of NATO and other allies to force levels in Afghanistan. [309565]

8. Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts on their contributions to coalition forces in Afghanistan. [309572]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): We continue to press our international security assistance force allies to share more of the burden in Afghanistan. We will encourage a focus on what they can realistically deliver, including military and non-military assets and other contributions.

Rosie Cooper: Will the Secretary of State indicate in a little more detail how the London conference could be used to ensure greater military and political burden sharing across the alliance?

Mr. Ainsworth: There has already been a significant response to General McChrystal's requests for additional forces for Afghanistan, and we are getting pretty close to the number that he asked for. Of course, we will try to address burden sharing even more to ascertain how people can co-operate and help one another and the contribution that they are capable of making. As I have said in the House previously, not all our partners can make the contributions that others can, but there are things that they can and should do to help. There will be other issues to address at the NATO conference, such as trying to get a framework for transition and maintaining momentum and progress in Afghanistan, but burden sharing will be an important part of the discussions.

Andrew Gwynne: For those NATO countries that either do not contribute troops or do so with restrictive caveats, what other forms of assistance are being requested, such as police training, money and development professionals? What are those countries pledging?

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Not a lot.

Mr. Ainsworth: I heard "Not a lot" from a sedentary position. We are approaching the figure of 40,000 additional troops that General McChrystal requested. The Americans have overwhelmingly provided them and we have made a substantial contribution, but so have other partners—it is wrong to deny that. The countries to which my hon. Friend refers are providing all the things that he mentioned, such as money—sometimes nations have the ability to make a military contribution in Afghanistan but cannot finance it, so bringing different partners together to try to help finance things that others are prepared to do is another aspect of burden sharing that we are encouraging and getting into in detail with some of our allies.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that it has taken considerable courage for an Arab country such as the United Arab Emirates to play the role that it plays in Afghanistan? What moves is he making to encourage other Muslim countries to take part in Afghanistan?

Mr. Ainsworth: We welcome all contributions and I agree that it is a brave but appropriate decision to support our operations in Afghanistan. If we can get Muslim countries involved in the Afghan operations, that will be a real boon, so we will do anything and everything we can to widen the coalition as well as seeking appropriate support from those who are already part of it.

Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): Is it not becoming increasingly obvious that some NATO alliance members, particularly in mainland Europe, will not risk the lives of their soldiers for anything but their national defence? At what point should we as a nation start to reassess the principles of article 5?

Mr. Ainsworth: There are some of our allies who take a different view of what they can contribute and what they ought properly to contribute to those operations. We have tried to give them as many opportunities as possible to make a contribution. Many have seized it, and although it is not often in the form of force capability that can do the job in Helmand province, those matters are and will continue to be discussed in NATO.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): Our armed forces value political consensus on Afghanistan when possible, so let me begin the new year on that basis. Counter-insurgency is about protecting the population. It requires a better force-to-population ratio than we currently have in Helmand province—that is why the expected uplift of American and Afghan troops is welcome. Britain is currently responsible for two thirds of the population in Helmand, with only one third of coalition troop strength. Does the Secretary of State agree that that has to change? Would it not be sensible to have a better equalisation of troop densities as the number of US troops in Helmand increases?

Mr. Ainsworth: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question and I welcome and agree with his comments. As Major-General Nick Carter, who commands the whole of Regional Command South in Afghanistan, has said, he has already had an additional 20,000 troops. He will receive another 21,000 troops and it would be strange indeed if he were not considering how to balance the force in areas in the south. That is primarily a military decision. No decisions have been made yet, but it is appropriate that he looks at the matter.

Dr. Fox: Further to that, does the Secretary of State agree that there needs to be a rebalance between UK and US areas of responsibility, even if that might mean concentrating Task Force Helmand's assets into a smaller geographical area in central Helmand? Does he agree that that should be interpreted not in any way as a downgrading of the UK effort, but as representing a better match between resources and commitments? It is essential that the UK play a full role in Afghanistan, including a full military role, but one that is proportionate to our force strength and configuration.

Mr. Ainsworth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We have 9,500 troops in Afghanistan, the overwhelming majority of whom are in Helmand province, and it is right, as he says, that we currently have a responsibility for the majority of the population in Helmand province. With the kind of inflows of troops that General McChrystal will have, and that Major-General Carter will have in the south, the latter is going to have to look at force densities to try to make sure that he is properly using those troops where they are needed. If that means that there is a concentration of British effort in part of our current area of operations and some handing-on to American forces, we should look at that. Major-General Carter is looking at that, and I would encourage him to do so. I know that he has talked to the hon. Gentleman about that, and he has certainly talked to me about it as well.

Military Objectives (Helmand)

3. Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts on military objectives in Helmand province; and if he will make a statement. [309566]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): I regularly discuss the mission in Afghanistan with my NATO counterparts. Afghanistan is an international security assistance force mission and all the objectives in Helmand province are directly related to the objectives laid out in the NATO comprehensive political-military plan.

Mr. Jenkin: Is it not the case that our superb military forces have regularly achieved their military objectives, but that that has regularly proved unsustainable because of the political vacuum at the top? Is not the most important task of the London conference to frame a political settlement with which our military objectives will need to be aligned? Otherwise, we are wasting our effort in Afghanistan.

Mr. Ainsworth: A good political arrangement, an effective Afghan Government and good governance in the local provinces are absolutely vital to progress in Helmand, and everyone in the military understands that they alone cannot make progress in this area and that they need the political structures and development to come in behind. It is true that the London conference must address those issues, as it must address reintegration where that is possible, because the insurgency has many different aspects to it. We must also address transition to effective Afghan control and have some mechanism in order to deliver that.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State explain to the House how it helps any conceivable military objectives to be propping up a discredited Karzai regime which, at the very highest level, is deeply involved in the drugs trade?

Mr. Ainsworth: I do not think that anybody has tried to suggest that the Afghan Government are perfect or that the elections that we had recently were perfect, but my hon. Friend almost suggests that some alternative to the current Afghan Government is there and available to us. There are people in the House—a minority—who sometimes suggest that there is support for the Taliban among the Afghan people, but there is not. We must work with and improve the Government structures in Afghanistan. That is how to deliver a better Afghanistan, and thereby more security for us back here in the United Kingdom.

Body Armour (Afghanistan)

4. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): What his most recent assessment is of the adequacy of provision of body armour to UK front-line forces serving in Afghanistan; and if he will make a statement. [309567]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Quentin Davies): The Osprey armour, which we began to issue to our troops in 2006, is second to none in the world. We are now in the process of issuing a new version that is more comfortable but equally protected—Osprey Assault—together with the mark 7 helmet, to all those who are liable to deploy outside the wire in Afghanistan. That is another example of the concept of a continuous pipeline of improvement in the equipment provided to our forces in Afghanistan in operation.

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): When my constituent Marine Corporal Danny Winter died in action, he was the first casualty from Stockport for 30 years. That has much increased local concern about whether we have the right equipment in the right place and at the right time. Will the Minister say clearly to the House when he believes that we shall have good force protection equipment in place and avoid the casualties and the terrible injuries that are now occurring?

Mr. Davies: We are all bitterly sorry about the death of the hon. Gentleman's constituent, and about that of every other man and woman who has fallen for the country in the difficult conflict in Afghanistan. However, my answer to him and to the House is clear: we provide, and will continue to provide, the very best equipment that we can—the very best armour, the very best weapons, the very best communications equipment, the very best vehicles, the very best helicopters and the very best of everything else. We regard that as a sacred task.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that although we can design body armour that gives more protection, there is a risk that it will be heavier and more difficult to move about in? There is a tension between the amount of protection that can be given and the mobility of our soldiers in the field. If we are not careful, there is a danger that some soldiers will not wear all their body armour in order to get more mobility.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend, who is an expert in this field and a distinguished member of the Select Committee on Defence, has got it absolutely right. There are always trade-offs in such matters. Quite simply, no human being could carry the weight that would be required to provide ballistic protection all over the body. That is a physical impossibility, and we will just have to face it. There are already trade-offs made, in circumstances where troops are carrying electronic counter-measures and communications equipment. They might be carrying 60 kg or even 70 kg each, often in appalling weather conditions, with temperatures in the 40s, and so on. There are genuine limits, and we are looking all the time at how we can provide the essential equipment as lightly as possible, consistent with the best possible outcomes.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I am grateful to the veterans Minister, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), for our meeting before Christmas to discuss body armour. I know that he appreciates—presumably his colleague does as well—the capabilities and limitations of body armour. The United States increasingly relies on aerial reconnaissance to detect improvised explosive devices, which, despite personal protective kit, kill more soldiers than anything else in Afghanistan. Is the different approach to force protection down to the Minister's failure to get the US to share technology or the withholding of funds for equipment, which was discussed over the weekend in connection with the then Defence Secretary, Chancellor and Prime Minister?

Mr. Davies: The suggestion of a lack of co-operation with our American allies, like the suggestion of the withholding of funds, is utter rubbish, complete nonsense, totally libellous and without the slightest foundation in fact. I hope that the hon. Gentleman takes those words on board. In fact, we have very close co-operation with the United States on counter-IED measures and force protection. Indeed, we use the same methods, based on various air vehicles, which have been very successful and which I have seen for myself in real time in theatre.

Conflict Resolution (Afghanistan)

5. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with Pashtun representatives on conflict resolution in Afghanistan. [309569]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): As the Secretary of State for Defence, I regularly visit Afghanistan. During those visits, I take every opportunity to engage with the members of the Afghan Government, in their role as the elected representatives of the Afghan people, and to discuss issues that are important to us all, conflict resolution being one of them.

Harry Cohen: The allies did virtually everything wrong in Iraq, but at least they ended up siding with the majority of the population, the Shi'as. In Afghanistan, we have alienated the majority of the population, the Pashtuns, who have a long history of fighting whoever they perceive as occupiers. Does it not make military sense to enter into serious negotiations with Pashtun leaders and to bring them to power?

Mr. Ainsworth: Reintegration is an important part of any counter-insurgency operation. We are more than happy to get involved in the reintegration of all parts of the insurgency that are prepared to revert to peaceful means. We need to provide methods to allow them to do that, but the process surely needs to be led by the Afghan Government, not by us as the international support force in Afghanistan. Of course we want to see the reintegration of those parts of the Pashtun population who feel alienated but who are not irreconcilable. Indeed, the title of Taliban applies to irreconcilable international jihadists on the one hand and to poor disgruntled farmers on the other, so there is a good opportunity for that to happen.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Given the very small number of Pashtun speakers in Her Majesty's armed forces serving on the front line in Afghanistan, and the small number of Pashtun speakers in the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development, will the Secretary of State please explain how the British Government communicate with local communities in Afghanistan? Do they use local interpreters or is there a growing body of civil servants being trained to speak Pashtun?

Mr. Ainsworth: We use local interpreters, but we also seek to use the local government arrangements in Afghanistan. The hon. Gentleman will have heard me describe the excellent relationship that we have with Governor Mangal in Helmand province, where most of our forces are. He is right, however, to suggest that we need to look seriously at how many Pashtun speakers we have, and to seek to develop that capability.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Since there must be very few people who really believe that an outright military victory in Afghanistan is possible, is it not absolutely essential to put much more emphasis on a political solution, which must involve a good number of those who are, sadly, fighting the coalition forces? Simply to work on the assumption that military victory will be achieved in another four or five years is not to live in the real world.

Mr. Ainsworth: Equally, that is a caricature of what people actually believe. Nobody believes that a purely military outcome is going to deliver victory in Afghanistan.

Mr. Winnick: Ah!

Mr. Ainsworth: I do not know why my hon. Friend is so surprised at that. I have said that reintegration is a necessary part of the process. We want to see the Afghan Government holding a hand out to all those who are reconcilable and whom they can bring back into the fold—of course we do.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the Afghan Taliban have no ambitions beyond Afghanistan and the Pashtun tribal areas of Pakistan, while, by contrast, Osama bin Laden is the protagonist of an international caliphate? Instead of lumping them together, would it not therefore be wiser to try to separate them by offering the Taliban an early withdrawal of foreign troops in exchange for their permanently excluding al-Qaeda, with which the Taliban have always had an uneasy alliance?

Mr. Ainsworth: As I have said, elements of the Afghan Taliban are precisely as the hon. Gentleman describes. But let us not forget that they are still led by Mullah Omar, who ran Afghanistan. In that capacity, he welcomed al-Qaeda into his country and was an arch ally of Osama bin Laden. Surely the hon. Gentleman accepts that, if we were to pull our troops out of Afghanistan in a precipitate way, the likelihood that Mullah Omar would again control large parts of Afghanistan, if not the entire country, would be pretty high—as is the likelihood that he would do again as he did in the past, bringing a threat back to us in the United Kingdom.

Chinook Crash (Mull of Kintyre)

6. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): If he will meet representatives of the families of personnel killed in the Mull of Kintyre Chinook helicopter crash to discuss identified computer software failings. [309570]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Bill Rammell): First, may I offer my sincere condolences to the families of those who lost their lives in the Mull of Kintyre Chinook helicopter crash? I will meet representatives of the families of those who were tragically killed in 1994, to explain why there is no new evidence to lead the Ministry of Defence to revisit the board of inquiry's findings.

Mr. Bellingham: As the Minister knows, I represent the family of one of the deceased pilots, Flight Lieutenant Jonathan Tapper. Obviously, the family are still very distressed indeed about the finding of gross professional negligence against their brave son. Will the Minister confirm that, since the crash, there has been a change in the rules governing the attribution of blame, so that deceased pilots cannot now be found guilty of gross negligence? Surely it is only fair and just that the two Chinook pilots who were killed—Flight Lieutenants Cook and Tapper—should benefit from that change of rule.

Bill Rammell: I reiterate that I am willing to meet representatives of the family. The change in the rules governing inquiries was brought about by this Government in July 1997, but it was made abundantly clear at that stage that that would not be retrospective and that it would not affect previous rulings.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): As both pilots were found grossly negligent, how does the Minister know with absolutely no doubt whatever that both pilots agreed with the route and the course of action being taken?

Bill Rammell: Let me make it clear to the right hon. Gentleman, who I know has taken a detailed interest in this matter, that in all the publicity surrounding this case—and certainly that produced by the BBC in recent weeks—there has never been any evidence of technical failure. The clear reality of the situation, demonstrated by a clear and diligent analysis, was that the pilots flew their aircraft at low level and high speed towards rising ground and in poor weather, which was contrary to the flight safety instructions. It is for that reason that the board of inquiry reached the conclusion it did.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Surely the fact that the board of inquiry itself did not entirely rule out the possibility of some kind of technical failure, together with public unease at the verdict of gross negligence on pilots and the number of calls for a review from all sides of the House, militates in favour of having such a review. If this Government will not hold such a review, let me tell the Minister that an incoming Conservative Government will.

Bill Rammell: I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was the previous Conservative Government who accepted the board of inquiry's findings in the first instance. This is a very sensitive issue and I fully understand the concerns of all the families that have lost their loved ones, but I do not think that we should play politics with this issue. The substance of the case is that absolutely no evidence of a technical failure has been produced that would lead to a different conclusion from that of the board of inquiry.

Heavy Lift Capability

7. Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): What progress has been made on developing a heavy lift capability; and if he will make a statement. [309571]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Quentin Davies): Since the last strategic defence review, which identified the requirement for strategic lift, we have made a lot of progress on this front. Six C-17s are currently in service together with the 24 C-130Js and 14 C-130Ks. We signed a contract for a further seventh C-17 in December 2009. As the House knows, we are also on contract for the delivery of 25 A400Ms. That project has run into well documented difficulties, and we are in the process of re-examination with partner nations and the firm of possible ways forward.

Mr. Hoyle: Of course there is a great demand for the A400M across the world. It is a much-needed aircraft, but we also need deep maintenance of that heavy lift capability, which ought to take place at either Warton or Woodford. Will the Minister look to ensure that the tanker programme and all the heavy lift can have deep maintenance that is done in the north-west?

Mr. Davies: If and when we have sorted out the problems of the A400M—and we have official and ministerial meetings on that subject later this week—we will need to focus on the support arrangements, and at that point I will certainly bear in mind what my hon. Friend says.

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): Considerable concerns exist about the looming capability gap between the end of the C-130Ks and the arrival of the much delayed A400M. Will one additional C-17 really plug that capability gap?

Mr. Davies: The answer to that question is no it will not entirely, but we are taking other measures, including improving infrastructure at Brize Norton, increasing contractor support, which will give us greater availability of the C-130Js, building a new hangar and so forth. I am advised that the measures we are taking will, in combination, maintain the existing air bridge capability.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): Helicopters in Afghanistan provide an essential capability due to the unforgiving terrain and the dual threat from IEDs and mines to our troops. However, in 2004, the current Prime Minister as Chancellor cut the helicopter budget by £1.4 billion. Over the weekend, it was suggested in leaked letters that that cut was against the direct advice of the then Secretary of State. Will the Minister confirm that those letters exist, and will he release them to the public to save us the trouble of submitting a freedom of information request in order to get to the bottom of a matter that has hugely impacted on the safety of our forces?

Mr. Davies: First, I was not around in 2004—[Laughter.] I was about to say "in my present capacity", and I have certainly not seen any letter of the kind to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

Secondly, of course helicopters are vital to operations in Afghanistan. I remind the House that we have doubled the number of helicopters there since 2006, and that we are in the process of increasing helicopter numbers substantially. This summer there will be 50 per cent. more helicopters in theatre than there were in the summer of 2009. That is a remarkable achievement. If Opposition Front Benchers were not so utterly churlish and inclined merely to play party politics with important issues such as this, they would acknowledge those dramatic facts.

Armed Forces Accommodation

10. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): What recent progress he has made in improving the standard of accommodation for the armed forces. [309574]

14. Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): What recent steps he has taken to improve the standard of accommodation provided for members of the armed forces. [309578]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Kevan Jones): To make good a legacy of underinvestment, the Department has significantly increased spending on living accommodation in recent years. That has resulted in the delivery of 38,000 new or improved single living bed spaces, and it is planned that a further 19,000 will be provided by 2013. Moreover, 14,000 service family homes have been upgraded. All occupied houses in the United Kingdom will be of the highest standard by 2020. Homes in condition 1 and 2 meet or exceed the Government decent homes standard. No families are expected to live in service family accommodation of the lowest standard except as a result of personal choice.

Mr. Syms: Has not progress been far too slow, and should the Government not redouble their efforts to improve accommodation for our brave soldiers, sailors and marines, particularly in units such as Royal Marines Poole?

Mr. Jones: I will take no lessons from the Conservatives, who sold off armed forces housing and created some of the problems, such as lack of investment, that we are trying to rectify now. Eighty properties at Royal Marines Poole are in the current central heating replacement programme, and 56 more will be included this year. That demonstrates that we are investing in Royal Marines Poole. Of the 178 properties there, 82 are in the highest-standard condition, although the charge is in the lowest-standard category to take account of, for instance, their proximity to noise from helicopters. The daily charge is £2.38.

Natascha Engel: While the upgrades are more than welcome, people such as my constituent Andy Hibberd, a recent ex-serviceman, have direct experience of seriously substandard accommodation. What can my hon. Friend do and say to reassure my constituent that much more is being done to ensure that every single serviceman—and, more to the point, the family of every single serviceman—has a decent home in which to live?

Mr. Jones: Our record speaks for itself, in marked contrast to that of the Conservative Government. We are investing real money in improving both family and single living accommodation. Between 90 and 95 per cent. of family accommodation is in the top two grades, 1 and 2, both of which meet or exceed the Government's criteria for decent homes. We are committed to investment. This year I secured an additional £50 million from the Treasury, which is making a real difference in improving both single and family accommodation.

RAF Regiment

11. Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): What plans he has for the future strength of the RAF Regiment. [309575]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Bill Rammell): The RAF Regiment establishment is currently 2,220 personnel, which includes the additional Force Protection Wing Headquarters and RAF Regiment Field Squadron formed in April 2008. In July 2009, we announced our intention to increase that by providing an additional Force Protection Wing Headquarters and RAF Field Squadron. That currently remains our intention, but given the acute cost pressures facing the Department and given that operations in Afghanistan are rightly our main effort, all such measures remain under review.

Mr. Vara: I am grateful for that information, but will the Minister provide a more specific response in the form of an update on the recruitment of personnel for the post created by the establishment of the additional RAF Force Protection Wing Headquarters as well as the RAF Regiment Field Squadron?

Bill Rammell: The RAF Regiment currently has sufficient personnel to man its establishment fully and to meet the expanded requirement due to its new units. The training of personnel for these new units is currently under way.

Nuclear Deterrent

12. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What recent progress has been made on procurement of the next generation of the nuclear deterrent; and if he will make a statement. [309576]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Quentin Davies): This is an incredibly important decision and we need to get it right. We have come up with one or two possible new technical options for the design of the successor class submarine, and we will need a few more months to evaluate those fully before we take a decision.

Tony Baldry: When will the Minister be able to tell the House whether it is possible to have continuous at-sea patrols with three submarines rather than four? When will the National Security Committee report back to the Prime Minister? Is not the whole timetable for replacing our strategic nuclear deterrent now getting extremely tight?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is three questions, but one short answer will suffice.

Mr. Davies: The answer is that we are very focused on achieving the 2024 deadline. We take the issue of the successor class submarine extremely seriously. The 2006 White Paper stated that if it is possible to deliver credible and continuous at-sea deterrence with three boats, we will, of course, want to do that. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister repeated that recently, and he has instructed that a study of that subject should be undertaken. That study will report to him very shortly.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Does the Minister not agree that we would be much better employed by awaiting the outcome of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review, and making a real contribution towards global disarmament by cancelling the replacement of Trident and spending the money on something more socially useful and less divisive, and not on another weapon of mass destruction?

Mr. Davies: So long as the world remains as dangerous a place as it is, with some very difficult and dubious people developing, or threatening to develop, their own nuclear capability or weapons of mass destruction, this country will need to continue to have an independent nuclear deterrent. The fact is that we have said—we have committed to this in the NPT—that in the context of general and complete disarmament, we would close down our own nuclear deterrent capability.

Veteran Support

13. Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Wavertree) (Lab): What arrangements his Department has put in place to assist veterans injured in service to access the services of Jobcentre Plus employment advisers when the veteran is in receipt of a veteran's pension provided by the Veterans Agency; and if he will make a statement. [309577]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Kevan Jones): The veterans welfare service is available through the Service Personnel and Veterans Agency to all veterans and their families. For those leaving the service as a result of serious injury or illness, locally based welfare managers, working closely with service charities, provide practical advice and assistance and will act as gateways for the services provided by other Government Departments, including Jobcentre Plus and the Benefits Agency.

Jane Kennedy: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will he look again at the case of Mr. William Harvey? After 17 years of distinguished service in the British Army, during which he was injured on three occasions, in Bosnia and in Northern Ireland, he has been in receipt of Veterans Agency support as compensation for his injuries, but he is therefore unable to receive jobseeker's allowance. The jobseeker's allowance rules appear to bar him from receiving the support of jobseekers' advisers in gaining new employment. This policy muddle should be addressed.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising that issue, and a similar case was raised when I met veterans the other day. I am working on this, alongside other issues concerning overlapping policies, with colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions, and we will make an announcement in February.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The Minister will no doubt be aware that in the Army, and in particular in the combat units, battalions and regiments are rapidly filling up with lesser-injured men and women who are nevertheless not capable of deploying on operations. What are we going to do with these people? There must be fresh thinking on this, and I wonder what the Minister has in mind.

Mr. Jones: This morning, the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) and I announced initiatives on giving a lifetime guarantee to the severely injured in respect of the transition into the health service and support for life. In respect of the individuals to whom the hon. Gentleman refers, I am currently engaged in a piece of work and an announcement will be made in February.

Afghan National Army

15. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What the UK's financial commitment to the Afghan national army is in (a) 2009-10 and (b) 2010-11; and if he will make a statement. [309579]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Bill Rammell): The UK does not provide direct financial support to the Afghan national army but does deliver assistance in other forms, including the provision of training through the "NATO Training Mission—Afghanistan", in Kabul, and through a number of operational mentoring and liaison teams in Helmand province.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but does he not agree that unless an army is well paid, it does not get good soldiers? It is clearly crucial that the Government of Afghanistan have a good army, and if we do not help to fund that army, either now or in the immediate future, who is going to be responsible for that if that Government cannot provide the money?

Bill Rammell: I take it that that was another uncosted spending pledge from the Conservatives. I should say directly to the hon. Gentleman that there has been an improvement in pay in the Afghan national army and the issue remains under review, but that is not just a responsibility for this country; it is a responsibility for the whole of the international coalition and the Afghan Government.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Amazingly, a significant percentage of the officers in the Afghan national army are illiterate. How much is to be spent on the education of that army in the forthcoming period?

Bill Rammell: My hon. Friend's comment underlines the lack of development in Afghanistan—that is a reality that we face. On education, the key priority that we have set out is to work alongside the Afghan forces to train, mentor and develop them. In addition, this country is committed to providing £500 million in development aid assistance over the coming four years to try to improve these conditions and the lot of the people in Afghanistan.

Topical Questions

T1. [309589] Joan Ryan (Enfield, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his departmental responsibilities.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): My Department's responsibilities are to ensure that our country is properly defended, now and in the future, and that our service personnel have the right equipment and training to allow them to succeed in military tasks in which they are engaging, either at home or abroad.

Joan Ryan: Given that the British public expect that a decent level of compensation will be guaranteed for service personnel who suffer injury, disability or loss of limb while on service, may I ask my right hon. Friend to take this opportunity to update us on the armed forces compensation scheme review that this Government initiated last year?

Mr. Ainsworth: It was this Government who introduced the armed forces compensation scheme in 2005. Prior to that nobody received any kind of lump sum payment and people depended on a pension when injured in the service of the nation. We introduced the scheme and then in 2008 we doubled the level of up-front compensation for the most seriously injured personnel. We are in the middle of a review, which is being conducted on our behalf by Admiral the Lord Boyce. Various aspects of the compensation scheme are being examined and we hope that he will report in the near future.

T7. [309597] Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): Yesterday's Sunday Herald reported that the initial gate decision on Trident has been delayed—yet again—perhaps until after the general election? Will the Minister announce when he intends to take that decision or, preferably, that he is abandoning plans for the like-for-like replacement of this outdated, unnecessary and very expensive weapons system?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Quentin Davies): We are certainly not going to announce that we are abandoning that project, for the important reasons that I set out in response to an earlier question. As I said in that response, as soon as we have gone through all the various technical options—one or two have arisen recently and we have to examine them seriously and profoundly—we will come to a decision about the right technical solution for the design of the successor class submarine. We will then go through what we call "initial gate" and we will make an announcement to the House at that time, and that is a matter of a few months away.

T2. [309591] Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Can the Secretary of State bring us up to date on the defence advisory forum's review of the future for modern warfare?

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The defence advisory forum has been of great assistance in the preparation of the Green Paper. Not only have we allowed and encouraged various experts to give us the benefit of their views as we have been drawing up the paper, but we have managed to encourage the other two political parties to participate—we tried to ensure that the Green Paper has a broad political base for the propositions that it makes.

T8. [309598] Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Although the Royal Navy and our allies can tackle pirates off the horn of Africa, they cannot tackle the sources of piracy. What more needs to be done by the international community to tackle piracy at source?

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Bill Rammell): This is a significantly acute challenge. The Royal Navy is doing an immense amount, but, as the hon. Gentleman rightly identifies, it is the source of piracy that needs to be tackled. That requires a comprehensive approach, including significant investment and governance action in Somalia.

T3. [309592] Lindsay Roy (Glenrothes) (Lab): Given the importance of the aircraft carrier project to future national security and to jobs in my constituency, in central Scotland and in other parts of the UK, how safe is the carrier project investment with this Government?

Mr. Quentin Davies: The project is 100 per cent. safe in our hands. We are 100 per cent. committed to going through with the project to build these two vital 60,000 tonne carriers for the future defence of the nation. My hon. Friend will not get the same kind of ambiguous response on this matter, sadly, from the Opposition.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Over the Christmas holidays, I met serving military and their families in my constituency and they mentioned a whole range of welfare issues, from warm jackets being inadequate in Afghanistan to the lack of housing repairs. Will the Minister name an official in his office to whom we can go with these kinds of problems? Most could be resolved with a decent dose of common sense.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Kevan Jones): It seems to me that the hon. Lady is covering an array of issues. If she is concerned about welfare or housing, will she please contact my private office? Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that I take complaints very seriously.

T4. [309594] Hazel Blears (Salford) (Lab): The 2nd Battalion of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, in which many brave Salford lads serve, has recently come home after a distinguished and courageous tour of Afghanistan. Like all our troops, in the years to come they will need the highest standards of care and support. On that basis, will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State seriously consider supporting the excellent manifesto issued by the Royal British Legion on behalf of our troops?

Bill Rammell: Like my right hon. Friend, I support the excellent work done by the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers in Musa Qala and Sangin valley. I know that she has been a strong advocate of the work that it has been undertaking. I also agree that the manifesto of the Royal British Legion is a substantial document that contains many significant and positive ideas, a number of which are already being implemented, and I endorse it.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Ahead of the Afghanistan conference later this month, will the Secretary of State pay tribute to [illegible] Commonwealth cousins the Canadians, who have lost 137 armed forces personnel and had 400 injured, many of them seriously? Indeed, will he comment on supporting those of us who want to see that courage and commitment given beyond 2011?

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments and I am sure that the Canadian armed forces will too. They have provided a very capable high-end fighting capability in Afghanistan, which has been much appreciated by all those who have worked alongside them. We encourage and hope that the Canadians will continue to make a contribution in Afghanistan. They have been real allies in every sense of the word.

T6. [309596] Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State recall the very skilful operation in September 2008, which saw considerable loss of life, in which British soldiers took a turbine to the Kajaki dam? Why is it that that turbine has not functioned since its delivery? Can we be told why not? Is it still in kit form? What is the problem, because it cost us dearly?

Mr. Ainsworth: There is a project to increase the electricity supply to the whole of Afghanistan and the turbine at Kajaki is an important part of that. It is not all that we have relied on, and there have been local generation schemes, too. Of course it took a great deal of effort to get that turbine up to Kajaki; it was a tremendous achievement to get it there. Although we have not made the kind of progress that we would have wanted to make within the time scales that we would have wanted to meet in order to get the benefit of that achievement, the Kajaki dam none the less delivers electricity, and we are hopeful that we can increase the amount of electricity that it provides.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want several more colleagues to get in, but I need very short questions and very short answers.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): Do Ministers share the concerns that have been expressed to me by servicemen who have recently returned from Afghanistan that, although they welcome the arrival of new equipment, in many cases the first time that they get an opportunity to use it is in theatre because it is not yet available for training outside Afghanistan?

Mr. Ainsworth: That is not true. People have equipment available during pre-deployment training for their operations in Afghanistan. The hon. Gentleman will remember that just before Christmas we announced a diversion of resources from other programmes to ensure that the equipment that people are expected to fight in will be available to them far earlier. That diversion was opposed by many Opposition Members at the time, but I see from the newspapers that they are now prepared to cut the defence budget, albeit that they will protect the mission in Afghanistan.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): Has the Secretary of State seen the report in The Times of India about a secret conclave of the Indian general staff in Simla last month in which a planned military attack on Pakistan was discussed openly? Is it really helpful for a Commonwealth partner and nuclear power to talk about attacking Pakistan at this stage? Will he write to ask his Indian opposite number to stop beating the drums of war?

Mr. Speaker: Order. One question will do, and we certainly want one answer.

Mr. Ainsworth: I did not see the article. I think that we have made considerable progress in our relationship with Pakistan, which has begun to see the insurgency and terrorism as a big part of the existential threat to Pakistan. We want it to continue in that direction, and so good relations with India have a vital part to play if we are to achieve that.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): One injured serviceman recently said to me that his fear for other injured servicemen in receipt of lump-sum compensation packages was that they got no financial advice on how to manage that money. For some of them, it is a large sum of the sort that they have never had before. Will the Minister consider that issue to make sure that they get the proper financial advice?

Mr. Kevan Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The issue has also been raised with me and is part of Lord Boyce's review.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Can the Secretary of State describe any possible future situation in which this country will use its nuclear weapons independently?

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Our independent nuclear deterrent exists to provide us with a response to the kind of blackmail that we could potentially face from other states that are armed with nuclear weapons. I therefore believe that while such threats exist we need to continue to possess a nuclear deterrent.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Major-General Andrew Mackay, the commander of British forces in Helmand, recently reported that the UK had "consistently failed" to understand the motivations of local Afghans, and called for a fresh "hearts and minds" strategy focusing on the local culture. When will we see that new strategy?

Mr. Ainsworth: There is not going to be a new strategy. We have a strategy, which is a comprehensive and political strategy as well as a military strategy. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that our understanding of the reasons behind the insurgency, and of local culture, needs to be strengthened. In any conflict, we need to learn those lessons as quickly as possible and get to a level of skill and understanding as soon as we can. We are not perfect at that, as the Afghan and Iraq operations have proved. That is one of the issues that we need to address in a future strategic defence review.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): In The Times today, Robin Greenwood of Christian Aid writes:

> "senior military officers complain that aid workers spend too much time and money empowering Afghan women."

That refers to a quote from an article last week by reporters from The Times. Is that an accurate view of Britain's senior military personnel?

Mr. Ainsworth: Our military personnel working in Helmand province—I have seen them working alongside their civilian counterparts—recognise completely the absolutely essential role that civilians play, and the need to empower Afghan institutions. We can do things on our own without any involvement from the Afghan authorities, but they will not be lasting, and they will fall apart as soon as we let them go.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Given the shortage of helicopters in Afghanistan, when are the remaining Merlin helicopters in Iraq going to be moved into theatre?[1]

Mr. Quentin Davies: We have already begun to deploy them. The first Merlin arrived before Christmas, and Merlins are in the process of being deployed there. Over the next few months, we will deploy not only more Merlins, but more Chinooks and the re-engined Lynxes, which can fly 365 days a year. As I said earlier, between July last year and July this year, there is to be a 50 per cent. increase in the number of helicopters in Afghanistan, and an even greater increase in available flying hours.

David Cairns (Inverclyde) (Lab): The Under-Secretary of State for Defence, my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), will be aware that a review is under way of the future of Navy buildings in Greenock. Given that the review is four months old, and given that the issue is extremely important to the people who work there, will he provide an update on that review? If not, will he agree to meet me to discuss the matter?

Mr. Kevan Jones: The review is ongoing, and I am happy to meet my hon. Friend.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I refer the Secretary of State to the typically excellent question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir Peter Tapsell). What evidence is there that any of the Taliban whom we have killed in Helmand had anything to do with bomb plots against this country?

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: There is no doubt that the centre of al-Qaeda's power remains in the area between Afghanistan and Pakistan. It may well currently reside on the Pakistan side of that border, but if our troops were not on the Afghan side of the border, the threat would be bound to return, in my opinion, and a return of the direct threat to this country would result from that.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): In my constituency returning veterans and their families are made homeless. That is no way to treat them. Will the Minister take steps to force recalcitrant councils to give housing priority to our returning heroes and their families?

Mr. Kevan Jones: The housing priority is already in place, but I shall roll out the welfare pathway, which was launched in Kent in November. That is about councils working together with other agencies, the Ministry of Defence and service charities to bring together maximum help for veterans, service personnel and their families. There is now one phone number for anyone who needs help; it is 08000 223366.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I, too, have a constituent who was tragically bereaved by the Chinook accident. Will the Minister indicate whether there are any circumstances in which he might reopen the matter and review a decision that is increasingly challenged and that looks more and more unhappy?

Bill Rammell: The Ministry of Defence has always made it clear that if new evidence is brought forward that directly focuses on the issues and provides evidence of technical failure, we would reopen the investigation. No such new evidence has been forthcoming.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will Ministers learn the lesson from the tragic death last year of Andrew Watson, my constituent, who, having served in Iraq, had continuing mental health problems, and will they make sure that when servicemen and women return, they always have 24-hour-a-day access to mental health services that understand their past and their difficulties?

Mr. Kevan Jones: They already do, in terms of decompression at Camp Bloodhound in Cyprus, but I am pleased that today, my counterpart, the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) and I signed a memorandum of understanding with Combat Stress, concentrating not just on veterans but on their expertise, and on how we can ensure that the lessons from the six mental health pilots are included in mainstream services in the NHS.

---

[1] [Official Report, 25 January 2010, Vol. 504, c. 3MC.]

Severe Weather (Transport and Public Services)

3.34 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Sadiq Khan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat a statement that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Transport made about the severe weather, transport networks and public services.

With leave, I will make a statement on the recent prolonged severe weather that we are currently experiencing and on the steps being taken to support our public services. The current cold weather began in mid-December and is the most prolonged spell of freezing conditions across the UK since December 1981. The Met Office forecasts that the current very cold conditions are likely to continue across most of the country for some days longer.

These extreme conditions continue to affect our transport and energy networks, as well as public services, including schools and hospitals. I would like to thank the many hundreds of thousands of people working tirelessly across the country to keep Britain moving in these extreme conditions.

Over the past weeks, we have seen many tremendous examples of Britain's community spirit in action, with people lending vehicles, digging clear paths to allow ambulances and police vehicles through and visiting neighbours in need. We will do all that we can to support and encourage people helping out in their communities.

Our key priority is to keep open the core transport networks, national and local. All main transport networks are operational, even though with reduced services in some areas. The vast majority of the motorways and major trunk roads remain open. Network Rail and the train operating companies advise that the major rail routes are open, subject to delays and cancellations. The position is similar for air travellers. Eurostar is running a reduced service. Our advice remains that people should check routes before they travel, and I thank all travellers for their forbearance at this time.

To keep our roads open, much of our attention has been on ensuring that ploughs and gritters have got out to where they are needed most. The Highways Agency has had its fleet of 500 salt spreaders and snow ploughs out in force throughout this period, as have local authorities.

Last week, we opened Salt Cell—a collaborative task force involving central Government, the Local Government Association, the Met Office, the devolved Administrations and Transport for London. The group advises salt suppliers on how best to distribute salt.

Last Friday, I directed the Highways Agency to manage its use of salt in response to forecasts of prolonged bad weather, by reducing its daily use of salt by at least 25 per cent. It has achieved that by taking measures such as not directly spreading salt on the hard shoulder of motorways.

For local roads, the Local Government Association and the Mayor of London have agreed to reduce daily use by at least 25 per cent. also, recognising the importance of mutual support to keep Britain moving safely. Local authorities are taking their own decisions on the prioritisation of supplies in their localities. The Highways Agency has played a key role in providing mutual aid of additional salt and gritters to local highway authorities and key organisations, such as Felixstowe port.

We continue to take all possible steps to maximise the production of salt from our principal suppliers. On 29 December, the Highways Agency placed an order for significant additional salt imports, which are due to start arriving later this month.

The energy sector is experiencing high demand due to the extreme conditions. The system has been responding generally well at a time of record demand. However, ongoing supply issues in Norway have caused National Grid to issue a gas balancing alert today, as well as on Saturday, when the problems arose. The gas balancing alert is a tool that National Grid uses to make sure that there is enough gas on tap and there is no shortage of supply for domestic customers.

The Department for Work and Pensions is helping citizens in two ways this winter: with winter fuel payments—first introduced in 1997, and now standing at £250 for pensioner households, rising to £400 for the over-80s—and cold weather payments of £25 for those in receipt of pension credit, where there are sub-zero temperatures over the course of seven consecutive days. Cold weather payments were last year increased to £25 from £8.50 per week. These payments are automatic. Everyone in Great Britain who is entitled will get them and should not worry about turning up their heating.

During times of increased demand, we all need to think responsibly about whether our health issues are a genuine priority and use NHS resources responsibly. Medical advice is available by phone through NHS Direct.

There are no reports of major problems with food supplies reaching retailers. Because the UK has a diverse supply of food from domestic and international suppliers, we are not reliant on just one source of food, which helps maintain stability of supply as well as helping keep prices stable. Last week we relaxed the enforcement of drivers' hours regulations to ensure that the essential deliveries of rock salt and animal feed could be made. Over the weekend, we further relaxed the enforcement of the regulations to allow the delivery of fuel oil to remote areas of Scotland and of de-icer to airports, and to allow bulk milk tankers to continue making their deliveries.

Schools are making every effort to reopen after last week's closures, and this week there has been a significant improvement. The Department for Children, Schools and Families reports that virtually all exam centres are able to run their exams as scheduled, or have found alternative locations at which to hold them.

I know that the House will wish to join me in thanking the hundreds of thousands of people across the transport industries, the NHS, the education system, the armed forces, local authorities and other public services for helping all our communities come through this severe weather. However, the forecasts are for a further period of snow and sub-zero overnight temperatures and we must take further steps to keep Britain moving.

In July last year, the UK Roads Liaison Group published a report into the lessons learned from the severe weather experienced in February 2009. Recommendations that were made to central Government were adopted immediately and in full. There were recommendations to local authorities as well, on which individual authorities were expected to act. The key recommendation was that local highway authorities should keep at least six days of salt stocks, and that over and above this the Highways Agency should hold an additional strategic supply to underpin national resilience. To this end, the Highways Agency came into this winter period with a 13-day supply of salt, subject of course to replenishment.

[Mr. Sadiq Khan]

The report also made recommendations for my Department to convene a Salt Cell task force to prioritise supplies in the event of extreme conditions. That we have done. Salt Cell has enabled us to prioritise salt distribution to where it is most needed, and I am grateful for the co-operation of the Local Government Association, the Mayor of London and the devolved Administrations. Salt Cell next meets tomorrow morning.

Given the prolongation of the very cold weather, further measures are likely to be required over the next 48 hours to keep networks open. These are likely to include further steps to conserve salt, to ensure that the Highways Agency and local authorities can manage during the continuing severe weather. The Local Government Association and the Government are in constant contact and we will continue to take the necessary operational decisions to keep networks open as far as possible. We are experiencing the most severe weather conditions for 29 years, in common with much of northern Europe. We need to continue pulling together for the common good, as we have done over the past weeks.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I thank the Minister for advance notice of his statement.

Like the Minister, I pay tribute to all the councils, council workers, salt producers, the armed forces, the police and others who are working so hard to try to keep the country moving during the present crisis. We should remember that many communities have had three solid weeks of this, without the brief respite over Christmas that much of the south-east enjoyed.

Everyone accepts that a degree of disruption is inevitable with such extreme weather, but the Government have important questions to answer about the adequacy of the preparations that they made for the weather episode. It is not acceptable for the Government just to pass the buck to local authorities. Will the Government accept their share of responsibility for the current shortage of gritting salt, particularly in the light of the fact that the Government's Salt Cell now controls allocations of salt across the country?

What are the local salt stocks now held in the UK, and how long will they last? Which areas in need have the lowest stocks? Does the Minister have any estimate of the proportion of roads and pavements that have not been gritted or cleared? Have our armed services got all the salt that they need? Should the NHS be included in the Salt Cell to help ensure that hospitals and emergency services have access to all the salt that they need? Why did it take until last week to relax drivers' hours, when these problems have been ongoing for nearly a month?

The media have reported a recent diversion of exported salt to use in this country. What other exports have taken place since the cold weather episode began, and why were steps not taken more quickly to divert exports back for UK use? Why is Salt Cell not meeting today, given the urgency of the situation? What estimate has the Minister made of the cost of repairing the damage to the roads caused by the freezing conditions? Does he agree that it is wholly contrary to common sense if people feel at risk of negligence claims when they clear paths and pavements? Is that not penalising the sort of socially responsible behaviour that all parties should encourage? Is he aware that anxiety about liability was one reason why many schools stayed shut?

The Government accused us of scaremongering about gas supplies, but if everything is fine with energy supplies why did National Grid issue its fourth alert in two weeks today? The Local Government Association, in its July report, "Weathering the Storm: Dealing with Adverse Winter Weather Conditions in the UK", concluded with the key lesson that should have been learned from last February's weather crisis and low salt supplies. It stated:

> "Effectively, the country is almost completely reliant on two main suppliers operating deliveries on a 'just in time' basis."

Will the Minister acknowledge that the Government's failure to heed that warning meant that many councils found it almost impossible to obtain resupplies as the cold snap progressed? Does he accept that the scarcity of salt supplies has undermined councils' ability to grit and clear side roads and pavements? Will he acknowledge the extent of the concern about slippery pavements—shown particularly by the elderly, many of whom have felt reluctant to leave their homes for the past few weeks?

The Secretary of State's requests for councils to reduce their daily use of salt by 25 per cent. was an admission of failure by the Government. They made inadequate preparations for the cold weather; they sat on the LGA's report on the issue until two days before the snow started to fall; and they failed to learn the lessons of February 2009, leaving our road network far more vulnerable to disruption than it should have been—to the detriment of families and businesses throughout the country, already struggling with the impact of one of the longest and deepest recessions in modern history.

Mr. Khan: May I say how disappointed I was by the mean-spiritedness with which the hon. Lady asked the vast majority of her questions? Before I take each point that she raised in turn, may I repeat my tribute to local authorities of whichever party throughout the country? I appreciate some people's nervousness at the fact that a number of local authorities are Conservative-run, but I am not going to point the finger at them and blame them for the problems that they have had. We have to understand this point: either we are a nanny state, telling local authorities what to do and controlling how much salt they order, or we trust locally elected councillors to order the right amount of salt based on the advice that experts gave in July.

It is worth reminding ourselves of the history of the issue. After February's severe weather, the then Secretary of State for Transport asked not only for a review but for experts to report on the matter, and they did so in July. Of the many recommendations that were made, four applied to my Department and all were dealt with immediately and in full. A number of recommendations applied to local authorities. I appreciate the difficulties that we have with some authorities that are Conservative-run, but I am not going to point the finger at them.

I must say, however, that the idea that we state-produce salt and tell local authorities where to get it from is absurd. These are commercial decisions that local authorities take.

The hon. Lady referred to the decision to reduce the amount of salt that we distribute on our roads—the motorways and trunk roads—by at least 25 per cent. We took that decision for the roads that we control, and the Local Government Association and the Mayor of London agreed to those levels. We could not force them to go down to those levels; they showed that they understand the challenges that we face, and they agreed to reduce the amount to those levels because they actually run things and know when a common-sense decision needs to be taken. They did not oppose it for opposition's sake.

Over this period we have had constructive dialogue with all key stakeholders, including Government offices, the regional resilience centres and others. It is not true—indeed, it is misleading—to say that the first decision to relax EU hours was taken last week and this weekend; it was taken before Christmas and extended last week and over the weekend.

In relation to Salt Cell's meetings, again I should say that one benefit of running things is that one gets some experience, and one thing that we have to do before we hold such meetings is to get the information in. Today is therefore important, because, before a decision is taken about where salt goes over the next period, we are actually speaking to local authorities and finding out how much salt they have, and finding out from salt suppliers where the salt went during the previous period.

The hon. Lady was right, however, to express concern about scaremongering in relation to potential litigation and about the prosecution of people showing common sense and a generosity of spirit in clearing their pathways. I would say, however, that the situation is not helped when certain newspapers carry front-page stories causing alarm and distress among some of the elderly people she and I are concerned about.

On the LGA report of July-August, the fact that it could prepare a report after the report by the UK Roads Liaison Group shows that it understood the challenges that it faced. I would say in its defence that this is the most severe and prolonged period of bad weather in 29 years. I am sure that local government would be criticised if it had bought equipment and salt that sat idle for 10, 15, 20 or 30 years, especially when it has been asked to make stringent—some would say savage—cuts over this period. We continue to work constructively with all key stakeholders, whether they be local government, the Mayor of London, the devolved Administrations, or salt suppliers working in the private sector.

I hope that the Opposition have seen the generosity of the British public over the recent period; I would expect that generosity to spread to politicians as well.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): May I, too, pass on my thanks to the staff of the Highways Agency and local councils, and indeed the railway industry, for what they have been doing to try to keep our infrastructure going?

I accept that, as the Minister says, much of what takes place is a matter for devolved local council work, or for private companies such as the salt companies, but I hope that he accepts that the Government have an ultimate responsibility to ensure that the national infrastructure is kept operational and intact. With that in mind, will he reflect on the suggestion that local authorities should have had six days' supply of salt and consider whether that is adequate given the experience that we have had, and given that, as regards the order that was put in on 29 December, it will take some time for overseas stocks to arrive, which means that if the weather deteriorates—it may not—we could run out of salt?

Some local authorities have done extremely well, but some appear to be using the lack of salt as an excuse to cut back on gritting, perhaps unnecessarily. Will the Minister consider whether that is appropriate and examine these procedures to ensure that people across the country have the best transport infrastructure that they possibly can in the circumstances that apply?

Will the Minister confirm that the Highways Agency has been asking local authorities whether they can help with its supplies? For example, Stockport borough council has been asked if it can help the agency by providing extra stocks.

Does the Minister recognise that significant long-term costs will arise for local highways authorities as a result of the damage to the road network that will undoubtedly be caused by the use of salt and grit? There will be a big repair bill at the end of this—will he factor that into the local government settlement for councils?

Notwithstanding the wish that the Minister and I share for devolution to local councils, does he recognise that some councils, including my own, have taken the view that it is inappropriate to treat any pavements at all and have concentrated all their salting and gritting on the roads? Is that not unfair on pedestrians, particularly those who are elderly and infirm, and may, for example, have to get off a bus on to an ice sheet next to the bus stop?

Will the Minister examine the cost to the economy of this episode, which is running into billions? Will he consider whether higher levels of grit and salt maintained by local councils would do more to minimise the damage to the economy, as well as the cost to the NHS arising from people being in hospital unnecessarily as a consequence of falls?

On legality, does the Minister accept that, unfortunately, some people, including those in schools, are genuinely concerned about possible liability issues? In my view, many schools should have opened much sooner but have not done so because of fears of liability. What sense does it make for children to be turning up at school, having trudged their way through ice and snow to get there, only to be told that they have to stay indoors and cannot go out in the playground to play because schools are worried about being sued if the children fall over there?

Finally, will the Minister ensure that there is a review of this whole episode and report back to Parliament in due course on the lessons to be learned?

Mr. Khan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments and questions. He is right to refer to the issue of six days' supply of salt. I draw his attention to the UKRLG report, which is a very full report that touches on many of the issues raised. In chapter 8, under the heading

[Mr. Khan]

"Winter Service Resilience", it recommended six days' worth of salt as an adequate amount. In the group's mind must have been the fact that, in February 2009, we had the worst weather in 18 years. We now have the worst weather in 29 years, and I suspect that once we reach the end of this prolonged period of bad weather and consider our options for reviews and so on, we will need to make a cost-benefit analysis of whether, given that we have had prolonged bad weather in two consecutive years, it makes more sense to save enough salt for a longer period. That analysis would include, for example, investment in salt barns, because one of the big challenges for local authorities and the Highways Agency is the amount of storage space that they have for salt. Local authorities have asked themselves whether it is worth their spending money on salt barns given that they use salt so infrequently. That is for experts to consider, not for me on the Floor of the House, but it is an important question.

The hon. Gentleman raised an important point about diversifying suppliers in the chain. Salt is a geological issue and I cannot invent salt in the mines of England overnight, but as part of the contractual terms with suppliers, even domestic suppliers can be asked to have some foreign imports in their supply chain. The Highways Agency does that to ensure that it protects our supply chain of salt.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point about mutual aid. We can provide central aid to local authorities, but there are also many really good examples of local authorities helping others that have less salt, for obvious reasons, by giving them salt. That is an example of the generosity of spirit that I mentioned, and we need more of it.

The hon. Gentleman referred also to the damage to local authority highways caused by grit and salt, which is one issue that will need to be considered in a cost-benefit analysis of the general pattern of bad weather. He will be aware from the urgent question last week and my response to it that I cannot give advice centrally about which pavements should be gritted and which should not, and Salt Cell, the Government and extreme bad weather cannot be used as an excuse for a local authority not discharging its responsibility as it should. A local authority needs to consider the fact that as a matter of common sense, a pathway that leads to a general practitioner's practice, for example, is probably more in need of gritting than a road that very few people drive down. Once again, it is for local authorities to take that decision.

The hon. Gentleman's final point was the very important one of liability, which was also raised by the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers). There are concerns about people being risk-averse or using the weather as an excuse not to do things that they should. I was pleased to see the comments of the president of the Association of British Insurers in the press today and yesterday, which will have given some comfort to schools and local authorities concerned about being defendants in a future civil litigation or prosecution if they open up the schools. As far as individual schools are concerned, most decisions whether to open or close are taken by head teachers. Some local authorities are giving out advice and being prescriptive, but other decisions are being taken by head teachers on a horses-for-courses basis. I am pleased as I am sure the hon. Gentleman is, that so many examination centres are open today, so that the many students who have revised for long periods can take their exams.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Some 21 hon. and right hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, so as ever short questions and short answers will be required if I am to have any chance of accommodating everybody. I call Mr. Martin Salter. [Laughter.]

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): True grit, Mr. Speaker. I think the heckling needs to be short as well.

Does the Minister agree that one of the most important priorities must be to reopen the schools, to avoid damaging children's education but also to allow other vital public sector workers such as ambulance drivers—and dare I say—gritter lorry drivers, NHS staff, firefighters and Highways Agency staff to get to work themselves? Will he commend the approach of Mr. Charlie Clare, head teacher of Geoffrey Field junior school in my constituency, who got together the staff, some private contractors and some parents to clear the snow and ice themselves this weekend, so that his school could open today? Teachers cannot be immune from the challenges faced in cold weather. Other public sector workers have to deal with them.

Mr. Khan: As ever, I cannot disagree with anything that my hon. Friend has said, and I commend and endorse his points. It is worth bearing in mind that every day a school is closed, not only is children's education disrupted but the knock-on effect on their carers is phenomenal.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the whole House to join me in congratulating the work force at Winsford rock salt mine on their continuous, 24/7 working, be they down the mine, in the office, the order takers or the management.

I hope that the Minister will take it as a positive and constructive comment that he should look carefully now at avoiding delays in the operation of Salt Cell so that the producers quickly get news of what is required where and can then get on with supplying without further delay. We should also ensure that we learn the lessons of how to resupply in the autumn rather than waiting for the winter.

Mr. Khan: I hear the hon. Gentleman's point and will ensure that such delays do not happen. The Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Paul Clark), reminded me that he visited the salt mine and was very impressed by the work of the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central) (Lab): May I also put on record my congratulations on the sterling work of Sheffield city council, which has done a fantastic job? That is in contrast with the Liberal leader of the council, who went on BBC radio on the evening of Friday 8 January to say that we would have a weekend of despair in the city because we had no salt and there was no telephone number to ring as people were not working over the weekend. While he was appearing on the news, 280 tonnes of salt were being delivered to Sheffield city council, and another 300 tonnes have subsequently been delivered. Will my right hon. Friend contact the city council to ensure that it has the right information so that the council leader cannot scaremonger in Sheffield?

Mr. Khan: As ever, my right hon. Friend has highlighted some of the options that people have taken during this difficult time—we can either come together and get through the difficult time, or make picky, silly points, which are factually incorrect, and use the conditions as an excuse to score cheap, party political points.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): My constituents are almost on their knees because of the lack of trains due to First Capital Connect. Last Thursday, not a single train stopped in St. Albans—because, I gather, the trains were washed on Wednesday evening and therefore froze. What can be done to get a better service for my constituents, who are in despair about the lack of train services from St. Albans to St. Pancras?

Mr. Khan: The example beggars belief. May I look into the specific reason for disruption on that day? Network Rail and the train operating companies have told us that the lines are open. For obvious reasons, there are reduced services and some delays. The hon. Lady's example looks like incompetence rather than a delay caused by severe weather.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): The Minister spoke about prioritising salt and grit and putting gritters where they are needed most. May I put in a bid for rural, remote areas such as North-East Derbyshire, where it is still snowing, and ask him to put them at the top of his priority list?

Mr. Khan: We know that some of the roads and railway lines in the trans-Pennine area are experiencing particular difficulties. I will look into the specific issue that my hon. Friend raises, but we also know that roads are lifelines for rural parts of the country, especially for older people who are cut off from other members of the community and cannot be given simple things such as hot meals and for whom supply is a source of concern. I emphasise that I will consider my hon. Friend's specific point.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Should not schools that have to close for snow find alternative days during the year when they can replace the missing education?

Mr. Khan: The right hon. Gentleman makes an important point about hours and days lost as a result of school closures. I understand that the Department for Children, Schools and Families gives guidance about the closure caused by extreme weather in which one of the issues is making up lost time.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): There is concern in Lancashire that the county council has neglected east Lancashire, where there are many hills, and which has been hard hit. Has my friend given any thought to transferring responsibility to lower-tier authorities in two-tier areas such as Lancashire? Many people want local control of gritting.

Mr. Khan: We have not looked at devolving gritting even further. One of the lessons that may be learned from the experience of the past two or three weeks is whether there is sense in economies of scale, or in going the other way in some cases. The key point is that those who know their communities best know the places that are in most need of gritting. Local communities' information can be of huge benefit and a great boon.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): May I commend the efforts of local council workers and emergency service workers in Bexhill and Battle? I cannot say the same of the management of Southeastern trains. The train service south of Tunbridge Wells to Hastings has been patchy in the past few days, and it is totally unacceptable that station platforms were not cleared. Not a flake of snow was shifted from the platforms of Battle station from Monday till yesterday, making it extremely dangerous for the travelling public. That is simply not acceptable.

Mr. Khan: Once again, I will look into the hon. Gentleman's example. He makes a very important point and I will look into it.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): When I was a lad, schools did not shut because of the snow. Before the day is out, will the Minister nail the urban myth that people who clear the snow on the pavement outside their houses or businesses are somehow likely to be held legally liable? Will the Government please nail that urban myth, because it used to be that an uncleared pavement was the exception, but now the cleared pavement is the exception?

Mr. Khan: Those were the days! Somebody will probably come up with an example of someone being prosecuted or sued, but the hon. Gentleman is right: the message that is sent to the good citizen or somebody who wants to discharge their civic duty is perverse. At a time when schools are closed, we want young people to be doing something constructive. If a school is closed, people expect their young son or daughter to be outside helping a neighbour—perhaps someone who does not have children—to clear their pathways, and not to be frightened of being sued or prosecuted.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What would the Minister say to Conservative-controlled Northamptonshire county council, which was well prepared for the severe weather, but suddenly found that because Salt Cell was activated, supplies it was due to receive were sent elsewhere in the country?

Mr. Khan: When we talk about generosity of spirit, we hope it applies to local authorities as well as to politicians and members of our community. Salt Cell is about advising salt suppliers which parts of the country need salt most. If a local authority has adequate supplies of salt and another does not because of the prolonged bad weather, it is not going against the spirit of what we are talking about to allow the latter to receive the salt that it needs. That was agreed by the Local Government Association, the devolved Administrations, the Mayor of London and all the key stakeholders, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has reminded people, and it was recommended by the UK Roads Liaison Group.

[Mr. Khan]

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I pay tribute to all those who have made sterling efforts to try to keep my constituents moving, but what lessons have been learned about the export of British salt and grit at a time when many local authorities, including my own, have not had the orders that they had placed fulfilled? May I gently say to the Minister that perhaps a good watchword for the future would be this: British grit for British roads?

Mr. Khan: One's principles and values are challenged at difficult times. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we outlaw private companies from exporting to other parts of this planet for a profit? If so, I am happy to look into it—[Laughter.] However, I suggest that it is more sensible for local authorities to look at the market to see where salt is available and to learn from the experience of extreme bad weather. Some local authorities get salt from overseas, as does the Highways Agency itself.

Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): We are still waiting for an answer to the question whether local authorities will have any additional funds made available to them to repair the damage to pavements and roads, but I am more interested in knowing what assessment the Department has made of the risk of flooding after the snow melts.

Mr. Khan: The second part of the hon. Lady's question is very important. As the snow melts, there is a real concern about flooding—that is one issue that is being looked into. On her first point, if she is suggesting additional expenditure for additional funding for local authorities over and above the Bellwin funding and other sources, I am sure her hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor will be interested to hear of it, as indeed will we, because it will add to the £34 billion black hole in the Conservatives' spending plans.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): There are some village schools in my constituency, such as Horsington and Berkley schools, that cannot open, despite the best efforts of the staff, because the county council has not cleared the roads to them. The vice-chair of the Berkley governors was told on Friday by the county council: "As of this morning, the control of grit and salt has been taken over by central Government and therefore, even if we wanted to, we would not be able to authorise the clearing of the road to the school." Is the Minister happy that the Government are now the excuse for Somerset county council?

Mr. Khan: As has been my experience over the past four and a half years, the hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Over the past few days and weeks, we have seen examples of local authorities and others using central Government as an excuse for their inability to run services in their communities. We need to be vigilant about local authorities that point the finger—most of them, I am afraid, happen to be Conservative authorities, as he will be aware—and that are prayed in aid by ill-briefed spokespeople for Her Majesty's Opposition, whether for the Department for Communities and Local Government or the Department for Transport.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Can the Minister assure me that the Highways Agency, which he controls, will properly prioritise parts of our national roads? For example, the A5 at Hinckley next to my constituency is extremely dangerous on the Sketchley bends, but other stretches, further down, are not. Will he ensure proper prioritisation?

Mr. Khan: I undertake to get back in touch with the hon. Gentleman about the example that he raises. One of the key things that we need to do is ensure that the roads for which either the Highways Agency or the highways authorities are statutorily responsible, of which there are more than 150, are covered.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): De-icer deliveries are vital to airports, as are deliveries of heating oil to homes and businesses throughout the north of Scotland and elsewhere. Driving restrictions have been relaxed, which I very much welcome, but the deadline for some of those restrictions is coming up. Will the Government review those restrictions, with a view to allowing those vital deliveries to continue?

Mr. Khan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question. The latest relaxation for de-icer products to airports was issued at 4 pm on Friday 8 January, and we know that it will run out imminently. We keep such matters under review and we have ensured that we relax EU directives whenever that is required. We shall of course take on board the various needs of the drivers, as well as the needs of the wider community.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Last week I received a clear assurance at Prime Minister's questions that there would be sufficient salt supplies to meet the needs of local authorities, yet today most of the pavements and residential roads in my constituency are still treacherous and, in some places, impassable. What went wrong between last Wednesday and today, meaning that Hampshire county council has still not received the salt deliveries that it needs?

Mr. Khan: I am not sure whether the hon. Lady is suggesting that all the pavements in her constituency and her county should be gritted. As I have said a number of times this afternoon, and as has been said by others too, Salt Cell advises salt suppliers on which parts of the country need the salt the most. It is for local authorities to decide how that salt is used.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): On Saturday I congratulated a couple of gritters who had visited Cow Ark near Clitheroe, a hamlet that had been isolated since before Christmas. We know that the gritters cannot do every village straight away, but I understand that in the past the network of farmers was used to clear the roads. However, we are now told that they need NVQs in health and safety. Is that correct? If so, as the Minister has relaxed some rules, can he now make absolutely certain that local authorities can ask farmers to get out there with the equipment that they know how to use and clear those roads?

Mr. Khan: I have referred all afternoon to the importance of common sense and generosity of spirit. What the hon. Gentleman describes is news to me. I shall get back to him on the points that he has made, because it seems that people who can help to clear pathways, and who want to use their common sense and demonstrate their generosity of spirit, are being deprived of the opportunity to do so. That should not be the case.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): In that spirit, let me tell the Minister of the excellent work done by the work force of West Sussex county council, Mid Sussex district council and the town councils in Mid-Sussex, and of the heroic efforts of many other snow heroes, who used their common sense and tried to keep the place going. Does he agree that the lessons learned from the past few days will be extremely important for the future? Will he take the trouble to get examples of best practice from councils all over the country, so that the guidance issued is truly useful?

Mr. Khan: I cannot disagree with anything the hon. Gentleman has said. I shall merely add that one reason why the UKRLG was asked to produce its review following the February experience—the worst weather for 18 years—was that we could learn the lessons from it. We are now experiencing the worst weather for 29 years. We have a habit in this country of criticising ourselves and what we do when times are bad. However, when we compare what is happening here with the experience in northern Europe, where the weather is equally bad, we find that we have coped a lot better than France, Germany and elsewhere. The examples that the hon. Gentleman gave demonstrate the generosity of spirit and common sense of the people in Sussex and in other parts of the country.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I am grateful to the Minister for his efforts over the weekend to ensure that the working hours rules for drivers delivering heating oil to households across the highlands were relaxed. I understand that that relaxation will expire at midnight tonight, but there is still a significant backlog of heating oil deliveries. This will particularly affect needy families in rural areas, where it would be a disaster if energy supplies were to run short. Will he look urgently into continuing the relaxation of the working hours rules in the days to come, to ensure that the backlog can be cleared?

Mr. Khan: I have heard the hon. Gentleman's request, and I have read the three texts that he sent me this morning. I will ensure that, when the relaxation of the rules expires tonight, we make the right decision, to ensure that his constituents, and those in the wider community, get the service that they need.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Ind): You will be astounded to learn, Mr. Speaker, that my local council gritted the access to the local Conservative club but totally refused to grit the access to a doctor's surgery, which is long and dangerous for elderly and frail people. It is still refusing to do so. How can we get some common sense in how local councillors prioritise using their grit?

Mr. Khan: Some of us believe that access to a doctor's surgery is more of a priority than access to the Conservative club. I am disappointed that there is not agreement on that across the Chamber.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): My constituents want to know who audits the lack of performance by local authorities, many of which have a considerable number of executives who earn more than the Prime Minister. That obviously does not include the Health and Safety Executive, because I reported Lancashire county council to the HSE last year for its blanket non-gritting of side roads and pavements. This year, the Conservative leader of Lancashire county council has berated me for wanting all the bus routes gritted. In fact, he proudly told local radio listeners that he would not do that. This is my question to the Minister: is this what we have to look forward to?

Mr. Khan: I pay tribute to the Local Government Association for the leadership that it is trying to provide in giving the right guidance to local authorities. Unfortunately, however, it cannot make local authorities do the right thing. My hon. Friend has given examples from her community of the council not providing the service it needs to provide. Councils such as hers are using central Government or Salt Cell as an excuse for not providing the right level of service. They should be prioritising roads that buses use, because that would allow people to catch buses and thus leave their homes. She and I need to ensure that we highlight the parts of the country in which councils have not provided the service that they should have done.

Children, Schools and Families Bill

[Relevant documents: The First Report of the Children, Schools and Families Committee, School Accountability, HC 88-I, and the Second Report of the Committee, The Review of Elective Home Education, HC 39-I.]

Second Reading

4.18 pm

The Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families (Ed Balls): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Children, Schools and Families Bill is vital to meet what I believe is our moral imperative to help every child and young person to make the most of their talents and to ensure that no barrier is allowed to hold them back. But, as well as that moral imperative, we face an economic imperative to ensure that all our young people get the skills that they need and that businesses are demanding, so that our country can thrive and succeed in the 21st century global economy.

As we debate the Bill today, 750 education experts and more than 70 Education Ministers representing 1 billion children in 80 countries around the world are meeting here in London on the other side of Parliament square, at the learning and technology world forum—the largest education and technology event of its kind in the world. They are here both because the UK is a world leader in technology for education and because our Government and every Government around the world face these twin moral and economic imperatives.

As a result of our sustained record of investment and reform over the past 12 years, we have gone from below average to well above average in the world, but our ambition is to get to a world-class education system, in which every child, and not just some, gets all the help and support they need to make good progress, and every parent, and not just some, has the choice of a good local school. That is why the Bill sets out the next steps that we will take to achieve our ambition by providing a guaranteed route to a good qualification for every young person, a promise of guaranteed extra catch-up support for every child who falls behind, more power for parents, a boost to the status of the teaching profession and further backing for local leaders to ensure that every school is a good school with stronger back-stop powers for the Government to step in as a last resort if schools are not being turned round.

Those measures are essential for a strong economy and a fair society. They are now possible only because of our sustained investment and reform over the last decade and they are also all actively opposed by the Opposition parties, particularly by the Conservative party, which is proposing instead a costly and unfair free-market free-for-all that will be paid for only by huge cuts to existing schools.

Before I move on to the details of those measures, I am sure that the whole House will want to join me in paying tribute to my hon. Friend the former Member for North-West Leicestershire who sadly died on Boxing day and whose hugely well attended funeral took place on Saturday. He was a strong campaigner on behalf of children in this country and regularly made significant contributions to our education debates. He will be sorely missed in this House.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): And he was opposed to academies.

Ed Balls: My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position that David Taylor was opposed to academies, which is quite right, but he was also deeply committed to investing in and reforming our school system in order to deliver for all children, which was a regular part of his contribution.

To ensure that every young person can develop all the skills they need and that employers want, we have already introduced historic legislation to raise the education and training age to 18, to fund fully our school leavers' guarantee, to expand apprenticeships and to introduce diplomas. Through this Bill, we are now legislating to implement Sir Jim Rose's review of the primary curriculum from September next year so that teachers have more space and flexibility to decide what to teach while retaining a strong focus on basic literacy, numeracy and information communications technology. We will also put PSHE—personal, social and health education, including sex and relationship education and financial education—on a statutory footing for the first time and guarantee for the first time that all young people receive at least one year of sex and relationship education.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I speak as a governor of a Church of England primary school in my constituency, which has always taken tremendous care to involve parents in the sex and relationship education taught to their children in the school. What assurances can the Secretary of State give me that in future the ethos and culture of the school and the wishes of those parents will be respected, as I can tell him that there is worry across the House about this issue?

Ed Balls: I can give him an absolute assurance on that. I consulted in detail both the Catholic Education Service and Church of England education leaders as well as more widely before coming forward with this proposal. The decision to make sex and relationship education statutory is, I think, supported by all political parties, but it is essential that it is taught in line with the ethos, including the faith, of the school. That is clear in the legislation: it is clear that parents as well as school governors will have a say in how the subject is taught, while there is also a parental opt-out, which will apply to pupils until they are 15. I can thus give the hon. Gentleman the complete assurance that the school will be in charge of how to teach SRE, but the fact of teaching it will be in law and guaranteed to all children.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ed Balls: I will take another intervention.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Secretary of State seems to have the impression—he is certainly trying to give the impression—that everyone is in favour of making this a compulsory part of the national curriculum, but he knows that in September the Qualifications and Curriculum Development Agency published details of responses to the consultation it carried out, showing that of 6,433 responses, only 32 per cent. agreed with the proposal to make PSE a statutory part of the national curriculum. The right hon. Gentleman is still going ahead, despite the fact that on the basis of information from his own agency, most people are actually against it.

Ed Balls: I shall not fall into the trap of assuming that if those on the Opposition Front Bench support a policy the hon. Gentleman will support it, or vice versa. The fact that the hon. Gentleman does not support this policy and Opposition Front Benchers—I believe—do support it is probably fairly true to form.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there was an organised campaign as part of the consultation, but we also commissioned opinion polls, in both qualitative and quantitative terms. We published the findings at the time, and they showed overwhelming support from parents for making this statutory. I think that if the hon. Gentleman talks to parents and teachers, including head teachers, he will find a widespread consensus that—consistent with a school's ability to make its own decisions about method, content and the parental opt-out—this is the right thing to do, it is probably overdue, and it will help us to reduce the incidence of teenage pregnancies and encourage a culture of mutual respect among our young people.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): May I urge my right hon. Friend to avoid another trap? Will he ensure that discussion of the teaching of social and emotional behaviour, which is fundamental to all learning at primary and secondary level, is not narrowed to one tiny sliver of the argument about SRE, and that the Government's life skills package, which is widely supported throughout the House, is seen in perspective? It seems that one or two of our more exuberant colleagues want to discuss only one tiny aspect of that broad package.

Ed Balls: I agree with my hon. Friend, and wish him a very happy birthday. The fact that the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) almost certainly calls such classes "happy classes", and opposes them, contrasts starkly with what I believe to be the general view—that this is a very important part of our school system. Through sex and relationship education, through financial education and, more widely, through SEAL—social and emotional aspects of learning—we are teaching our children in primary and secondary schools resilience, character, respect and the ability to make their way in the world with pride and confidence. I think that schools that provide such teaching consider it to be an important part of the curriculum, and it must not be narrowed in the way described by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): I do not think that, in the 12 years of the current Government, it has given me so much pleasure to vote for a Second Reading as it will give me to vote confidently with the Government tonight—in contrast to the Conservatives, whose views on education are striking terror into the heart of every teacher and parent, especially in the poorer parts of Britain.

During the Bill's Committee stage, will my right hon. Friend look particularly at clause 26, on home teaching? There are genuine concerns about that, and my constituent Mr. Mike Dalby has written to me about it. Will my right hon. Friend be prepared to consider the clause flexibly so that we can get it absolutely right?

Ed Balls: It is important that we discuss the details of the home education provisions, and I shall say something about them in a moment. It is great to have my right hon. Friend's support for our Bill. It would be very nice to have a cross-party consensus in favour of it, but unfortunately it seems that although guaranteeing one-to-one catch-up tuition for children who fall behind is a priority for our party, it is not a priority for the Opposition parties.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ed Balls: I will take one more intervention, but then I must move on.

Daniel Kawczynski: The biggest problem is the huge difference in funding across the United Kingdom. The average Shropshire child receives about £3,300 per annum for his or her education, whereas in other parts of the country the figure can be as high as £9,000, £10,000 or £11,000. What is there in the Bill to redress that huge difference in funding levels?

Ed Balls: As the hon. Gentleman will know, we are currently conducting a review of the schools funding formula, and I hope that the subsequent report will enable us to make some progress in making the system fairer. Let me also point out that it is the hon. Gentleman's party, not our party, that is proposing a cut in the schools budget in 2010-11, which will only lead to greater unfairness.

I know that people in Shropshire, which contains the hon. Gentleman's constituency, are waiting for Building Schools for the Future to produce school building plans in wave 7. As the Chancellor announced in the pre-Budget report, we shall be proceeding with wave 7 in the coming months. It is the hon. Gentleman's party that has promised to cut £4.5 billion from the school building programme, which in his constituency would put 22 potential new building projects at risk. That is something about which he may wish to speak to his party's Front Benchers before raising the issue of schools funding with me in future.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Secretary of State says that the schools budget will increase if the Labour Government are re-elected. For the sake of clarity, will he explain precisely what that means in the context of the overall DCSF budget? Does it mean only the dedicated schools grant, or does it also include the school standards grant and school development grant? Does it, perhaps, include the standards fund, too, and all the Partnerships for Schools school capital spending? Does it include the Training and Development Agency for Schools budget for teachers, and the National College for Leadership of Schools and Children's Services budget? Will the Secretary of State make it clear which budget lines will receive an increase, and by how much?

Ed Balls: I am happy to do so, because this was all set out at the time of the pre-Budget report. In 2010-11, our schools budget will rise as set out in the spending review, plus we will provide the additional money for the September guarantee for school leavers—we will provide that, but the hon. Gentleman, despite 12 chances to match that school leavers guarantee, will not do so.

In 2011-12 and 2012-13, the schools budget will rise by 0.7 per cent. a year in real terms; that means all the money, including for one-to-one tuition, that goes directly to schools. The combination of that and efficiency savings mean that we can meet the guarantees we set out in this Bill.

[Ed Balls]

Michael Gove: Does that include money for the training and development of new teachers? Does it also include money for the training of head teachers, and does it specifically include capital funding for new schools?

Ed Balls: The hon. Gentleman knows that it does not include capital funding for schools, because the PBR set out a settlement of the current budget, and the current budget does not, by definition, include capital. He will also know, however, that the Chancellor announced that we will go forward with a further wave—wave 7—of Building Schools for the Future bids in the spring; the hon. Gentleman's party is committed to a £4.5 billion cut, but we are committed to continuing with the BSF programme. I also just said that all the budgets that go directly to schools have been guaranteed a 0.7 per cent. rise. That includes one-to-one tuition, but, at this stage, it does not include money going to non-departmental public bodies. This was all set out at the time of the PBR, so the hon. Gentleman has had the chance to ask me questions about it in the past—

Michael Gove: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ed Balls: No; if I may be allowed to do so, I shall finish my points before the hon. Gentleman stands up again.

I am raising the schools budget in 2011-12 and 2012-13, with the agreement of the Chancellor. The hon. Gentleman proposes to cut the schools budget in 2010-11, however; the reason is that the shadow Chancellor has told him he has got to do so. Despite regular attempts in the House to wriggle out of this, the fact is that, unlike the Conservatives' health budget, under the hon. Gentleman's watch the education budget is set to be cut.

Michael Gove: Can the Secretary of State confirm that spending on initial teacher training in schools will increase, and spending on—[Interruption.] No, it is the Secretary of State who is wriggling. Can he also confirm that spending on head teacher training will increase—spending, for example, on ensuring that heads who become national leaders of education can do their job—or will that be cut?

Ed Balls: I have just answered those questions. The problem with the hon. Gentleman is that, like the Leader of the Opposition, he writes his speeches and questions in advance, which means he never listens to the answers. What I said was that all the money that goes directly to schools is rising in real terms. The money that is going to agencies has not at this point been settled. So the money that is going to the TDA has not been settled—that is absolutely clear—but the money going to schools will rise this year, next year and the year after if this Government are re-elected, whereas it will be cut from next April if the hon. Gentleman's party is elected.

Michael Gove: Will the Secretary of State give way again?

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Many Back Benchers wish to speak in this debate. Given that Front Benchers will get a lot of time to make their points—even if they wish to make the same point five times—is it possible to take time off Front Benchers' speeches if they constantly interrupt at the expense of Back-Bench time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I am sure the hon. Gentleman realises that I am not in a position to rule on that matter at this point in time, but I hope that contributors from both Front Benches will confine their remarks to the Bill before the House, and also be very aware that a lot of Back Benchers wish to speak and they should be given every opportunity to do so.

Ed Balls: The fact is that a world-class education system depends on guaranteeing excellence for all, not just for some. What we have set out in this Bill are new pupil guarantees. We have set out clear entitlements to a broad and balanced curriculum for every pupil and to a place in education or training for all 16 and 17-year-olds who want one, and a route to high quality qualifications irrespective of whether someone's strengths are practical, academic or both, with standards guaranteed by our new, independent standards regulator, Ofqual.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend assure me that data will be collected on all children on the autistic spectrum by every local authority so that service delivery and strategic planning become much more effective?

Ed Balls: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. As she knows, the schools census collects data on children with statements and on school action plus and they show that as of January 2009 there were 51,200 pupils on the autistic spectrum. In addition, the Special Educational Needs (Information) Act 2008, which came into effect in January, is giving us more information about the characteristics of those pupils, their attainment and the progress that they make. We first published those statistics in October, they include children on the autistic spectrum and we will continue to ensure that we prioritise those children, as we showed in the Lamb review. I should say to my hon. Friend that the leadership that she has shown on these matters has been hugely important in raising opportunity and standards for children in our country who have a special educational need.

The fact is that 100,000 more children are now leaving primary school secure in English and 100,000 more are secure in maths compared with 1997. However, a world-class education system demands that no child's progress is allowed to stall or be held back. We know that many children, at certain points of their school life, benefit from short bursts of tailored, individual support alongside effective class teaching. Personal tuition must not just be the preserve of those who can afford it, so our pupil guarantee will entitle to catch-up support any child who falls behind in reading or writing or maths during primary school—in key stage 1 or in key stage 2—and any young person who starts secondary school behind expectations, with all looked-after children also automatically receiving one-to-one tuition so that they develop the basic skills they need. These guarantees of one-to-one catch-up support can be delivered only by the rising real-terms budgets for the schools system set out in the pre-Budget report.

Mr. Purchase: This is at the heart of the Bill; the most important reform that the Secretary of State is introducing is the possibility of one-to-one tuition, catch-up support and so on. What guarantees can he give us that middle-class parents will not "snaffle"—I use that term for want of a better word—all those resources because they have the loudest voices and the best understanding and will demand that tuition for their children, perhaps at the expense of children who have less articulate parents and who probably need that tuition even more?

Ed Balls: The guarantees are in the Bill; we will set out in law for the very first time such guarantees to pupils and to parents. Any child who is not making progress at key stage 1 will be entitled to extra support, and the school will have to write a letter to the parent setting out what it will do. Any child who is not making progress in key stage 2 will be guaranteed one-to-one tuition, and we will be offering 300,000 places for maths and for literacy from next April to deliver that one-to-one guarantee. Thirdly, any child who does the key stage 2 tests at the age of 11 and does not get to level 4 will automatically receive one-to-one tuition in year 7—in the first year of secondary school—and do a test at the end of that year. The results will not be made public, but they will be reported to parents, so that they know whether their child is catching up. Thus, this does not depend upon the parent asking for the support; the support is guaranteed to the child on the basis of the teacher's assessment. This is what has been available for children in private schools for many years. For the first time, because of our investment and our reform, we will guarantee the same individual attention and catch-up support to parents—of whatever class and of whatever income—in our state school system. The only test is whether a child has fallen behind and needs extra help—if they have, they will get it.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): The Secretary of State has just said that these are guarantees that can be relied upon and he also promised one-to-one tuition. Does he agree that what is being promised is not one-to-one tuition, because it is to be provided either one to one or in small groups?

Ed Balls: It partly depends on the judgment of the teachers. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would be willing to join me in wanting to back the professional judgment of teachers and head teachers. At key stage 2, for years 3, 4, 5 and 6, a child who is not making progress is guaranteed one-to-one tuition. At key stage 1, they are guaranteed extra support, which could mean one-to-one tuition, small-group tuition or moving at a different pace through key stage 1 —[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will let me make the point rather than shouting at me, I shall try to answer him.

At key stage 1, there will be one-to-one or small group tuition, or what the teacher decides, and in year 7, too, there will be one-to-one or small group tuition depending on what is needed. The test is whether the support means that the child makes progress and the cost is that it has to be paid for in order to be delivered. If we are willing to put the investment in, we can see all children make progress. If we are not willing to make the investment—we heard earlier that the Opposition will cut spending in 2010-11—some children will still make progress, but not all children will. That is the difference.

We will also be legislating in our Bill to introduce a new school report card that will specifically report on provision for pupils with special educational needs alongside attainment, satisfaction and discipline. We will extend the inspection remit of Ofsted to include provision for pupils with special educational needs and we will provide parents of children with special educational needs with a new right to appeal if their child's statement is not amended at annual review. Of those children who do not get to level 4 now—100,000 fewer than in 1997—two thirds have a special educational need, which is twice the level of the whole population. In my view, putting the needs of children with special needs at the centre of our education system is not peripheral but the only way to keep raising standards in our schools.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Echoing the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), there is a problem in many areas of the country, including Wolverhampton, as children with special educational needs wait months to get statemented. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is absolutely right to talk about such needs being central and about the inspection and so on, which will consider what is happening to those children who have been statemented. However, what is he doing to try to speed up the statementing process to begin with?

Ed Balls: Just before Christmas, Brian Lamb's review considered the detail of all those issues. To strengthen the inspection is very important, as is giving parents the right to appeal, but the fact is that there is great variability around the country. In some parts of the country, things are done in a speedy and timely way, but the needs of children and their parents are not always being put first. We need to shine the spotlight of scrutiny on to children with special educational needs and to ensure that they get the extra support that they need. We will train 4,000 more dyslexia-trained teachers in the coming year to ensure that the needs of a child with dyslexia are spotted early and that they get the extra help so that they can make progress. Those 4,000 extra dyslexia-trained teachers cannot be trained if the budget is to be cut in 2010-11, which is what the Opposition propose.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): The Secretary of State is aware of the battle that many parents have to go through to get their children statemented—a battle that middle-class articulate parents often succeed in. Does he agree that one of the biggest problems is that when people move around the country they have to commence that battle again? That is particularly a problem for those in the armed services who will be moved from Catterick to Cheltenham to Colchester to wherever else, which means that they are perpetually engaged in this fight.

Ed Balls: That is an important point. Children who move around the country are always potentially more vulnerable and that is why I think that the ContactPoint database will be very helpful in ensuring that those children do not fall through the cracks. For children in armed forces families who move a great deal, this is a particular issue. We have now opened the new Wellington academy in Wellington, which I hope will become a centre of excellence not just in that part of the south-west but across the country for meeting the needs of the children of armed forces personnel families—especially, in that case, non-commissioned officers' families and forces families. I hope that that will be one issue in which the academy will become expert. The hon. Gentleman's point is well taken and was highlighted by the Lamb review.

[Ed Balls]

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend come on to an issue on which many hon. Members have been lobbying? I am sure that he is well aware of the issues to do with education at home and allegations have been made that the Select Committee's report has not been taken seriously. Will he deal with those issues?

Ed Balls: I will deal with those issues in a moment. Before I do, let me address the issue of guarantees, which are clear and are laid out for pupils and parents. In the vast majority of cases, the guarantees, which we have published details about today, are a summary of provisions under the existing legislation. In a small number of cases—in relation to one-to-one tuition, a choice of sciences, strength in home-school agreements and the entitlement to online reporting to parents—the guarantees are new and are being set out in legislation. We would expect the vast majority of head teachers and teachers to be delivering the guarantees already. If issues arise, in the vast majority of cases they will be sorted out by schools, but in a small minority of cases, as a last resort, there will be a right of redress through the local government ombudsman. There will also be a right of redress for pupils in academies through the Young People's Learning Agency.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Ed Balls: I was going to discuss home education, but I am happy to give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Sheerman: Before the Secretary of State moves on from special educational needs, may I congratulate him on that part of the Bill? He will remember that the Select Committee's report on SEN led to the Lamb report, and we are pleased with all that is happening in that regard. Does he remember that it was the patchwork nature of delivery on SEN that was at the heart of the problem and the injustice that parents felt?

Ed Balls: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Select Committee's reports of the past two, three or four years on these matters have been very important. He will know that, as part of the Lamb work, we are considering whether arm's length statementing from local authorities will be a good idea. However, I must say that the Lamb review was more concerned about information flows to parents and the quality of advice than about independence, and we are now testing out that issue. I think that there is a broader point to make: children with SEN have tended to be on the periphery, and it has tended to be the parents who shouted the loudest who have received support. Many parents have felt deeply frustrated that they could not get support without banging on the door and making a great fuss. That is fundamentally unfair, because it is not right that those who shout the loudest should get the support, or that one should have to shout loud to get support. If the Lamb review is properly implemented and properly resourced, it could make a massive difference to children with SEN. I hope that the Select Committee will pay close attention to how we implement it, because its impetus to progress has been very important in this matter.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend consider accepting a new clause in the Bill to limit the defence of reasonable punishment, as it exists in section 58 of the Children Act 2004, to those with parental responsibility? It should not extend to teachers in madrassahs or in other religious schools. I mention that at this point because the children who are being ill-treated in such schools are often those with special needs.

Ed Balls: I hear my hon. Friend's point, and I know that she has expertise in this matter. We have dealt with some particular cases in the past year or two. The [illegible]nt point to make is that there is not one rule for a [illegible] in a madrassah and another for a child in a school or in any other circumstance. The use of physical punishment against any child is wrong; it is outside the law and is not fair to children. I do not think that we should tolerate any use of physical punishment in any school or learning setting in which trusted adults are supposed to be looking after children, not abusing them.

On home education, I know that this issue will be debated in detail in Committee. The vast majority of home educating parents provide a good education for their children, and I am fully committed to the principle that parents who choose to home educate should be able to do so. It is parents, rather than the state, who are in charge of taking the ultimate decision on how their children are educated. We think that about 70,000 children are being home educated—often for a variety of reasons and often to a very high standard by committed parents. Our responsibility is to ensure that not just a large majority, but all of the children who are being home educated are safe and are learning properly. It was because of concerns that had been raised that I asked Mr. Graham Badman to do his review, which reported in the summer. Following consultation, the Bill makes some changes to his recommendations, but accepts the general core principles of his review. The first is that, as a matter of principle, parents should be allowed to home educate. The second is that they need more support, financial and otherwise, to be able to do so. That may mean catch-up, one-to-one tuition for children who need it, or support regarding the cost of exam fees.

It is important that we make sure that we know that all children are safe and are being properly educated. That is why the Bill introduces a new registration scheme for home educators, with a duty on local authorities to identify all home-educated children and to ensure that they are receiving a suitable education. That is vital to make sure that all home-educated children are safe and are making progress. It is wrong to see that as an attack on home education, and those people who try to represent it as an attack on home education in principle are wrong. On that basis, I have to say that I agree with the vast majority of the recommendations and sentiments set out in the Children, Schools and Families Committee report on home education.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Should not help be offered, not forced on families? If the Secretary of State is so enthusiastic about the Select Committee's report, why not adopt a voluntary scheme? Why not increase support for families, without alienating and antagonising the entire home education community, among whom he will find precious few people who support the draconian proposals in the Bill?

Ed Balls: I do think that we should offer support, rather than impose it. In our response to the Badman report, we will offer extensive support to home-educating parents, which they can choose to take up.

Let me quote the Select Committee:

> "In our view it is unacceptable that local authorities do not know accurately how many children of school age in their area are in school, are being home educated or are otherwise not in school."

I completely agree with that, but it is not possible for local authorities to know that information unless they know where all the children are and whether they are being home educated. I also agree with the Select Committee when it says:

> "We believe that registration would encourage local authorities and home educators to recognise that it is to their mutual advantage to have a clear record of children who are being…educated."

The Select Committee also says:

> "the wider evidence that we received illustrated the potential value of the requirement for annual meetings between home educating families and local authority officers for the purpose of supporting home education provision. We believe that local authorities need a guaranteed means of engaging with these families."

It is vital that people in local authorities are properly trained. The Bill makes it clear that there is no right for a local authority to see the child of a home-educating family on their own, without the parents there. There is no such right in the Bill.

I say to the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), who is a member of the Select Committee, that it is not possible for local authorities to know where the children are, and that they are safe and learning, if they do not know how many there are, and which homes they are in. We cannot know that without a registration scheme.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Does the Secretary of State not understand that the hyper-mobility and hyper-diversity in many of our cities means that it is very difficult to have a register of the exact number of children at any one time? To go back to his previous point, he made it absolutely clear that home educators—he believes that there are 70,000 of them, but I think that there are actually rather more than that—provide education at home for a variety of reasons. Does he not see that the Badman report effectively takes a one-size-fits-all approach, which is directly opposed to the fact that there is a whole variety of different reasons why home educators keep their children at home and educate them there?

Ed Balls: I hear the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, but with respect, I do not agree at all. The Badman report sets out the range of reasons why children might be home educated. In some cases, that is because it is the philosophical view of the parents that they do not want their children to be educated in a school, in a class with other children. Often, children are home educated because of problems that have arisen due to a temporary lack of places, or for reasons to do with bullying or a special educational need, which means that things have broken down. There is a wide range of provision. We should not have a one-size-fits-all policy; I completely agree.

The only obligation in the Bill—it does not say what home-educated children are to learn, or set out detailed content—is to make sure that children are safe and are learning. That is what the Badman report recommends and what the Bill does. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the detail, and does not listen to the hyperbolic comments made by some Members present—that is opposed to the sensibleness of most of the views in the Select Committee report—he will see that the diversity of the home education community is being properly respected.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Is not the point that we have had a voluntary scheme for years and years? Anyone has been able to register and make themselves known to their local authority if they want to, but the majority have not. For those who argue for the importance of voluntary scheme, we have had one, but it has not worked. That is why we are in such a mess now: we have no idea about the quality of education of thousands of children.

Ed Balls: These would be interesting debates for the Committee, and it would be dangerous to allow the Select Committee to repeat its internal debates on the Floor of the House at this point. But the fact is that a voluntary registration system only takes us so far; it does not deliver the conclusion of the Select Committee's report: local authorities should know where those children are. In the vast majority of cases, home-educating parents will want to co-operate fully—this will be very light touch indeed—but in the small minority of cases where things go wrong, there is a balance to be struck between the rights of the parent and the rights of the child, and we must ensure as a society that children are safe and are learning. We should not have one rule for children in schools, where we have a duty to ensure that they are safe and are learning, and another rule for children who are home-educated, which is that if their parents do not want to tell, no one is obliged to find out; that would not be the right approach.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Would not some of the problems with non-registration be helped by the rolling out of ContactPoint across the country in September? When the Secretary of State talks about registration, he also talks about the safety of the child. Would he like to define the difference? If such registration happens, should it not be about the education of the child? Is that not where the real problem lies? People fear local authority bureaucrats, many of whom they would not want to look after their children, coming into their homes and telling them what to do about something they know nothing about.

Ed Balls: I understand my hon. Friend's point. It is really important to get that right in training and guidance. A local authority currently, before the Bill becomes an Act, has a right in law to see a child if it fears that there is a child well-being, safety or child protection issue. That right already exists, including for home-educated children. The issue is whether they are being educated and whether they are learning. There is no right in the Bill for a local authority to go in, demand a visit and see children on their own. The vast majority of parents would be happy to let that happen, but if they choose not to do so, that is a choice for them. The local authority then has an obligation to ensure that those children are safe and are learning, and consequences will then follow from that. But the right to go in and demand a meeting will not exist for education purposes under the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman rose—

Ed Balls: I will give way to my hon. Friend, with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He has made one intervention already, but he is the Chairman of the Select Committee and his Committee's views have been extensively debated.

Mr. Sheerman: I am grateful for all the publicity of the Select Committee's report. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one problem that the Select Committee found when we discussed this in great depth—it will be discussed seriously again in Committee—is that the Government propose a compulsory register with no penalties? We thought, "Why not try it for two years on a voluntary basis? If that does not work, we move to a system even with penalties."

Ed Balls: I understand my hon. Friend's point, although adding penalties would further inflame the minority of home educators who do not like the current provisions in the Bill. I do not want to air further the debates about voluntary or compulsory systems; we should discuss them in Committee.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children said in its briefing for today's debate:

> "We support the recommendations in Clause 26 and Schedule 1 of the Bill to establish a registration scheme for children who are educated at home in England. However, it is important that workers who undertake home visits receive specialist training to identify possible signs of child abuse or neglect."

The NSPCC is right: we need specialist training, but it is right to have a registration scheme. With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will move on and we can debate those things further in Committee.

The basis of a world-class education system is also a world-class work force. We now have more than 40,000 more teachers than in 1997, supported by more than 180,000 more teaching assistants. The Bill builds on our commitment to a masters-level profession by introducing a new licence to practise similar to other high-status professionals, such as doctors and lawyers.

We also want to ensure that head teachers and teachers have the powers and the support that they need to tackle bad behaviour.

That is why the Bill will also strengthen home-school agreements, so that pupils, parents and schools all fulfil their responsibilities.

It is important—this will be extensively discussed in Committee—that the Bill continues the process of improving confidence in family courts by opening up proceedings in a careful and staged way, with a clear sunset clause and review before we potentially move to any further opening up beyond the first stage provisions in the Bill, while ensuring that vulnerable children are safeguarded.

Mr. Edward Timpson (Crewe and Nantwich) (Con): The Secretary of State spoke earlier about the NSPCC's support for his plans for home education. Does he accept that the NSPCC has reservations about his plans for opening up the family courts, and that he ought to listen to it on that point as well?

Ed Balls: Again, it is not possible for us all to agree at all times with every stakeholder who has a view on these matters. The NSPCC, the National Children's Bureau and others have concerns about opening up the family courts and have made those concerns clear. On the other hand, many people think opening up the family courts is important for our democracy and for the stability and fairness of the courts' proceedings. We are trying to strike a balance. That is why we will not move further without a clear sunset clause and review provisions.

I hope the issues will be extensively debated in Committee. These are Ministry of Justice clauses and it is the expert in these matters, although we have discussed them in detail because we have a joint responsibility for family policy. We are taking matters forward in a steady and sequenced way, mindful at all times not to put children, particularly vulnerable children, in positions where their welfare might be undermined. I think we are getting the balance right, but it is a topic that we will discuss in Committee. Given the hon. Gentleman's knowledge on these matters and commitment to child welfare, perhaps he will be on the Committee and be able to participate in those debates.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD) rose—

Ed Balls: I will give way one more time.

John Hemming: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way on this point about accountability and transparency in the family courts. I congratulate the Government on upsetting those on both sides of the debate—the Newspaper Society, by trying to gag people, and the NSPCC with their other proposals. Will the right hon. Gentleman review the detailed proposals in the light of all the representations being made? It is clear that there is little support for the details of the Government's proposals.

Ed Balls: Upsetting those on both sides of an argument is often the best way to get to the right outcome. I hear the hon. Gentleman's point. This is a Second Reading debate. The purpose of the Committee is to allow such scrutiny of the provisions, and I am sure the scrutiny will be robust and thorough, as always. Hopefully, it will not involve an all-night sitting this time, as on our Bill in the previous Session, and we will be able to move forward consensually.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ed Balls: No, I will not.

A world-class education system is only now within our grasp because of the progress that we have made in school improvement. In 1997, more than half of our schools—over 1,600—were not getting to the basic benchmark of 30 per cent. of pupils achieving five good GCSEs, including English and maths. That has come down not just to one in two schools, but to one in 12 schools—from 1,600 schools to just 270. Because of the work that we are doing with schools and local authorities around the country, in our national challenge and academies programme, our aim is to get that number down to zero by 2011.

The Bill takes further steps that will help us to back school leadership and school improvement, by making the process of establishing an academy easier, by reducing bureaucracy so that, like colleges, universities and voluntary aided schools, all academies are guaranteed charitable status, and by strengthening collaboration between schools by updating the role of school improvement partners and through new accredited education providers, which will include academies, state schools, universities and FE colleges as well. We are consulting on those provisions.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. I am not opposed to any school having charitable status, whether it be independent, state, academy or whatever—the recent debate about public benefit and charities has been helpful in that respect—but why is he bringing back the status of exempt charities for academies, especially as the Charities Act 2006 effectively brought that status to an end?

Ed Balls: The reason why is that we now have a large number of academies, with the figure heading towards 400, and the separate and independent regulation of each academy would be bureaucratic for academy sponsors, for accredited schools groups and for the school system. Some 7,000 voluntary aided faith schools are exempt from the 2006 Act, and so are many further education providers and universities. It is clear to me that a school, funded by the taxpayer to provide free education to pupils, is charitable in its purposes, and such institutions will be regulated by the Young People's Learning Agency—something that the Minister with responsibility for the third sector, my right hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), is proposing if the Bill is enacted.

I know that there are concerns within the Charity Commission about the measure's wider ramifications, but, seen as an education policy, this legislation represents a sensible piece of deregulation and a reduction in bureaucracy. It will make the system much simpler and more streamlined, without every school having to go through a separate check when the issue is absolutely clear.

In law, it is also clear that the academy sponsor has to be charitable in its standing. So, the academy sponsor will have to be charitable, and the purpose will have to be free education for children. Such institutions are clearly charities, and it is much more sensible to undertake the process in a streamlined, class-based way, as we do with foundation schools, rather than school by school. The school-by-school approach was fine when we had 20 or 30 academies, but—the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) will not like this—given the pace at which I have accelerated the academies programme, the Bill represents an important but sensible piece of deregulation.

Mr. Purchase: On the point about the ability to run chains of schools, which the Secretary of State has been promoting, I must note that one such chain has been debarred from taking on any more schools. Does he therefore accept that there ought at least to be a default position whereby local authorities can take over an entire chain and re-establish a proper educational approach to such schools? Does he not think that, even at this point, it would be wise to give local authorities the same freedom as universities and other colleges to run an education policy for the schools in their district?

Ed Balls: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but I do not fully agree, because the 2006 Act, which I support and am implementing, was a good piece of legislation that split the commissioning role of the local authority from the providing role of schools. More than 50 universities now sponsor academies, and through our academies, through the accreditation of our best schools and through our universities, we are trying to establish in the state school system good providers who can take on wider responsibilities. The local authority's responsibility is to ensure that when there is a problem, it brings in outside support to make such action happen.

We do two different things in the Bill: first, we give local authorities the duty to survey parents' views on local schools to see whether there is dissatisfaction and, if there is, to take action; and, secondly, we give local authorities a duty to act if they are concerned about a school, by issuing a warning notice to a school, with the Secretary of State having the power to direct a local authority to consider that point if it does not take its responsibilities seriously.

Mr. Chaytor: Before the Secretary of State leaves parental satisfaction surveys, I must note that the Bill describes how their results will have to demonstrate "material parental dissatisfaction". Will he give us an example of that? What threshold will have to be passed before a local authority is required to produce a survey response plan ?

Ed Balls: We should discuss in Committee and subsequently the details of how we operate the measure. An example might be too much homogeneity in a local area, or too much diversity and an insufficient number of good local schools. The important thing is to ensure that local authorities listen to the views of parents and see what is being done to raise standards. That is what most local authorities do already, and it is a way of ensuring that we are clearly aware of what is going on with children and their learning.

Rob Marris: In response to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), the Secretary of State said, in terms, that it did not make sense to have academies applying school by school, and therefore there would be an exemption on the public benefit for charitable status. Why, therefore, is it the Government's position to have academies negotiating, school by school, terms and conditions for their staff rather than going on national agreements? If we want a national system for charitable status, which I understand, why do we not have a national system for pay and conditions in academies?

Ed Balls: That is because some academies are innovating in the way that they organise the school term and the school day, and how they provide their provision. All the information that I have shows that academies are more than delivering on the national agreement on terms and conditions of staff. I have said regularly that if there were clear evidence that they were not doing so, I would be willing to look at it, but so far none has been provided to me. Those flexibilities on the curriculum and on terms and conditions have been an important part of the success of the academies movement, and there is widespread support for them.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ed Balls: Once more.

Mr. Sheerman: It is an important point; the Secretary of State will know that Back Benchers can intervene as many times as they like if he is gracious enough to give way. A very important part of the Bill deals with the licence to practise as a teacher. Having listened intently to his speech, I do not think that he covered that in any detail. Was that on purpose, or has he missed it by mistake?

Ed Balls: I said a moment ago that we would legislate for a licence to practise that would give teachers the same professional standing that there is for doctors and lawyers. We are discussing with teachers and head teachers the details of how that will operate, and the Bill provides a framework power to introduce it. It is essential to ensure not only that we match professional development and support for teachers with a light-touch way of operating it for the vast majority, but that we are clear that where there is underperformance there is an obligation on the school to ensure that bad teaching is addressed. We are starting to introduce the licence to practise in September with newly qualified teachers and returning teachers who have been out of the profession for some time. Our aim, over time, is for it to apply to all qualified teachers. Some people have expressed concerns—on one side of the argument, that it will be too heavy-handed and therefore make life difficult for teachers, and on the other that it will be too light touch and will not ensure that there is sufficient action in the small minority of cases where teaching is substandard. We need to get the balance right. We will have to discuss that in detail, and the views of the Children, Schools and Families Committee would be very welcome.

There is an alternative vision, some of which we heard about earlier in the regular interventions by the shadow schools spokesman, and which stretches across several different areas of the Bill. On catch-up support, there is a refusal to match our guarantees to primary school and year 7 pupils. On qualifications and the curriculum, there is a commitment to scrapping the national curriculum. On teachers and head teachers, there is a promise to end key stage 2 tests and to break promises on pay and conditions. On school improvements, there is a policy of removing the role of local authorities and expecting parents to have the time and know-how to set up their own schools or to get private sector firms to come in to run schools and make profits while allowing other schools to wither or decline, and watching as some young people are relegated to a second-class education.

There is also—we have not heard it yet, but I am sure that we will in the speech by the hon. Member for Surrey Heath—a continuing scepticism about whether the rise in standards that we have seen over the past 10 years is real or is due to the dumbing down of our exams. I say regularly in this House that the introduction of Ofqual, our independent standards regulator, is a very important protection against dumbing down and easier exams, but time after time those claims are refuted—although, as we saw in the Queen's Speech debate on the subject, when I asked the hon. Gentleman a few exam questions on maths and science, he turned out not to know the answers. That is partly because the questions were quite hard. The question is, though, has he done any revision? Should we allow him to do a retake? Very briefly, I have two quick exam questions for him. First, two whole numbers are each between 50 and 70. They multiply—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State has been speaking for nearly an hour. I appreciate that he has taken a number of interventions, and this is a debate after all, but I am not sure that what he is now asking is very relevant to the Bill before us.

Ed Balls: It is relevant to the debate about whether standards are rising or falling, but I am happy to return to the matter at another time. I have been waiting for the hon. Gentleman to call an Opposition day debate on education for the past two years, and since the first three months, when we had two, we have not had a single one. It is frustrating that I almost never get a chance to ask him any of these questions in the House.

I conclude by considering statements that have been made about education visions in recent years. There is a debate about whether we should drive school standards up and tackle underperforming schools by stepping in with extra support and extra powers in the national challenge programme, as we are, or whether we should stand back and have what is called the Swedish model. That allows a more market-based approach, and the Opposition advocate it. It is important that we debate those different approaches in considering the Bill.

We were told two years ago that, according to the shadow Secretary of State:

> "If we had Swedish-style reforms there is every reason to believe that we would have up to 3,000 new schools".

Two weeks later he went further, saying that up to 5,000 new private schools would be funded by the taxpayer under his plans. However, last June The Sunday Times reported that senior Opposition figures thought the policy was unworkable and that the shadow Secretary of State's claim of 3,000 new schools was "totally unrealistic". In fact, in the—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the Secretary of State can reassure the House about where the building of schools appears in the Bill.

Ed Balls: The point is that there are two different approaches to driving school improvement. We can do it either through the mechanisms and powers set out in the Bill or through a free market free-for-all, abolishing powers and, as we heard in the Queen's Speech debate, bringing in companies that are encouraged to be profit-making and drive the system in a different direction.

Lindsay Roy (Glenrothes) (Lab): I assume that the Secretary of State is also interested in profit-making in schools, but profit-making in terms of the "so what" factor—the added value, dividends and benefits that come to youngsters through their experience, and the added professional development of teachers.

Ed Balls: My hon. Friend is completely right. That is the difference. Do we have a market-based mechanism, with some schools withering on the vine while others expand, or do we drive school improvement by the measures in the Bill? It contains clear guarantees to parents and pupils, a decent licence to practise so that professional standards are maintained, and more power and independence for head teachers to drive up standards in their schools, backed by the active support of parents in home-school agreements. That is what we have set out in the Bill.

It will not be possible to deliver the guarantees and reforms in the Bill unless the money is available to pay for them. I made it clear in response to interventions at the beginning of my speech that with me, school spending would rise this year, next year and the year after, but that with the Opposition, it would be cut next year, the year after and the year after that. As the shadow Chancellor has made clear, their priority is not school spending or one-to-one catch-up support but an inheritance tax cut for 3,000 of the richest millionaires. That is the choice. Our vision in the Bill is a world-class education system with excellence and opportunity for all, not just some. That is the choice, and that is what the Bill guarantees, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Liberal Democrats.

5.19 pm

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): May I first associate myself with the comments of the Secretary of State about the former Member for North-West Leicestershire? We all miss him from his accustomed place on the back row of the Government green Benches. He was a good, kind and generous man, a fantastic constituency Member of Parliament, a grammar school boy, who never lost the love of learning—I benefited personally from his wise advice throughout my time in the House. He will be sorely missed and I should like, on behalf of Conservative Members, to associate myself with every word that the Secretary of State said. We would like to send our best wishes to his widow and his four lovely daughters.

May I also associate myself with the Secretary of State's comments about the success of so many providers of information technology in showcasing their wares in our schools and, more broadly, in education in England, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales? I am delighted that so many Ministers and individuals from abroad have come to admire what is happening, not only in ICT but more broadly in educational innovation.

I am sorry that we did not have an opportunity to see the Secretary of State play Magnus Magnusson again and demonstrate what a mastermind he is. What a pity it is that other members of the Cabinet are not here to play the quiz that they most enjoy with the Secretary of State and have the opportunity to say, "You are the weakest link."

After the events of last week, may I say what a pleasure it is for all Conservative Members to see the Secretary of State still in his place? We are all delighted that he has enjoyed a high profile in recent days and look forward to his playing an even more prominent role in the campaign ahead—or should that be campaigns? As well as wanting him to play as big a role as possible in the general election campaign, I greatly hope that he will play as big a role as possible in any leadership campaigns that follow it. We assure him of our enthusiastic support.

I suspect that the Bill, whether it is passed or not, will end up being the Secretary of State's monument. Balfour's monument was the Education Act 1902, which established a universal system of local education provision. Rab Butler's monument was the Education Act 1944, which established universal free secondary provision. Lord Baker of Dorking's monument was the Education Reform Act 1988, which gave effect to the principles of parental choice, transparent assessment, diversity in the state system and greater freedom for individual schools. As the Secretary of State's monument, the Bill seeks to establish in law one of his highest priorities—a goal that he pursues with restless zeal; indeed, it is his motivation for being in public office: drawing dividing lines.

Even before he was in the Cabinet, when he was a Back Bencher, doubtless leading the fight against any attempt on the Back Benches to organise against the incumbent leader, he told the New Statesman that he wanted to "get back" to dividing lines on education with the Conservatives. That was his highest priority—not helping the poorest, raising standard or supporting professionals, but drawing a dividing line. I do not feel personally affronted by that. The Secretary of State cannot meet anyone outside his immediate family without wanting to draw dividing lines between them. Perhaps he is right and the rest of us—all of us—are wrong. Perhaps he is the Galileo of education policy—uniquely and brilliantly insightful while all around him is mediaeval darkness and error. However, on the Bill, I am happy to be on the other side of the argument. The debate at the heart of the measure is, as the right hon. Gentleman says, about how one drives up standards in schools.

Liz Blackman: It would be helpful to me and others if the hon. Gentleman got on with his argument and started mentioning children.

Michael Gove: My first comments paid tribute to a Member of the House, now departed, who devoted his life to the cause of education. I want to draw a clear picture of the philosophical divide, which governs how children will be educated, between the Secretary of State and Conservative Members.

What is the answer when we consider how to improve education? Is it more and more central prescription, regulation, bureaucracy, avenues for litigation, compliance costs, supervisory audits, paperwork and time spent out of the classroom on administration? That is the Government's way under this Secretary of State. However, perhaps the answer is that it is better to trust professionals more, to support more diversity and greater pluralism, and to give parents more choice and schools more freedom—in short, to move in the direction that was set out in Tony Blair's education White Paper of 2005 rather than the White Paper of 2009.

[Michael Gove]

Hilary Armstrong (North-West Durham) (Lab) rose—

Michael Gove: Which of those approaches the right hon. Lady supports will be of great interest to me.

Hilary Armstrong: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will come back to what will drive up standards in education, which is improving, beyond what we had ever thought possible, the quality of teaching. Will he commit to seeking to ensure, through other measures in the Bill and some that he has suggested, that we attract people from the top 10 per cent. of graduates in this country to the teaching profession?

Michael Gove: I could not agree more with the right hon. Lady—I have often agreed with her arguments and she makes an impeccable argument now. One point that I have consistently made in four of my five most recent speeches is the pressing need to attract and retain more highly talented people in education. I believe that many of the provisions in the Bill, because they bureaucratise the profession rather than trust professionals, will leave many highly gifted and talented people saying, "I do not want to go into a profession where the Secretary of State tells me, to the most minute detail, how I should perform this task, because that robs me of the professional autonomy that I have a right to expect as someone who enjoys the top level of training," to which the right hon. Lady alluded.

I completely agree with the right hon. Lady. The reports produced by McKinsey and others demonstrate that the single most important thing we could do to improve the quality of education is improve teaching quality. The organisations that are most devoted to improving teacher quality, such as Teach First, Teaching Leaders, and Future Leaders, are opposed to the bureaucratisation of our education system under the approach of the current Secretary of State.

Hilary Armstrong rose—

Michael Gove: I sense that the right hon. Lady is straining at the bit, so I am happy to allow her to come in.

Hilary Armstrong: Those organisations are not opposed to things such as licensing, because we have to know that teachers in front of classes are actually doing what they should be doing. The reality is that simply saying, "We're not going to have any concern over what is done locally," which is what the hon. Gentleman is doing, would leave teaching to whoever wants to do it and take the quality out. We have to improve the quality, not reduce it.

Michael Gove: The right hon. Lady is presumably unaware of the fact that the Conservatives have consistently argued that we should raise the bar on entry to the teaching profession, and that we should restrict taxpayer funding of postgraduate certificates in education to those who have at least a lower second-class degree, unlike at the moment, when those who have a third can move into teaching. We have also explicitly said that people should not be teaching in primary schools if they have anything less than a grade B pass at GCSE maths and English. Both measures would raise the bar on entry to the teaching profession and ensure that those teaching in our schools are better qualified than they are at the moment.

Teachers in our schools now are better qualified than teachers in the past, and I take this opportunity to underline, and pay tribute to, the quality of the teaching profession.

Mr. Chaytor: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Michael Gove: I think the hon. Gentleman is being a little bit previous and premature—I am not actually the Secretary of State—but I am delighted to give way.

Mr. Chaytor: I am very grateful to the shadow Secretary of State for giving way. If he believes in professional autonomy, why does it remain his policy to tell teachers exactly which method they should use to teach children to read?

Michael Gove: My approach is that there should be no hiding place for schools that fail to teach children to read properly. We all know that evidence points to the success of systematic synthetic phonics, and teachers who wish to follow that method will be supported—I hope—by those on both sides of the House. However, if teachers wish to follow other routes, they should have the freedom to do so—they do so in Steiner and Montessori schools with some measure of success—but the crucial thing is that we would introduce a test to ensure that every child who can is reading by an appropriate age.

Lindsay Roy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Michael Gove: I will not at the moment.

The one consistent complaint I hear when I talk to teachers, heads, governors, academy sponsors, parents, local authorities, and indeed anyone involved in education—it is voiced most loudly by the most successful—is this: "We face too much bureaucracy." Therefore, I approach any attempt to pile additional bureaucracy on the educational system with scepticism. Why? I do so because we know that systems work well when they are built on trust. That is the principle for Cabinet government and the principle for success in any school, and it is also the principle that should animate our entire education system. We know that trust depends on respecting autonomy. We recognise that education depends crucially on great teachers and superb school leaders. We want a culture in education where the craft of teaching is respected and the professional status of heads and teachers is enhanced at every stage. That is why we oppose many of the provisions in the Bill.

I know that the Secretary of State will say that, in opposing the Bill, we are opposing any help of any kind for pupils falling behind, and that we are against all cultural and sporting activity—indeed, that we are for deep and invincible ignorance, while he is for a new age of enlightenment and goodness. It does not matter much what we say or do, because the Secretary of State has his script written anyway.

The Secretary of State has argued that we are in favour of closing Sure Start centres, when we want more people to go to more of them. He has argued that we would abolish key stage 2 tests, when we want more rigour and greater transparency. He has argued that we are against people staying on in education, when it is our goal to raise participation beyond the current level. I am sure that between now and the election we will hear more of the same from the Secretary of State, with his characteristic machismo. However, given the transparently political nature of the Bill, you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I decline to play the political game, and instead insist on scrutinising what lies before us and say that I am afraid that it does not pass muster.

Lindsay Roy: In what ways does the licence to practise inhibit empowerment and autonomy among staff? Surely it encourages professionals to develop their skills to the full.

Michael Gove: The hon. Gentleman will already be aware, as a distinguished head teacher who did a brilliant job, that new performance management guidelines were introduced before any discussion of the licence to teach. Those guidelines are relatively recent and have met with the approval of all the professional teacher associations, most conspicuously the Association of School and College Leaders, the trade union that speaks for head teachers such as him. The ASCL has pointed out that there is absolutely no need to inaugurate a licence to teach in order to usher in better continuous professional development. Indeed, the National Union of Teachers, the union that represents the greatest number of teachers in our schools, has argued that the continuous professional development of its members is not helped in any way by the licence to teach. Having listened to the professionals on that, I recognise that the hon. Gentleman has a conflict of loyalty, as both a head teacher and a loyal Back Bencher. However, if he is prepared to listen to fellow professionals, rather than to his colleagues who are temporarily in the Whips Office, he will see that none of them has any faith in the licence to teach as a means of improving standards.

Lindsay Roy rose—

Michael Gove: Have another go.

Lindsay Roy: With due respect, the hon. Gentleman indicated earlier that the licence to practise inhibited autonomy.

Michael Gove: I merely pointed out that the licence to practise seems to add no benefit. Indeed, the body that will be responsible for policing it if the Bill passes into law, the General Teaching Council, has pointed out exactly the same.

Mr. Mark Field: I was interested to hear the most recent exchange, but perhaps my hon. Friend could tell me precisely how many Glenrothes constituents the hon. Member for Glenrothes (Lindsay Roy) represents on educational matters.

Michael Gove: I think that that was an intervention on me, but I recognise my hon. Friend's point. The hon. Member for Glenrothes (Lindsay Roy) is a Member of the United Kingdom Parliament and he has a perfect right to question me, but my hon. Friend makes a valid point. As the provisions relate specifically to England, and in some respects also to Wales, it is appropriate that we should restrict our comments to those areas. I myself am a proud Scot, but I represent English constituents in this United Kingdom Parliament.

Tom Levitt: I should tell the hon. Gentleman that teaching today is an awful lot better than it was when I was a teacher—and not only a teacher, but an officer in the NUT, when our policy was: "The answer's no. Now what's the question?" We opposed the national curriculum and many of the things that his party introduced during the 1990s. So is the NUT right on everything?

Michael Gove: I applaud the hon. Gentleman's contribution to improving our children's education by retiring as a teacher, leaving the profession and coming into this House. I hope that we will have an opportunity at the next election to allow him to spend more time devoting himself to improving education by whatever means he considers appropriate. [Hon. Members: "He is standing down anyway."] I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's many years of distinguished public service and look forward to collaborating with him in whatever role he takes on, in what I hope will be a long and happy retirement.

I want to look at the provisions in the Bill as they affect schools and education, and explain our concerns. I want first to look at the pupil and parent guarantees. The Government want to make it a legal obligation on schools to deliver a range of outcomes, which are spelt out in quite prescriptive detail in the schools White Paper and subsequently revised today. They range from a guarantee of small group tuition for those who have not reached the accepted stage of literacy or numeracy in year 7—the first year of secondary school—to a guarantee of access to high-quality cultural activities for all pupils, with an aspiration, not a guarantee, that that should reach five hours a week for all.

Almost everything suggested in the guarantees is desirable, and, in many cases, good schools are already delivering beyond what is to be demanded, as the Secretary of State acknowledged. However, some of the schools that are doing the most to drive up standards, especially for those in need, have been able to do so by reducing the degree of central prescription and bureaucracy to which they have to pay heed, as the Secretary of State also acknowledged later in his speech. Those schools have not raised standards through submitting to tighter and tighter regulation; quite the opposite.

I am referring, of course, to academy schools. When they were established, they were set free from local bureaucratic control, and from the national curriculum, specifically so that they could attend to the needs of the poorest. That is why we backed them so strongly, and why we are now in the vanguard of the movement calling for an extension of the principles behind their success. The former Minister for Schools and Learners, the right hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), has argued that academies need to respond innovatively to the huge challenges that they face. He argued that they needed to be outside greater bureaucratic control, because they needed increased flexibility to meet their specific challenges. It is by operating outside bureaucratic control that they have raised standards more quickly than other schools—

[Michael Gove]

Mr. Purchase indicated dissent.

Michael Gove: The hon. Gentleman will probably be grateful to know that academies have been raising their level of attainment at GCSE at twice the rate of other state schools. Some of the best academies in chains such as the Harris group and ARK have been raising attainment at an even greater rate. In that respect, I am delighted to support Government policy, but I look forward to hearing him attack it.

Mr. Purchase: Of course we can use statistics in this way, but the truth is that those academies that have improved at a faster rate have been matched by the other secondary schools in their boroughs. That shows that there is nothing particularly special about academies.

Michael Gove: That is not entirely true.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman feel that the removal of academies from the democratic process is a step forward or a step back? How is it that parents have less say in the running of academies than in the running of state schools?

Michael Gove: I reject that view; I think that those parents have more say. They can vote with their feet, as the Secretary of State pointed out in his Cass lecture last year. Parents have more control over their children's education, and they have more choice, enabling their children to attend a school that more accurately reflects their needs, as a result of academies increasing the diversity of their provision.

Many of these academies—including Mossbourne community academy and Burlington Danes—are able to help students who are falling behind, precisely because they are free to depart from the national curriculum. Both of those schools arrange intensive catch-up work—of the kind that the Secretary of State lauds—throughout year 7, but the only reason that they have been able to do so is that their heads and teachers have pioneered that approach outside the demands that had been placed on them centrally.

Given that professionals have pioneered those innovations, why does the Secretary of State believe that more bureaucracy is always the answer? Is it really right to prescribe everything in such minute, and sometimes conflicting, detail from the centre? Why is it right, as the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) also asked, to insist on one-to-one tuition at key stage 2, for those who are falling behind at primary level, but to accept that small group tuition is sufficient for those in the first year of key stage 3 who are still falling behind at secondary school? Why should not those pupils have an entitlement to one-to-one tuition as well? When the Secretary of State was asked about this earlier, he said that it was a matter of professional judgment. Why is it his judgment that professionals should have that discretion when pupils are falling behind in year 7 but not when they are doing so in years 4, 5 or 6? There might well be an answer to that question—

Mr. Laws: Let's hear it!

Michael Gove: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. So far, however, answers come there none.

Mr. Purchase: I really wanted to talk about academies, but if we ask that question, we find a great body of education theory and practice that shows that, at an older age, children respond better one to one and that, at a younger age, they often respond better in small groups. That is the theory behind what the Secretary of State is saying.

Michael Gove: If the hon. Gentleman is right, that is the exact opposite of what the Government are proposing. They are proposing one-to-one tuition for younger pupils between the ages of 7 and 11, and small group tuition for the older ones at 12 and 13. Now I would be very interested to hear any case that the Secretary of State or the Minister for Schools and Learners might make in Committee, but no case has been made to explain that distinction.

There is also a guarantee of five hours of high-quality PE and sport, but the guarantee on cultural activity contains only an "aspiration" that there should be five hours of it. Once again, why that distinction? Why guarantee five hours of sport, but have only an aspiration for five hours of cultural activity?

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman is being too generous. The guarantee on sport is only for "access" to five hours, not a proper guarantee of five hours.

Michael Gove: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing out how loosely framed this guarantee is. Perhaps it was supposed to be iron-cast or cast iron, but it does not seem to be particularly robust.

There is also a guarantee in the White Paper on out-of-school activities. Schools are supposed to guarantee a list of activities, which > "may include study support, play/recreation, sport, music clubs, arts and crafts and other special interest clubs, and business and enterprise activities".

Which of those activities in that list have to be offered for the guarantee to be delivered—all or just a proportion of them? What proportion? Is the list exclusive? Are there other after-school activities that, if offered, would count towards the guarantee? Would the scouts count or the boys brigade? I mention them because they are not special-interest but generalist clubs.

The reason I ask about prescription in such detail is that the Secretary of State decided to prescribe in such detail. These are not just vague aspirations that it would be good to have; they are not just expectations that he is laying down as a political hope that he will fund; they are not even matters inspectable by Ofsted, which might lead a school into special measures if they are not provided. They are legal guarantees—far stronger than any of the other obligations placed on schools. If a school breaks this guarantee, it will presumably be breaking the law.

We need precision, which is wholly absent from anything the Secretary of State has provided, in order to ensure that head teachers and people who work in schools and local authorities do not live in fear of litigation. If schools do not provide all these services, they can be taken to the local government ombudsman and if things are not resolved satisfactorily, they could end up in court. Is it really the best use of a head teacher's time to seek to ensure that every single one of these guarantees is met in the prescribed way that the Secretary of State lists, absolutely to the letter—or potentially end up in court? That cannot be right.

In many ways, I could not admire some of these guarantees more—the aspiration to ensure that every child who can studies triple science, for example—but should heads be in the dock if the school they run cannot supply the necessary tuition because the funds have not been supplied either by the local authority or the Secretary of State? Should they be held responsible for that failure? Schools already face a formidable bureaucratic burden under the current system of Ofsted inspection—a system that we would make more light touch. Failure can be fatal to the careers of heads, but now we risk piling on another level of responsibility backed up by legal sanctions. I do not believe that that is fair. I am all in favour of sharper challenge, greater transparency and better accountability, but I am not in favour of putting the fear of even more litigation into the hearts of our teachers.

Bob Russell: May I take the hon. Gentleman back to transparency and academies? Will he look at a series of parliamentary questions I put about the Academies Enterprise Trust, which strikes me as being a business? Does he agree that an organisation that is trying to pluck up all the schools in Essex, Twickenham, the Isle of Wight and Suffolk, for example, is a business rather than an educational institution, particularly when it is run from an office on an industrial estate next to Hockley railway station?

Michael Gove: I know the hon. Gentleman is an indefatigable campaigner when it comes to schooling in Essex, but I also know that the Academies Enterprise Trust is responsible for the Greensward school in Essex, which is an outstanding school in every respect. I look forward to further debates with him in Committee about the ramifications of the legislation and its effect on the Academies Enterprise Trust. All I would say now is that I know that the people responsible for Greensward have done a fantastic job, and I suspect that they might well do a fantastic job elsewhere.

The heart of our division or the essence of our dividing line is that I do not know of a problem in education to which the answer is ever more lawyers. I am not aware of a single child who has been taught to read better, or to love learning, by the local government ombudsman. Teachers make the difference, and they deserve better than the approach in this Bill.

Ed Balls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Michael Gove: Delighted.

Ed Balls: I think we established during my speech that we want these to be guarantees for all pupils and all parents, not just for some pupils in some schools. I can guarantee funding next year to pay for them, and the hon. Gentleman cannot.

Let me ask the hon. Gentleman a specific question. We will make a guarantee on one-to-one tuition at key stage 2, and next September, we will guarantee every school leaver a school, college or apprenticeship place. Will the hon. Gentleman match those guarantees? That is the nub of the issue. Can he guarantee that the provision will be for all, or will it be just for the few?

Michael Gove: I look forward to hearing the right hon. Gentleman spell out the source of the funding of those guarantees in more detail than he has hitherto. We still do not know how much he has secured as a result of the polite and temperate negotiations in which he indulged during the prelude to the pre-Budget report. We do not know the exact global sum for the schools budget, and we do not know what precise part of it will increase. I should be delighted if he would be kind enough to let me know those figures. Perhaps we could have a private meeting to discuss the issue.

Ed Balls: The hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying that he wanted to get down to the truth of the issue. Now, once again, we have been confronted by scripted evasion. I am being absolutely clear: we will guarantee a school, college or apprenticeship place for every 16-year-old this September. The hon. Gentleman has a chance to say—in this House, in public—and confirm that he would guarantee the necessary funds. I have guaranteed them: will he match that guarantee?

Michael Gove: The right hon. Gentleman has not guaranteed anything of the kind. During the debate on the Loyal Address, we discovered that the places of some 50,000 of those who were currently in sixth forms or training places had not been funded by the right hon. Gentleman. We discovered that in order to fund their places in a number of colleges, he was insisting on reducing the per-student cost. He claimed that there would be economies of scale. Which is it to be—extra spending or economies of scale at college level?

I should be really interested if the right hon. Gentleman would spell out exactly what he means by schools funding, and how it has increased. In a number of recent interviews, he has referred to overall increases in education funding. When I asked him a couple of questions earlier, he revealed, I think for the first time, that funding for the Training and Development Agency for Schools and the National College for Leadership of Schools and Children's Services would now be cut, which meant that education funding overall would be cut. Perhaps he would like to reassure the people who run those organisations that their funding will not be cut.

Again, I should be interested to know the precise cash sum that will go to schools—exactly how much it is, in terms of billions and millions—by how much it will increase, and which specific budget lines will increase as a result.

Ed Balls rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Secretary of State attempts to intervene again, I remind the House, and the Front Benches in particular, that this is not a general debate on education or even the financing of education. It is a debate specifically about the Second Reading of the Bill that is before us, and the clock is still ticking.

Michael Gove: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—and I am happy to give way to the Secretary of State.

Ed Balls: This will be my last intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

To fund our guarantee for school leavers next September, the Chancellor allocated £650 million in the Budget and a further £200 million in the pre-Budget report. That extra funding means that I can give the guarantee that is enshrined in the Bill. We have seen time and time again that the hon. Gentleman cannot make that guarantee, because he is not allowed to. He has been told by his party's shadow Chancellor, the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), that in 2010-11 the budget will not increase but will be cut. That is the difference between us.

Michael Gove: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for evading the question again. We do not know where that £650 million will come from. Given that, according to the Chancellor, the Department's overall budget is to be cut, and given that the budgets for the National College for Leadership of Schools and Children's Services and the TDA are to be cut, presumably the extra funding for the September guarantee will come from other parts of the right hon. Gentleman's own budget. [Interruption.] "Wriggling" is the word that I would use for what the right hon. Gentleman is doing. He is the person who spends his entire time boasting about—forgive me: advertising—his position on spending in a variety of newspaper interviews, and he is the person who explained in The Sunday Times that he would be funding improvements in education by sacking 3,000 head teachers. I should be interested to know whether he is still committed to that policy. Perhaps we shall find out in Committee.

I said earlier that we wanted to move away from a culture in which bureaucracy runs what happens in our schools to one in which we trust professionals more. We know that one of the reasons why professionals need more backing is the poor behaviour—the constant barracking and low-level conversation—[Laughter]—that they often face when attempting to bring enlightenment to the laggardly. One of the proposed instruments is home school agreements. We have long argued that they should be strengthened, and provisions in the Bill may open the door to some improvement in this regard. I again have concerns, however. The Secretary of State appears to want home school agreements to be drawn up as individualised contracts for every pupil in the school, for them to be drawn up every year, and in some cases for individualised contracts to be drawn up differently for each of the parents of a pupil and then redrawn every year. Is that not another potentially immense bureaucratic burden? The Association of School and College Leaders has pointed out that rewriting potentially thousands of home school contracts every year will once again take school leaders' time away from teaching and leading their institutions.

More than that, is not the whole point of a home school agreement to spell out what the school expects of every parent and pupil? Is not the whole point to assert a common ethos—a comprehensive spirit that is the mark of that school, and to which all pupils are expected to subscribe?

There is also the question of what happens if parents decline to sign the contract. I understand that under current law no parent can be forced to sign. If a parent declines to sign, they cannot be held to the obligations that they have not agreed to. Also, if parents know that they can decline to sign and can face no sanctions, why should they sign—and especially because everything they are alleged to want is guaranteed by law anyway by the Secretary of State?

One of the Secretary of State's other wheezes for involving parents is to have parental surveys. I am very keen on surveys on education. There was one in The Sunday Telegraph this weekend that pointed out that David Cameron is trusted more than Gordon Brown by some 12 percentage points to improve this country's education.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will in future remember to use the correct terminology for addressing Members of this House.

Michael Gove: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Let me therefore repeat that my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) is trusted by many more parents to improve education than the Prime Minister is trusted.

As I understand it, the survey the Secretary of State proposes is for the parents of children in year 5 to be asked whether they are happy with the provision of secondary schools in their area. If a certain number of parents—the required number is as yet unspecified, as the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) pointed out—say they are unhappy, the local authority has to produce a response, although no time scale is specified. If the local authority produces such a report addressing the complaints of dissatisfied parents and then a number of parents object—again the required number is unspecified—the local authority has to put its report to a schools adjudicator. If the schools adjudicator finds against the local authority, the local authority has to come back with a new report—although, again, the time scale is not specified—and so the process continues. The local authority must ultimately implement plans, unless it considers them to be unreasonable, in which case I suspect the courts will once again be called in to define exactly what is reasonable.

Let us imagine that a local authority goes through this process and that that all happens within a year, and it then seeks to implement its plans only to find that the next cohort of parents of children in year 5 takes a completely different view of education provision. What happens then? Do we go through the same process all over again? Which group of parents is sovereign? Again, all the Secretary of State is proposing is a hugely bureaucratic process whose only certain beneficiary is the legal profession.

Earlier, in response to remarks made by the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), I mentioned my concerns about the licence to teach. There is a basic question that we all, particularly the Secretary of State, must answer: what value does this add? Bureaucratic bodies very rarely resist the accretion of extra powers to themselves, but the body charged with administering this new obligation—the General Teaching Council—has signalled profound concern about the additional powers it has been asked to accept. It says that it would be a challenge to develop a system that has sufficient rigour to make a positive impact while remaining proportionate and not unduly burdensome. It also points out that many teachers are sceptical about the practical benefits that can be secured, and interpret the initiative as another burden on them and their schools. The GTC specifically worries that any message about trusting professionals would be difficult to communicate when they see this as simply something additional layered on to the many existing mechanisms to which they are subject.

It is vital that we enhance the prestige of teaching and the esteem in which it is held, but I am not sure how that can be done simply through a process of bureaucratic certification. The answer is to raise the bar for entry to the profession and to improve continuous professional development, but the Bill contains no measures to achieve either of those aims, as both the professional associations I mentioned earlier—the National Union of Teachers and the ASCL—have pointed out.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does my hon. Friend agree that head teachers should better be able to monitor the teachers on their staff in order to support them and bring them up to standard, and, if necessary, to remove from the profession those who are not of a sufficient standard—an action that too rarely happens nowadays? That is what we need, not the complex, bureaucratic and expensive system the Secretary of State proposes.

Michael Gove: As ever, my hon. Friend makes his point succinctly and well, and I cannot improve on his intervention. We should introduce the sorts of changes he mentions.

Along with improving the accountability of the professionals, we should improve the accountability of schools overall. That is why I am a supporter of reformed league tables, and why I am concerned about the Bill's proposals on the school report card. One of the great things about league tables at their best is that they shine a light on those schools—very often in disadvantaged circumstances—that are dramatically exceeding expectations, and the rest of us can learn from what those superb schools are doing. We can look at those schools that have challenging intakes and yet exceed the national average and say, "In this particular institution, there are leaders and teachers who are doing a superb job, and we wish what they are doing to be more widely applied elsewhere." Having that combination of professional autonomy and accountability—rigorous, clear, transparent, data-led accountability—is very important.

I fear that we may be moving away from a process that, although it has some flaws, provides a measure of clarity, towards something that is at once both fuzzier and more bureaucratic. The Government want their new school report card to supersede the attainment league tables as the principal accountability measure, but it is unclear how these school report cards will work. There is supposed to be an overall grade, but that grade may conflict with an Ofsted report measure. It is unclear who will assess the grade a school is to be given. Will Ofsted be responsible for that, or the Department? If the Department is responsible, will there not be a perverse incentive for it—no matter how incorruptible its Ministers—to ensure that every year more schools are seen to be succeeding? One of the problems with the report card introduced in New York is that the proportion of schools classified as good or excellent is now some 80 per cent. of the total. That is precisely because of that tendency to level-up purely in terms of how schools are reported—not in terms of what they are actually achieving.

Within the report card, there will be a variety of different ingredients, but what weight will be given to each of them? In assessing the overall grade, what weight will be given to the attainment tables, to value-added and to contextual value-added? Given that the report card is supposed also to measure such things as well-being and parental satisfaction, what weight will be given to them? What weight will be given to the quality of a school's relationship with other schools in framing the overall grade?

The answer is not to have a bureaucrat assessing an overall grade on a basket of measures that they decide. The answer is to retain and improve league tables, with a focus on academic attainment, and to ensure that, using sophisticated technology that is increasingly available, parents have the opportunity to develop their own ways of comparing schools in lots of different fashions, all of which will allow them to find the education and school that are right for them.

Still on the subject of finding the right school, one of the most controversial issues is home education, as we know from earlier debate. Although I wish to discuss this, I shall do so very briefly as it will certainly be debated at length in Committee. I am deeply concerned about the additional bureaucratic burden that will now potentially be placed on thousands of our fellow citizens whose only crime is to want to devote themselves as fully as possible to their children's education. It is a basic right of parents to be able to educate their children in accordance with their own wishes, and to educate them at home if they so wish. There may be many reasons why parents take that decision: they might be dissatisfied with local provision; their child might have a specific educational need that they feel can be better supported at home; or they might have philosophical objections to the style of education on offer at the local state schools that are easily accessible. Each of these decisions can sometimes be illuminating, in that they can tell us what is wrong with current provision—there might be a lack of diversity, for instance. Ultimately however, this is a basic human right that every parent should have, and I feel the Bill erodes that right, because, as I read it, it allows the state to terminate the right of a family to educate a child at home if the education offered is not deemed suitable according to regulations that the Secretary of State writes.

Mr. Stuart: I wonder whether my hon. Friend is aware that New Zealand introduced a similar licensing and monitoring system a number of years ago but last year gave it up on the grounds that it was a waste of time and money. Have the Government learned nothing from the foreign experience of this system?

Michael Gove: It seems that the Government have learned very little; indeed, I believe that the report on which their recommendations are based was described by one member of the expert group called in to help us as one of the most rushed, flawed and populist exercises with which he had ever been involved. I know that the Secretary of State bears no malice towards home education, so I hope that in Committee he and the Minister for Schools and Learners will do their best to address the many legitimate concerns. I do not know of any home educating parent who supports these provisions. I, like almost every Member of this House, have been inundated by correspondence, telephone calls and e-mails from, and had private meetings with, home educating parents who are deeply concerned about this legislation, because it undermines the right of a family who have broken no laws and placed no child in danger to decide what is in the interests of their child.

[Michael Gove]

As the debate on home education has developed, I have become particularly worried about the way in which various issues have been conflated; I am especially worried about the conflation of safeguarding and child protection with quality of education. I deeply regret the way statistics have been used to suggest somehow that children are intrinsically at greater risk if they are being home educated; I believe I am right in saying that not a single home-educated child has had to be taken into care as a result of a child protection plan, yet there are those who have sedulously spread the myth that somehow children are at greater risk through being home educated.

Mr. Mark Field: Does my hon. Friend also recognise that there are often positive reasons for parents choosing to educate their children at home? These decisions are not necessarily a reflection on the schools or the local education authority, so the notion that simply improving the LEA or the schools will dissipate the demand for home education is entirely wrong. Some parents home educate for very positive reasons.

Michael Gove: I entirely understand the point made by my hon. Friend; he is right to say that a host of reasons are involved, and it is not for us to second-guess the decisions made by parents. Many of those who sacrifice not only earnings but time make a commitment of love towards their children in order to home educate them, and that should be celebrated and applauded, not denigrated and undermined.

One of my specific concerns is that this legislation means the state will take it upon itself to regulate what may or may not be taught in the home. Proposed new section 19C in schedule 1 provides that parents will have to produce a report in accordance with regulations laid down by the Secretary of State explaining what they propose to include in the education programme for their child. They will then have to allow an inspector in at an appropriate point, and that inspector will have to be satisfied that the education being provided is suitable, according to the regulations laid down by the Secretary of State. If that education is not considered suitable by that local authority employee, the right of that individual to be home educated can be revoked. So this is not about safeguarding or even about child protection; this is about the Secretary of State being able to say that an individual home-educating parent is not providing an education that he deems appropriate and therefore they should not have the right to educate that child at home.

One of the other terrible things about this legislation is that proposed new section 19F in schedule 1 sets out that when the information provided by a parent to a local authority changes and is found to be wrong, even if it was materially right when it was given—in other words, the parent made efforts to ensure that the information was correct but the local authority finds that it has changed in some respect—the right to educate that child at home can be revoked. Even though the parent is not at fault and sought to provide the right information at the right time in the right way, they can lose the right to educate their own child. A draconian extension of state power is potentially made possible by this Bill, which is why all my hon. Friends will be working hard in Committee to ensure that we can find a consensus on this sensitive area, so that the rights of home educating parents are respected and we do not fundamentally erode their liberties.

Mr. Laws: I share some of the concerns that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. Is it his party's position that the existing regulation of home education should be left unchanged, or does he foresee the need to make some changes?

Michael Gove: I do foresee the need to make some changes. I do not believe that the current system is perfect, but it is fundamentally important that we respect the rights of home educators first and that we ensure that any change to legislation is conducted in accordance with their wishes and interests—they have made it crystal clear that the approach that has been taken so far runs counter to those.

Mr. Stuart: I wonder whether my hon. Friend finds it bizarre, as I do, that this Bill, unlike any piece of legislation to deal with children going back to 1989, fails to make the interests of the child paramount in any consideration. Instead, the Bill considers any administrative failures on the part of parents as being an open and shut case for the revocation of home education, regardless of the interests of the child, and that is simply wrong.

Ed Balls indicated dissent.

Mr. Stuart: Instead of shaking his head, perhaps the Secretary of State could fix that.

Michael Gove: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. More broadly, I should point out that the Secretary of State's own children's plan makes it clear that it is families that bring up children, not the state. The rights of families should be respected, and I am not convinced that they are being respected by the proposals being introduced.

There are parts of the Bill to which the Conservatives have no objections. Such areas include the powers to intervene when youth offending teams fail and the ability of school governing bodies to establish academies—indeed, I thought that the Secretary of State made a superb case when outlining the importance of academies becoming exempt charities. I also think it is right that schools should be able to use delegated funds to provide community facilities, and the proposals to improve information sharing for local children's safeguarding boards seem sensible. We also share the Government's aspirations to ensure that children have all the skills and knowledge that the best personal, social and health education is supposed to impart, but we want to see more about precisely what is proposed. We differ from the Government in one respect: we believe that the right of parents to withdraw their children should not be eroded. We agree with Sir Alasdair Macdonald in that respect. [Interruption.] Exactly, we agree with his recommendation in that respect.

There are other areas, such as the primary curriculum, about which we have profound concerns about the direction the Government are taking, and we have advertised those elsewhere. At its heart, our objection to this legislation lies in our basic view that we should regulate less, trust professionals more and build on the excellence and diversity already on display in the schools system. Our philosophy for schools is simple:

> "It is about schools feeling ownership of their own future, the power and the responsibility that comes from being free to chart their own course, experiment, innovate, doing things differently: the decision-makers in their own destiny not the recipients of a pre-destined formula laid down by Government."

That was the case made by Tony Blair to the Specialist Schools and Academies Trust in 2006. It is a principled vision that I entirely endorse, and I am sorry only that the Secretary of State's Bill departs from it so profoundly.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The pre-debate calculations carried out did not take account of the length of the two Front-Bench speeches that we have heard, so there is pressure on the availability of time for Back-Bench speeches. Originally, a 15-minute limit was imposed and I intend to follow that for the first speech to be made from the Labour Back Benches and by the first Conservative Back Bencher. I am sorry to say that thereafter the limit will have to revert to 10 minutes if this debate is to be as inclusive as most people would wish it to be. I hope that that will be seen as a reasonable decision in the circumstances.

6.8 pm

Hilary Armstrong (North-West Durham) (Lab): I trust that I shall take a fair deal less than the 15 minutes allocated to me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I found the exchanges between the two Front Benchers fascinating, and I am sorry that I shall not follow them in talking mainly about schools.

I wish to discuss some of the Bill's specific aspects, much of which I welcome—for example, the statutory basis on which the Government propose to put personal, social and health education. Most of my remarks result from my experience, gained both before I came to this House and in this House, of the effects of social exclusion, in particular.

I cannot stress too strongly how we must help and support those children who do not get the support from their families that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) was talking about, or how we must work with them so that they can take advantage of the opportunities that are available to them. The evidence from many different reports that I saw when I was in the Cabinet Office is that emotional well-being is critical to enabling the most vulnerable to learn, and so paying attention to that is very important. There are some superb programmes out there and we should be far more centrally prescriptive when it comes to what we know works in PSHE. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) knows the programmes about which I am talking.

For very young children, but also as the children get older, learning to deal effectively with relationship development and, yes, with sex education is critical. The schools and local authorities that do that effectively are precisely the schools and local authorities that are successfully reducing teenage pregnancy rates. We are daft in this place if we simply say, "Oh, we don't like that. We're frightened of that." We must consider such an approach and we must use the programmes that we know work. We should use the experience that is out there and spread the good practice much more effectively around the country.

Mr. Allen: First, may I commend my right hon. Friend for her fantastic work on this issue when she was in the Cabinet Office? Does she accept that in order to spread the good practice around and to ensure that the best policies are more broadly spread, we need something like a national policy assessment centre? Rather than constantly reinventing the wheel and trying to pick up pet projects, we should put forward a series of proven policies which have an evidence base. We can then help local authorities and others to achieve the right early interventions.

Hilary Armstrong: I support that, as my hon. Friend knows, and I have suggested those ideas to the Department over a number of years. An embryo organisation exists for that task, but I do not think that it yet has the power or authority effectively to implement such a process throughout local government. I would like to see that happen.

My second point concerns partnerships with schools. I want to see more examples of the voluntary sector and the outside world working in partnership with schools. If PSHE is being considered as part of the curriculum, the teacher needs to be part of that but including the work of outside bodies, and making relationships with them, is also critical. I want schools and academies to use their commissioning powers to work more effectively with community organisations that have a good track record so that they can be used to improve the educational opportunities of the children in the school.

I am sorry that I am moving from issue to issue without much of a common thread, but I want to pick out particular issues in the Bill. The implementation of the youth crime action plan, a matter on which the Front Benchers did not disagree, is very important. Last week, the Department produced an evaluation of the work so far and it raised some important questions and identified problems with what has been done so far. When anything is implemented in a local area it is critical that the local community should know what is going on—I hope that the Committee will bear that in mind.

I have seen the youth court operating in Washington, and it is incredibly effective. I have also seen the community court operating in Red Hook in Washington. The key thing is that although they set down non-custodial activity, the community knows and understands the action that is being taken and therefore has confidence in it. We do not get all the stories along the lines of, "This one was out painting a wall when they should have been inside," and so on. The approach of those courts has been far more effective in tackling youth crime than many of the things that we have done elsewhere.

I spent much of my life before I came to this place working with young people and trying to divert them from criminal behaviour, but it is critical that if they have engaged in such behaviour we should try not only to divert them from it in the future but to ensure that there is a structure of punishment. There must be a structure whereby they know that they have done wrong and work out with somebody what to do about it. I cannot understand people who see these two things as being on opposite benches, as it were. They are part and parcel of the same policy and we have to ensure that that is how we proceed in the future. Far too often, the youth offending teams have mixed that up, which has been a problem in local areas.

[Hilary Armstrong]

More than anything else, many of these young people need some structure in their lives. They are growing up in families where they have no sense of right and wrong and no sense of what is acceptable and what is not. An important part of being an adolescent is testing boundaries, but that means that there need to be boundaries that can be tested and that the adolescent needs to understand that there are such boundaries. The way in which we develop the youth offending programme is becoming more and more important in this country because in many communities such offending drains the life and ambition out of the community, meaning that people feel that there is no point in getting together to do anything because of the level of antisocial behaviour and so on. There are things that we can do that will encourage young people but also help them to set those boundaries much more effectively. We have to include the local community in that, although we have been fearful of such an approach in this country, for reasons that I understand. If we are to change the experience of young people, we need to involve the community in a much more effective way.

That brings me to the final point that I want to tackle today, which is another issue about which there was no division between the two Front-Bench spokesmen, although there is a lot of anxiety about how it will be implemented, and it concerns the family proceedings. Everyone accepts that there should be more transparency and openness, but the Bill also affects the level of reporting. In being more open and transparent, we must maintain caution about what is reported and how it is reported. I have worked with far too many families and have been present at far too many cases in which there have been problems despite the Children Act 1989, which put the primacy of children at the forefront. I did not want to intervene on this point earlier, but that primacy remains through all legislation unless it is changed, so it does not need to be restated in this Bill. The primacy of the interests of children is critical but because of the irresponsible way in which some of our newspapers are prepared to report family proceedings, we must continue to exercise caution.

This House has established proceedings whereby Public Bill Committees can talk to outside bodies before they consider legislation in detail. I hope that the Committee will consider doing so, particularly as regards family proceedings. Although, in principle, many organisations want such proceedings to be opened up and reported, they are very anxious about the detail. We should respect that.

Mr. Graham Stuart: The primacy of the interests of the child are not enshrined in the Bill, and I do not see how the Children Act 1989 could trump that. The Bill says that if a parent has failed to register their child, the quality of the education provided to that child in the home is to be disregarded—the interests of the child are to be disregarded—and the child must be ordered back to school. I hope that the right hon. Lady will support me in seeking Government changes in that respect.

Hilary Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman is trying very cleverly to get around something that we know is not there, and I shall not be dragged down his route. I could have a lot to say about home education, but I am determined to stick to discussing what we are going to do about the most vulnerable in our communities.

What the Government seek to do overall, in opening up proceedings, is absolutely right, but I am concerned that in doing so we protect sensitive personal information. On my understanding of the Bill, such information could be published unless the court specifically imposes restrictions, but I suspect that any court that imposes such restrictions will be subject to enormous criticism by some members of the press. We need to be clear about what we are licensing and what we are allowing, and we must make absolutely sure that we consider the interests of the child. Family proceedings usually involve children when they are at their most vulnerable, and we must make sure that we do not put them into more danger from, for example, bullying or further abuse. I approve of the principle, but I am concerned that, frequently, because there is no disagreement about the principle, we do not pay enough attention to the level of detail. That might come back to hit us if we do not maintain the clear level of care needed for the most vulnerable children when they are part of family proceedings.

There is much in the Bill that I welcome and much that I would like to talk more about, but I have tried to concentrate on the issues that, for me, are part of how we support the most vulnerable in our society and enable them to grow up to play a full part in it because they have been able to meet their full potential.

6.22 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I beg to move an amendment, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and add:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Children, Schools and Families Bill because it adds hugely to the bureaucratic burdens on schools and colleges without improving real opportunities and educational standards for pupils and without genuinely empowering parents; its proposals for the regulation of home education introduce powers which are excessive and risk undermining key freedoms for home educators; it fails to put in place a coherent system for delivering school improvement; its provisions on family proceedings have not been properly consulted on and do not take account of existing reforms; and it does not include much needed policies to introduce a Pupil Premium to support the education of children from disadvantaged homes or to establish a new Educational Standards Authority to restore confidence in educational standards and to reduce the extent of destabilising political interference in English education."

It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), and I agree strongly with several of her points about the release of sensitive information in the family court. I hope that we will have the opportunity to consider that issue in some detail in Committee. I appreciate that we are short of time today, and I shall do my best to limit my comments on the Bill, which covers many extremely important areas.

I should like to put on record the sadness of my party at the death of the former hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire, Mr. David Taylor. He was much respected across the House and he will be fondly remembered not only by Labour Members, but by Opposition Members, and our thoughts are with his family at this time.

Before I come to my substantive comments about the Bill, I have a request for Ministers. Will one of them, when they respond to the debate, clarify a point that got slightly mangled in the exchange between the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) regarding her question about reasonable punishment? She asked about individuals who attend madrassahs and other such quasi-educational settings and whether they should be covered by the existing restrictions on corporal punishment. I thought that the Secretary of State indicated that he was sympathetic to the hon. Lady's point, but that approach appears to contradict both the existing legal position and a letter that Baroness Morgan, a Minister in his Department, sent to a lobby group that is pressuring for a change in the law on this issue. The letter of 6 January to the Children Are Unbeatable! Alliance said that some such educational and quasi-educational settings are currently exempt from the existing restrictions on physical punishment. Unless I got the wrong end of the stick, the Secretary of State showed sympathy for the hon. Lady's point, but his Department's position appears to be that the existing legislation will not be changed.

It is obvious from the Liberal Democrat's amendment that we have considerable concerns about the Bill, and that we hope that the House will do the country a service either by not allowing it through the House before the general election, or by making massive changes to the Bill. It is extraordinary that, on the day on which the Secretary of State has effectively had to boast in the Financial Times that we are going to have the poorest education funding settlement since 1997, the Bill proposes to spend about £1.1 billion, in net present value terms, on additional bureaucracy. That money will not be available to front-line education to go to schools and parents and to assist pupils.

This point relates to the additional money that will be spent on the bureaucracy surrounding home-school agreements and pupil and parent guarantees, which even the Government have been unable to cost in the cost-benefit analysis that comes with the Bill. It also relates to the parental surveys that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) mentioned earlier, and to the cost of school improvement partners and home education and the additional regulation that will arise in that respect. It seems extraordinary, given that educational finance will be so restrained in the coming years, that we will have to spend such a huge amount of money on additional bureaucracy that seems, as the hon. Member for Surrey Heath said earlier, likely to follow in the tradition of this Secretary of State who believes that he can improve the education system through central direction and legislation.

As the Liberal Democrats mentioned in the Queen's Speech debate, this is the 12th education Bill to come from the Labour Government. It was published only one week after we approved the last education Act, and, unbelievably, amends some of the measures in that Act. That shows the extraordinary tendency of the Labour Government and this Secretary of State to legislate and often to replace legislation before it has even bedded down.

We also have serious concerns about the amount of time that will be available to debate the Bill. When one picks up the Bill, it does not look to be of the size and scale of the last education Act that we debated, or of some of the larger Bills that we are used to dealing with in the House, but it deals with extraordinarily important and sensitive issues, and the debate that we will need to have on some of those issues will be considerable—yet we will be trying to do that in only two weeks. We need to consider the range of issues that we will be trying to resolve in those two weeks.

We will be trying to debate major new proposals on home education that are extremely controversial and difficult. As the right hon. Member for North-West Durham has said, we will be debating new and controversial plans to allow the release of sensitive information from the family courts. Those proposals are opposed by many outside bodies. We will be debating controversial and important proposals on a new licensing arrangement for teachers. We will also be discussing the introduction of a new school report card, of new arrangements for school improvement partners, of new pupil and parent guarantees and of new arrangements for home-school agreements. Other issues to be discussed include the whole future of the primary school curriculum, which the Bill deals with in one clause, the important issue of personal, social and health education, which has already stirred some debate in this place, and the powers of governing bodies.

Those are only some of the issues to be debated, and the Secretary of State and the usual channels have not allowed anything like enough time properly to scrutinise those issues. He cannot be surprised if the Liberal Democrats indicate that we do not want many of those proposals to go through in a half-baked or half-scrutinised way before the general election before which we know the Government are having to rush this Bill through.

Let me make some brief comments about the parts of the Bill that we support and those that we will be seeking to amend. There are two small but important areas that we support unreservedly. The first is the new status for, and access to, PSHE education, although we are not entirely convinced that the change goes far enough in some areas. Secondly, we support, as I believe the hon. Member for Surrey Heath did, the measures on special educational needs; we think that they are beneficialand helpful

We share some of the concerns that the hon. Gentleman expressed about bureaucracy in relation to the school report card and the licence to teach, although I do not think that we would put them in as critical a way as he did. We are more optimistic, or more open-minded, than him about the potential for those two matters to lead to improvements, if the measures that the Government introduce address them in the right way. The current mechanisms for school accountability are not particularly effective, and they do not give us a very good measure of the performance of many schools, particularly those that do not have the most challenging catchments and are therefore able to coast along in the league tables without their performance being looked at closely.

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman mentioned one proposal that seems to have pretty broad support—the extension of PSHE to the national curriculum. It is wonderful that all parties support that. Unfortunately, it appears that most people out there where it matters—on the estates, in the towns, in the rural areas and in the cities—have not got a clue what PSHE is. Will he join me in making a friendly plea to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that we call it something that people understand? I would offer, with all modesty, the term "life skills". Would the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) support that, and would he at some point support an amendment that brought that about, if the ministerial team did not quite find its way to accepting that idea?

[Mr. Allen]

Mr. Laws: I agree that it is always helpful when we use language that people understand and that is accessible. There is a problem not only with people not understanding what PSHE means, but with the quality of what currently passes for such education.

The existing school accountability mechanisms are seriously deficient and the school report card has scope for improving the way in which schools are assessed. However, as I said in the debate on the Gracious Speech, there is a real risk that the Government will seek to put too many different measures into the school report card, that it will become a box-ticking exercise, and that as a consequence, as the hon. Member for Surrey Heath said, we will end up with schools simply ticking boxes and with an increasing number of schools appearing to reach the higher grade levels without any change or improvement in performance in the areas that really matter. If that is all that the school report card does, it will be a waste of time and a bureaucratic burden.

We agree that it is quite wrong that the Department for Children, Schools and Families should be the organisation that oversees and produces the report card; there are clearly risks inherent in that. It seems obvious to us that Ofsted or, arguably, local authorities should be charged with that responsibility.

We are somewhat more positive than the hon. Gentleman about the potential of the licence to teach, but there is a great deal of confusion about what the licence to teach is meant to deliver. The Government first spun the idea, when the Bill was published, as a measure to get rid of poor-performing teachers. The Secretary of State knows perfectly well what I mean by "spin". In a lot of the recent documentation that has come from the Government, the presentation has been all about CPD—that is, continuing professional development; the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) would have picked me up on that if I had not been clear about what it was. The Government have to be clear about which of the two they seek to deliver. There is a real risk that the proposals could, if the Government are not careful, become another expensive, bureaucratic burden.

The Government need to focus on the ability of the licensing process to deal with poorly performing teachers, including in circumstances that are not dealt with under the existing performance management regime, such as those that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. Head teachers seek to take action against poorly performing teachers by using existing mechanisms, but those teachers leave before they have been put through the performance review. They then simply turn up in other schools, where they are able to teach very poorly. That is a real issue. It raises difficult questions, but those questions are worth exploring.

Our three greatest concerns about the Bill relate to three areas: home education, the pupil and parent guarantees, and the matter that the right hon. Member for North-West Durham mentioned, the release of sensitive information in the family court. We accept the Government's good intent in seeking to ensure high-quality home education for all children, and we recognise the evidence that was given by the local authorities. Obviously, it is extremely controversial evidence, and it is very difficult to get a reliable data set, but it is argued that 8 per cent. of home-educated children may not be receiving a good education, and that 20 per cent. may be receiving a poor education. We recognise, as I think all Opposition Members do, that local authorities already have a duty to ensure that all children receive a suitable education.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech closely. Did he accept those figures? My understanding is that they were as unsound as most of the others that we have suffered in the Badman review, and that the Department is planning to produce another impact assessment because it has had to look again at all its numbers. I do not believe that the numbers that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are correct.

Mr. Laws: I accept that they are highly speculative. None of us can possibly know what the right numbers are, but the hon. Gentleman, who is, I believe, a member of the Children, Schools and Families Committee, signed up to a report that includes a lot of information about the patchy quality of home education. Some parents and families did not see themselves as having a duty to continue home education beyond key stage 2. He also signed up to a report—the Secretary of State quoted this earlier—that said:

> "In our view it is unacceptable that local authorities do not know accurately how many children of school age in their area are in school, are being home educated or are otherwise not in school."

We agree that there is a real issue, but the challenge for the Government is to get the balance right, and we do not believe that they have done so. We agree with many of the criticisms made in the Select Committee's report, and we would like to suggest the potential for consensus on a number of points, because on such subjects it is important to seek to come to a conclusion, if we can, before this Parliament ends.

The one area in which we do not agree with the Select Committee is its conclusion that any scheme of notification or registration should be voluntary. It seems strange that the Committee can, in one sentence—the sentence that the Secretary of State cited earlier—say that it is unacceptable that local authorities do not know accurately how many children of school age in their area are in school, being home educated, or not in school. It may be that that element of the Committee's conclusions reflected a desire to gain a compromise between individuals with very different views. I am not a member of the Committee, so I do not know whether that is true, but that is certainly the impression given.

However, we have concerns about two issues. The first is the nature of the registration process and whether the Government are in danger of presuming to be able to judge, at this stage, what a suitable education is, and of presuming to give individuals in local authorities the power to take away people's ability to home educate when there is no clarity about what a suitable home education is. Under the Government's proposals, individuals will not only be required to notify local authorities, but effectively be registering, and by registering will be required to prove their ability to home educate and prove that they are delivering a suitable education.

I put it to the Secretary of State that the only way that local authorities can reasonably do that job is by having a set of very detailed criteria for home education. Necessarily, the concern of home educators is that if the Government or local authorities seek to do that job without any agreement on what a suitable home education is, many individuals could suddenly find themselves having to comply with exactly the type of rigid state education that they have tried to escape by leaving formal schooling and going into home education.

Secondly, it is very regrettable that education and safeguarding have become so mixed up in the Badman report. An assumption that local authority inspectors should have to check whether all home educators meet safeguarding requirements is inappropriate. The scope for local authorities is to consider whether a suitable education, however defined, is being given, not to assume automatically that local authority inspectors should look at the safeguarding circumstances. The intrusiveness in that part of the Bill is quite extraordinary.

Under the Bill, a local authority must ascertain the child's wishes in relation to home education in all circumstances. It must check on the child's welfare in all circumstances, automatically assuming therefore the duty to prove that there are no welfare concerns, rather than simply picking up any that arise. In addition, a local authority must make at least one home visit and hold one meeting with the child each year. The cost-benefit analysis assumes that 100 per cent. of children will receive one in-year visit, with 50 per cent. receiving additional monitoring. There is a description of the statement of education, which has not yet been clarified in its detail but must be produced. In other words, the change in the regulation of home education is very significant and will mean that home education is regulated as never before.

We would like to suggest a way to improve the current regime, without perhaps creating some of the problems of the disproportionate response that are involved in the Government's proposals. First, we do not support the voluntary approach that the Select Committee advocates, but we suggest in the first instance that the Secretary of State ought to consider whether the scheme could involve notification, rather than registration. Notification would oblige everyone who is home educating to declare that information, without undertaking a registration process initially that proves in some way the suitability of the education.

Secondly, we suggest that a review over a longer time scale is needed, to consider what suitability means in home education. It would be dangerous to give local authority officials the responsibility for making judgments on suitability without any detailed guidance. I put it to the Secretary of State that we are simply not able to give that guidance, based on the debate so far and those that we are likely to have in Committee.

Thirdly, we obviously want more support for home educators and more training for those local authority staff who must oversee such things, and we will debate that in Committee. I should have thought that that was an area of common ground. The Government would have a better chance of gaining a consensus if we separated educational inspection from safeguarding. That has been one of the things that home educators have found most provocative. We would like the process to focus on the quality of education, not on safeguarding. We would like the Government to reflect again on how they can introduce a much lighter touch inspection regime, where the actions taken by local authorities are proportionate to the perceived risk, rather than presuming that every home-educating household in the country must be inspected in the ways set out in the Bill.

I hope that the Secretary of State is willing to take those proposals seriously. Outside the Committee's proceedings, we would be willing to take part in cross-party talks with him and the hon. Member for Surrey Heath if that is necessary to try to reach an agreement on proposals that could command cross-party support.

The second area about which we have considerable concerns is the pupil and parent guarantees and, tied to that, the home-school agreements. I shall not rehearse all the objections, because they came out very effectively from the exchanges, or lack of exchanges in some ways, between the hon. Gentleman and the Secretary of State. It was interesting that the Secretary of State failed to explain why the one-to-one tuition guarantee in primary education is different from that in secondary schools. There was no explanation of why the Government know better than head teachers and schools about whether tuition should be delivered one to one or in small groups and why one model is right for primary schools and another is right for secondary schools.

The Association of School and College Leaders and the TUC are right to criticise such measures and to say that they could open the floodgates to increased litigation, that they could involve a huge bureaucratic burden, and that the problem with pupil and parent guarantees in so many areas is that they are not meaningful, not always deliverable and not rationally designed. Many hon. Members would not object to some of the pupil and parent guarantees if they were meaningful, sensible and respected the fact that the Secretary of State does not know better than 23,500 schools across the country how to run education.

In our last debate, I gave a particularly striking example from the list of 38 pupil and parent guarantees that relates to pupil guarantee 5. I invite the Secretary of State to respond in a way that he did not last time and to tell me how on earth the local government ombudsman is remotely supposed to police guarantee 5, which says that > "every 11-14 year-old enjoys relevant and challenging learning in all subjects, and develops their personal, learning and thinking skills so that they have strong foundations to make their 14-19 choices."

That is motherhood and apple pie, and we are not supposed to know whether or not all schools are doing that—presumably, they are not, as we are told in the White Paper:

> "This will be phased in by September 2010."

I put it to the Secretary of State that it is not only impossible to measure a supposed guarantee that is so loosely defined, but impossible for the local government ombudsman to police it, yet it is possible that a parent might want to refer a complaint under that guarantee to the local government ombudsman.

We have already debated guarantee 13, which relates to one-to-one or small group tuition. It is totally unclear why the arrangements for primary and secondary schools are different, why there should be one-to-one education in one setting and education in small groups in another, and why a certain number of sessions should be guaranteed, rather than focusing on the outputs. I should have thought that that was one of the things that the Secretary of State had learned during his time at the Treasury.

[Mr. Laws]

On the parental guarantees—Nos. 5, 6 and 7—that relate to home-school agreements, it is unclear why the Government should make them compulsory for every school in the country. Why on earth do we need to make home-school agreements compulsory, even in schools that do not regard them as beneficial? Why is it necessary to personalise them for each child, when that will add enormously to the bureaucratic costs, which must therefore be regarded as unrealistic, as shown in the cost-benefit analysis associated with the Bill.

The third area about which we have major concerns is that of family courts and access to sensitive information. That is, of course, a Home Office lead issue, but as we will have no one with Home Office responsibilities involved in the Bill, I should like to make some comments. This is the one area on which we as an Opposition party have so far received the greatest criticism from outside bodies, not only children's bodies such as Barnardo's, the NSPCC, the Interdisciplinary Alliance for Children and the National Children's Bureau, but the Bar Council, Resolution—the much-respected family law group—and the department of social policy at the university of Oxford.

All those representations have a common theme. They accept the need to make family courts more transparent, but they believe that the proposals are rushed and lack sufficient consultation. They cannot understand why they are being pushed through at the same time as other measures to pilot the improved transparency of court decisions are only just being rolled out. All those groups believe that sensitive information linked to individuals could be released and that such legislation could be against the interests of children and deter them from giving evidence in some cases.

Almost universally, those outside groups have proposed a number of solutions to the deficiencies that they see in the Bill. They believe that any change should follow an independent evaluation of the April 2009 changes, which are only just being piloted. They believe that any changes should be delayed so that there is time for consultation and consideration in relation to these new and controversial proposals, which seem to have been driven through only to meet the needs of a number of lobby groups in the media. They also believe that if the proposals are to be implemented, they need to take into account the delay and cost implications of going through each case in turn, and look at assessments about any reporting restrictions that are necessary.

We have three major concerns about the Bill, and we hope that the Government will be willing to listen to them. If not, we hope that a large part of the Bill will not go through before the dissolution of Parliament. The Bill could have concentrated on areas where we might have found some consensus with the Government, in particular the need to reform the funding of young people from disadvantaged backgrounds, the need to introduce a pupil premium with real additional money, not money simply shifted around the system, the urgent need to restore credibility in relation to educational standards, which has not happened so far in spite of the earlier comments from the Secretary of State, and the need to devolve more power and freedom throughout the system, rather than accruing more power to the Secretary of State and introducing more bureaucracy.

The Bill is disappointing. We will do our best over the next few weeks constructively to amend some of the key parts of it, but at this stage we intend to vote against it and we hope that most of it will not get on to the statute book.

6.51 pm

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): There is probably nothing more important to our future as a prosperous country than the need to ensure that every child has an excellent education. I feel very grateful for the education that I had at my local country primary school, Lylehill in County Antrim, and my wonderful grammar school, Belfast Royal Academy. Despite a few people trying to close all the grammar schools in Northern Ireland, they are still operating and doing extremely well.

On the country primary school, I realise that such a Bill cannot include everything, but we should remember that in 2006 the Government launched the Learning Outside the Classroom manifesto, which aimed to give every school student the opportunity to experience out-of-classroom learning in the natural environment, yet in 2008 well over half of all school-aged children would never have had a visit to the countryside or an opportunity to understand anything about the countryside. I feel particularly strongly about that, because I am the chairman of the Countryside Alliance and, more importantly, because of my inner-city schools. Using a great deal of charitable money and donations, we try to get all the primary schools in my constituency at least one visit to the countryside. That makes such a difference to the children. I hope that can be considered.

There are many aspects of the Bill with which I agree, because some of them will help to ensure an excellent education, but I share some of the concerns expressed to me by head teachers that many of the proposals in the Bill could have waited or are not necessary and will add more bureaucracy to schools, particularly to the heads. Much more time and money will be spent on ticking more boxes to satisfy monitors about things that do not necessarily need to be monitored or could have been monitored in a different way, especially where schools have good leadership.

Previous speakers have commented on home-school agreements. I cannot understand how all the effort, work, time and money involved will improve by a single iota the education of a child in primary school.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab) rose—

Kate Hoey: I give way to my hon. Friend, although I have only 10 minutes.

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I shall not take too much of her time. As we know, she is from Northern Ireland, which has a fine record for quality of education. Is there something about the teaching methods employed in Northern Ireland that is an advantage that we have missed in the rest of the United Kingdom? Will she advise us on that?

Kate Hoey: I think that what makes a good school is a good head teacher being given as much freedom as possible to get on with doing a good job. That is why, if

I may say something positive about the Bill. I welcome the measures which, hopefully, will make it easier for successful schools to sponsor new academies and new types of school. Some of the outstanding schools in my constituency want to do more and have a record of changing lives in the area. We must make it easier for those, with the right leadership, to go ahead and do greater things.

I have some aspirational primary schools in Vauxhall. One, Durand primary school, has hugely important visions for future growth. I want to see the Government support such a school—for example, the Durand aim of developing its own all-through academy, with boarding provision from the age of 13 to A-levels. The school and the governing body want to move forward on that, and they have substantial funding in place. They know that central Government are on their side and they have already proved that they can deliver, having transformed a failing primary school in a socially deprived area of Stockwell into an outstanding provider, cutting class sizes, offering all sorts of organic food, providing subsidised after-school clubs—doing everything that makes it an ideal primary school.

The school does that because it has a visionary head and visionary teachers. They take a fairly sceptical view of the local authority telling them what to do. They get on with it. As a foundation school, it now wants to deliver an all-through academy which would offer free of charge boarding to children in its catchment area. It will not be a boarding school for the privileged few—40 per cent. of the children who attend Durand live in overcrowded households, more than 50 per cent. receive free school meals, and more than 95 per cent. come from black and minority ethnic backgrounds.

Durand's proposals and other proposals from primary and secondary schools would offer life-changing opportunities for such children and create much-needed additional secondary places. We need a legislative environment—I am not sure that it is in the Bill, but parts of it may be—that will allow a school such as Durand to go forward and do what it does best, which is creating excellence for children.

Michael Gove: Like the hon. Lady, I am a great admirer of Durand school and its head teacher, and I very much enjoyed the visit that she helped to facilitate. Unfortunately, the Bill will not be able to help Durand, which is a primary school. The Bill does not allow primary schools to sponsor academies. Indeed, when I suggested that primary schools themselves become academies, the Minister for Schools and Learners said that that idea would send a shiver down the spine of every parent. I presume that the hon. Lady, like me and like many other members of her party on the Back Benches, agrees that primary schools should be allowed to become academies.

Kate Hoey: I personally agree with primary schools being able to become academies. I am not saying that I speak for my colleagues on the Back Benches. I probably do not speak for some of them, but I would like to see that. I want to see a Bill—the present Bill may not contain such provision—that gives powers that make it easier for the vision of state schools such as Durand to become a reality. Much of that involves making sure that local authorities do not become a barrier to progress.

A number of Members feel strongly about home education, and I have listened keenly to the debate between those on the two Front Benches. For an inner-city area, I have a substantial number of home-educated children, for all sorts of reasons, as Members know. Although it is important that the local authority knows who those children are, that should not impose a straitjacket on home educators.

It is rather sad that we seem to have put the cart before the horse. I was pleased to hear what the Secretary of State said about educating and providing training for local authority staff to give them a better understanding of home education, but I am not quite as trusting. I would like that education and training for local authority staff to be in place before I allowed them to be let loose on home providers in my constituency. When the Department talked about registration, it said:

> "Home Education registration involves more than just providing a name and address. In particular, it will require home educating families to provide information about their approach to home education".

That is very dangerous, because we are now saying that we actually want to interfere in how children are educated at home. If we believe that families have first responsibility for such education, we have to allow them it. However, that is totally separate from anything to do with safeguarding children in their homes, and that is why I feel that ContactPoint, which will come on stream in September throughout the country, will give local authorities the information that they need. A good local authority, which works with such parents positively and is not seen as going in and telling them what to do, will then be able to find ways of supporting home educating parents. They want to be supported, but they need support, not the regulation that is seen as coming in from above.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I agree with a lot of what the hon. Lady says, but I do not see how ContactPoint will distinguish between all those children who, for one reason or another, do not attend a mainstream school. Unless there is a notification system, there will not be a category of home education, but there will be a lot of children who do not attend a mainstream school. There may be all sorts of reasons why: they may be children about whom we are really concerned—children below the radar.

Kate Hoey: Every home educator to whom I have spoken in my constituency recognises that somebody, somewhere needs to know that children are being home educated. They are not even against people from the education department visiting and, with the right agreement, learning how they educate, because there is no doubt that a lot of home educators—probably 99.9 per cent. of them—are very good educators indeed.

I am disappointed by the fact that we seem to be rushing through the legislation. The Badman report was rushed, too. I do not agree with every word of the very fine report by the Children, Schools and Families Committee, but I agree with a lot of it.

Mr. Sheerman rose—

Kate Hoey: No, I am not going to take an intervention.

The Committee produced a good report, which recognised that the Badman report had not been handled in quite the same way as many other Government reports. We are rushing through this legislation, and we need to stop and look again. I very much hope that, in

[Kate Hoey]

Committee, changes will be made proving that the legislation represents soft-touch regulation. We have heard a lot from Ministers about it being soft-touch, but I have said before—

Mr. Allen: Light-touch.

Kate Hoey: Light-touch, soft-touch.

In reality, what starts out as light-touch, particularly when a local authority does not necessarily operate in the best possible way, can easily turn into something more than that—something that becomes another burden and is about controlling and changing what home educating parents do. I very much resent that, and I wish that it did not happen. I hope that the Government will still look and listen and, in Committee, change the legislation to make it much more acceptable to all those home educators who do a very fine job.

7.3 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) is neither a light touch nor a soft touch; she is a very fine parliamentarian, and it is a privilege to follow her excellent speech.

Every progressive civilisation has depended for its success on the quality of the education of its citizens, both male and female. I have observed, over almost 27 years as a Member, that the most important thing in politics is ideas, open minds and progress. That has been the great tradition of western democracy since the age of enlightenment, but the greatest ideas are usually ruined by rules and regulations and the fine print that follows them, and I am bound to conclude that the authors of this Bill could not see the wood for the trees.

That is why I commend the intellectual approach of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove), and I pay tribute to all who have followed their vocation to teach, just as I did when I left university. I faced my first class in a county secondary modern school in Cornwall; I then went to Leeds grammar school, which was an education in several senses. In my first job as a qualified teacher, I went to Loretto school in Scotland, and I am proud to be a Scottish-registered teacher; and then I spent 14 years at Harrow school. In all those schools, the quality of leadership and the scholarship of the teaching staff guaranteed the quality of education for all the pupils. That is still true, and that is why my hon. Friend is right. The issue is about a partnership between parents and teachers, with the state providing funding, unless we are talking about the independent sector, which has such an important role to play.

In my last few weeks as a Member, I do not mind saying that it is no good being rude about schools such as Eton and the people who go there. First, they do not choose to do so—their parents choose; and secondly, those schools are often the best in the world. All of us should seek to elevate the quality of education throughout the country to the best that can be achieved. It is foolish to deny that.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman has had a very distinguished career, and we are great friends outside the House. However, it is very easy to run a successful educational programme in the independent sector if one excludes all the poor children and all the children with special educational needs, and if it does not represent the communities in which most of us live. That is the difficulty, and sometimes people in the independent sector ought to have more humility in respect of what they claim for their schools.

Robert Key: In responding to the distinguished Chairman of the Children, Schools and Families Committee, I should say only that that is why, ever since 1946, the independent sector has endeavoured always to broaden its interest and intake and to provide more scholarships. But what has been the response? All the scholarships that were available to poorer children have been restricted, and since this Government came to power no scholarship amounting to more than 50 per cent. of the fees has been allowed. That is a retrogressive policy, and I deplore it.

I fear that the Bill has missed the point. As Baroness Walmsley pointed out in the other place, we have had more than 1,200 regulations since 1997, and they have added up in words to more than the combined works of Shakespeare. That is not clever, and I agreed so much with Lord Sacks, who, in the other place on 26 November 2009, reminded us that not everything that matters can be measured; not everything that counts can be counted; and not everything that is valuable can be valued at a price. Of course, that is true.

As a veteran of the 1983 Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts and, I think, the only survivor of the Committee stage of the 1988 GERBIL, the great Education Reform Bill, of the now distinguished peer, Lord Baker, I can observe that the Bill before us is really not worth most of the paper on which it is written. Clause 23 alone, on the licence to practise, would be enough to erode the morale and confidence of most of the teaching profession.

There is, however, an aspect of the Bill to which I want to refer, because I support it strongly. That aspect is represented by clauses 10 to 14, on personal, social, health and economic education. It is a clumsy phrase, and I absolutely agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that, if we can think up something snappier that means something to people, so much the better. However, parents are responsible for providing a moral dimension to the education of their children, and, in my ideal world, where marriage would be the norm but stable relationships would be the best equivalent for everybody else, parents would take on that responsibility.

Such education would be not just about the biology of sex, but about the moral framework—about marriage, stable relationships and all those virtuous things that lead to stable communities and a stable society. We cannot force parents to do it, however. Some parents do not want to; some do not think that they are very good at it; and some would rather that doctors or, indeed, teachers did it instead. Someone must do it, however, and after more than 25 years as a Member one of my regrets is that Parliament and successive Governments have failed to encourage young people, over several generations, towards a more mature understanding at an earlier age of how to respect their bodies, friends and communities. It is much better that teachers should do this than pornographers, drug-pushers, people-traffickers or criminals, and that is why clauses 10 to 14 should be supported.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North said that people outside this place, on the estates and in schools and communities, do not have a clue what this is all about. I think he is right. In fact, it is worse than that, because most people inside this House do not have a clue what it is about either. Those of us who have been here for a long time and have been talking to our education authorities, social workers and hospitals—accident and emergency departments, and so on—realise the enormous challenge that young people face nowadays that we did not face when we were their age.

The whole question of sexually transmitted infections is now the biggest public health issue in most of our constituencies, and that is fuelled by access to alcohol and its low price: it all goes together. That is why I very much welcome clause 11, particularly subsection (4), which defines, from paragraphs (a) to (g), exactly what is meant by personal, social, health and economic education. In terms of public health, we must be hard-nosed and realistic about the temptations faced by young people on our streets in our constituencies on Friday and Saturday nights, with large volumes of alcohol, binge drinking and irresponsibility all around. That can lead only to the A and E department of a hospital, where one will find, if one asks people quietly, that on a Saturday night they receive teenage girls who have had between 20 and 30 units of alcohol over a period of four or five hours, and who are legless and likely to have engaged in sexual activity that has been dangerous for them. In all this, do we not usually blame the girls? Is it not those bad gals who cause all the trouble because they are the ones who get pregnant and cause all the teenage pregnancies? In fact, it is the young men who cause the trouble, not the girls, and it is time that we addressed that. I hope that the Bill will lead to a huge improvement in the quality of education of our young people that takes on board the importance of educating young men, just as much as young women, about their social responsibilities and relationships.

I mention in parenthesis a remarkable phenomenon that should be happening right across the country—the emergence of street pastors. I helped to launch a street pastor scheme in Salisbury last autumn. These people are not busybodies who wish to go about preaching to young people—far from it. They want to be there quietly to help at critical moments at times of critical decisions when young people—it is usually young people, but not exclusively—have had a little more to drink than they should and have to decide whether to stop or how far to go. For those young people to find alongside them experienced, trained people to whom they can talk is proving to be a great benefit, certainly in Salisbury and I believe elsewhere.

I commend the report on alcohol published last week by the Select Committee on Health, because that, too, recognises the significance of cheap alcohol. I have come to the conclusion over all these years—Parliament has been discussing this for 26 years, to my certain knowledge—that we have gone much too far in making alcohol cheap and more widely available. We will not address this problem satisfactorily until we go for minimum unit pricing, and we will have to start to restrict the number of outlets and police the whole thing much better. If one asks any police force, certainly mine in Salisbury—Salisbury, for goodness' sake: that wonderful, safe, beautiful city, which has so few problems compared with most—one will find that 80 per cent. of crime is still committed by people with alcohol-related intent. That is the bottom line, and we really must do something about it.

Then we come to the whole question of the education of our children and how we can best get it across. I make a plea that this Government, in their dying days, and the incoming Government carry on from where my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath started in bearing in mind the intellectual approach to take towards education. Before rushing into the thicket of undergrowth and muddle that is in the Bill, the House should bear in mind that British education is still the envy of the world, that English is still the most important language in the world, and that it is our duty to future generations to uphold the primacy of ideas over regulation. It is our duty, as a nation, to guard with pride the intellectual endeavour of western Christendom and western civilisation, and that depends on the quality of our education.

7.15 pm

Caroline Flint (Don Valley) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key). I remember that when I was Public Health Minister there was much that we could agree on, as in his speech today, as regards young people and their health, opportunities and aspirations in life.

I am pleased to speak in the debate on the Second Reading of the Children, Schools and Families Bill. As an MP of 13 years, I have seen a lot of changes in my constituency. Back in 1997, our aspiration was just to get indoor toilets in so many of our schools with dilapidated buildings and terrible outside toilets that were not a joy for the pupils, the teachers or the cleaning staff. Since that time, we have seen the refurbishment of very many schools, with more than £100 million spent on new school buildings. We have three new secondary academies and four specialist schools. We have seen improvements across Doncaster, although I would be the first to admit that there is still some way to go. In 1998, 34 per cent. of our pupils got five A to C-grade GCSEs. If one compares that with the proportion in 2009—71 per cent.—there is no doubt that there have been changes, not only through resources but reforms that have meant that the outcomes and prospects for many children in Don Valley and Doncaster are better than they were some years ago.

The Bill tries to look further at how we get the right balance between rights and responsibilities, not only for schools and staff but for pupils and parents. I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench on seeking further to address these important issues. As a former member of the Education and Employment Committee, as it was then, I know only too well how important leadership is in schools. Under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Margaret Hodge), we undertook an inquiry into the role of the head teacher in that context. To be honest, nothing changes—the head teacher's role as leader of a school was as important then as it was decades before, and it is as important today as it will be in future. More support should be given to head teachers in tackling underperforming teachers in their schools. If that is not done, it does not serve the school, the pupils or their parents, and it certainly does not serve other teachers who are having to cover for those who are not up to the job.

[Caroline Flint]

A lot has already been said—I will not repeat it—about pupil and parent guarantees and home-school agreements. I think I understand why my right hon. and hon. Friends want to enshrine guarantees for pupils and parents in our communities, which is a worthy aspiration. However, I am concerned about how they will be enforced and understood by pupils and parents, and about exactly what would trigger the point at which a parent might go to the local government ombudsman to tackle an issue they are worried about. Alongside that, I am concerned about the time taken and the number of cases that the ombudsman might have to take on. Over several years as an MP, I have had to work on behalf of constituents with the local government ombudsman, and I know that they are not exactly underworked in the number of cases that they have to take up in a whole host of other areas. I hope that that will get further attention in Committee.

On home-school agreements, as a parent rather than as an MP I have seen three children go through GCSEs, A-levels and degrees under a Labour Government, and two are currently looking to do postgraduate qualifications as well. Before that, I happened to have them attending a school that was already providing home-school agreements, which the Government of the time had not enshrined in law. The agreements are important, as it is important for a parent when their child starts a school, whether primary or secondary, to have a baseline of what is expected from them and their children. They should also know what they can expect from the school, both in standards of education and in pastoral support, which is very important for children's well-being.

I am concerned about where home-school agreements are going and how much more work might be needed to personalise each one to meet the needs of every child. Hon. Members have outlined that concern in this debate. As a parent, I hope that when it comes to the educational needs of my children, and those of my constituents and of every parent in the country, that personalised attention takes place through their form tutor in each year group. Parents engage in their child's education in different ways, such as through the parents' meetings that they should have and the information that they receive about their child's success or otherwise. That should be an ongoing process, and I am concerned that we may be trying to mix that up with home-school agreements too much.

Another point that I wish to make about home-school agreements was made to me by a head teacher in my constituency recently. Clarity is needed about the consequences for those parents who do not abide by their responsibilities. In most schools, as the agreements stand, an overwhelming majority of parents fulfil what is expected of them. A very small minority do not, and that could be to do with attendance at school, supporting the improvement in their child's behaviour and so on. Head teachers tell me they do not really know where they should go and what they should do when that breaks down completely. The Bill mentions the courts and parenting orders, but some of the head teachers to whom I have talked do not realise that they can already use parenting orders. We need to ensure that where they already have powers, they know how to use them appropriately.

The matter needs attention, and a parenting order, parenting contract or acceptable behaviour contract—whatever we want to call it—may be necessary. At the moment, as with all sorts of matters to do with rights and responsibilities, the question is what to do when the responsibilities are not taken on and what sanctions there are to make a parent engage. The vast majority of parents do so, even those who are having difficulties and challenges with their children, but some refuse, and teachers often feel that there is not a lot they can do.

The new duty on local authorities requires them proactively to seek parents' views on the range and quality of secondary school places in their area. I am interested in that, and I understand that it is focused on the year 5 age group. Perhaps there is something to be said for asking parents of children in other year groups, who have already gone into secondary education, what they think about the experience and the choice.

I was concerned recently when I took up a case on behalf of a Catholic primary school in my constituency. The local education authority was going to cease to provide funds for buses for the children from that school in Edlington, a deprived area by anyone's measures, to go to a local Catholic secondary school. I understand that there have also been cuts in bus services to other schools. There are four specialist schools in my constituency, and part of the role of specialist schools was to offer children who excelled in a particular specialism the opportunity to go to them. If local authorities cut the means of transport to them, what choice is there for those children's parents? That needs to be attended to.

I very much support the idea that schools should consider supporting the wider community and be able to use their delegated budgets to invest in doing so. Given the amount of money that has gone into improving our schools and building new ones, it seems only right that we should see them in the context of the wider community. There should be opportunities for other community organisations to benefit from a school's facilities, but also to help schools and work with them on the issue of families in the community. There are other community organisations that can help the staff of schools provide better for their pupils.

I would also like schools to have an opportunity to have far more control over their finances in planning ahead. There have been headlines recently about the number of schools sitting on reserves. I shall not justify or defend schools that sit on huge amounts of money that could be better spent in their school community, but there are times when a school has to plan ahead for its needs, for example when year groups are changing and a large number of children are coming into the school because of the number of births locally. That will have an impact on spending in that school and the number of staff it needs to employ. In one year, school numbers might go up—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

7.25 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I must confess that I find the Bill, and particularly the provisions for the regulation of home schooling, deeply troubling. I am sure that many Members will raise the issue, so I shall endeavour to be brief.

Education is the gateway to a better world. Nothing should be done to prevent children from flourishing and learning in the environment best suited to them, in school or out. As many Members on both sides of the House have acknowledged, education is primarily a parent's responsibility, not that of the Government. It is up to parents to select the form of education most beneficial to their children. For a variety of reasons, the schools system is not for everyone. Some just choose the home; others fear bullying or the increasing size of schools and the associated problems, and some children are not allowed to thrive within the system.

Although every child must receive an education, schools are not the only way to deliver it. Obviously, such a gap can be filled by the work of parents through home schooling their children. It is estimated that between 20,000 and 80,000 are currently home schooled. Though some may disagree, I argue that home educators understand the responsibility placed on them. They understand that the responsibility for a child's schooling falls on nobody but the parents. Unfortunately, in yet another example of a Government obsessed with conformity, the independence that home educators currently enjoy is to be placed under threat. The plans in clause 26 to ensure that home educators conform with the requirements of the national syllabus will stamp out the individuality that many home-educated children cherish. Is not the whole point of home schooling the provision of an alternative channel for education?

Before Christmas I met a group of constituents, all home educators, who were concerned about the recommendations of the Badman report. I also met some of their children, who were some of the most articulate and erudite young people I have met. Most of the parents spoke of having schedules for teaching, but in keeping with educational flexibility so as to best fit a child's needs. One of them told me of her son spontaneously developing a liking for Roman history. Because she retained responsibility for her son's best interests, she was able to take a trip to a Roman villa the next week. Such a trip would have been impossible under the annual education plans that the Bill may well set in stone. If modern society has taught us anything, it is that we have to acknowledge everyone's uniqueness. The Bill appears designed to move us in the opposite direction.

My other concern revolves around the level to which the Bill extends the state yet further into people's lives. One of its provisions is to allow local education authorities, when neither child nor parent objects, to interview home-schooled children on their own. The phrasing of that part of the Bill, particularly the use of the word "may", has been constructed far too loosely to be of reliable guidance. How can a measure confer a power on a local authority without detailing the full criteria for fulfilling that responsibility? Furthermore, under the Bill, interviews will be conducted in "a place where education is provided to the child".

From a civil liberties perspective, that paints a dangerous picture of approving authorities' incursion into private homes.

What would be the consequences of a parent's not consenting at any stage to a child's being interviewed on their own? Such interviews may place the child in a distressing environment. They also underline the contradictions at the heart of the Government's approach. Pupils are not interviewed about teachers, so why should sons and daughters be interviewed about their mothers and fathers? Furthermore, interviewing children alone gives the impression that parents are not to be trusted or have done something wrong. Indeed, the level at which the Government aim to monitor parent-child relationships is tantamount to saying that a parent willing to spend time with their child is somehow in the wrong.

Such intrusiveness into parents' lives is bad enough, but the detrimental effects on children's education and well-being are even more dangerous. The Government seriously need to reconsider the case for granting the new powers and requirements—not only the powers, but the Government's perspective on the issue. I understand the Government's wish to achieve the best for everyone, but their methods simply do not work.

Before attending to home education, the Government must first deal with those already in the system who do not achieve as they should. They should tackle those who are absent from education partially or altogether. Too many bright futures have been sucked into the mire of destructive social circumstances. The Bill is directed at the wrong children in the wrong fashion.

Indeed, no Bill has dealt successfully with those who have sex when under 16. Conception rates for those under 16 have increased from 7.8 to 8.3 per 1,000, which is 8,200 pregnancies. Those children are far too young to become parents.

Of course, I am aware that children's well-being is one of the Bill's motivations. The Government are concerned that home schooling may be used as a cover for child abuse or forced marriages. Certainly, that must be dealt with, but in a far more consultative manner. Greater consideration must be given to the vast majority of home-schooled children who benefit immensely from their parents' dedicated work.

A scheme of self-regulation, rather than imposed conformity, is the best way to balance children's education with children's safety. One must not be sacrificed for the other, because education is the gateway to a better world. The longer we prevaricate on the most fundamental decisions and the longer we institute misguided legislation such as the Bill, the longer we deny the next generation the greatest opportunity to realise their fullest potential.

7.33 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): When I first examined the Bill, it made me consider how best to assess a measure on Second Reading. I have the advantage of chairing the Children, Schools and Families Committee, and therefore the further advantage of considering, in the past two years, the three main pillars on which educational reform was founded 20 years ago. My remarks today are in that context.

We have considered testing and assessment and the national curriculum and, last week, we published our report on school accountability. The Bill is about all those matters. The measure is a bit of curate's egg. All Governments should learn that legislation is best when it has been tested and piloted or, if not, given to people who genuinely know about the subject so that they can conduct an independent inquiry. Even better, if there is time, is a pre-legislative inquiry by the Select Committee. We have not conducted such an inquiry on the Bill.

Let me comment quickly on some long overdue aspects, beginning with the special educational needs provisions. The Lamb inquiry was set up by the then Education and Skills Committee, predecessor of our current Committee. It made strong recommendations on special educational needs and was a fine report—I think that one member of that Committee is still in the Chamber this evening. We made strong recommendations for giving special educational needs students a proper chance so that they are not faced with a patchwork of provision throughout the country, with provision depending on where they happen to live. Some students and families were getting the right support while others got poor support.

[Mr. Barry Sheerman]

I note that the Bill does not contain something to which we always thought we would go back—one never has time to revert to all the things that one discovers when conducting an inquiry. It is the dreadful lack of capacity, support and opportunity for special educational needs students when they get to 16. That is crucial. The ages of 16 to 18 are extremely difficult for special needs students, even when they have had a good deal, good support, been statemented and got everything that they should have. The ages of 16 to 18 are difficult, as are the ages beyond. Perhaps the Select Committee will have time to revert to that.

I was more hesitant about the reform of the primary curriculum and about including Sir Jim Rose's proposals and recommendations in legislation. Our report on the national curriculum showed that we need a much more coherent approach. People ought to know where they are travelling, starting at the earliest stage, when a child is born, and continuing right through to the ages of 18 and 19. There should be a coherent national curriculum that joins up. At the moment, we have bits of curriculum and great disjunctions in it. The most famous happens at the age of 11, but they happen even at seven, and then at 16 and 18. A person setting out on the journey of life and education is not, even with best endeavours, offered a curriculum that makes sense to both the child and the parent.

Jim Rose conducted an inquiry on the primary national curriculum, and there was also the Cambridge inquiry, which the Government did not like as much, but neither inquiry was right. The results did not mesh with what comes afterwards or with the important foundation stage, which the Select Committee supports wholeheartedly. Bits of the curriculum for specific years are taken, an inquiry is conducted and proposals are made, without seeing those bits as part of one offering.

Most of us agree that putting personal, social, health and economic education on the timetable is a good idea. I am not sure whether it should be in the national curriculum; when we examined the national curriculum, we said it was overfull. We pointed out that academies had much more choice and flexibility and could choose their priorities after the basic subjects had been included in the national curriculum. We asked why, if that approach was good enough for them, it was not good enough for the rest of the schools.

The national curriculum is too full. Although I like the idea of everyone having decent PSHE education, simply placing it in a compulsory curriculum, which is already full, without changing it and granting more flexibility, is worrying. Ken Boston once told me that the trouble with PSHE and things like it is that they are given to the gym teacher with the gammy knee to teach. We need high-quality people who are trained to do PSHE well if it is going to be taught to its full extent.

Mr. Allen: If we are going to have anything at all in the national curriculum, it must be the basics. Every child should be entitled to them. Hitherto, we thought that that meant maths and English, but actually, in order to learn and come to an appreciation of any academic subject, people need those basic social and emotional capabilities. Without them, the rest of the curriculum is denied to people. That is why PSHE has to be in the national curriculum—for areas such as mine and my hon. Friend's, where many people cannot access it.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend may well have won me over. What I was trying to get at is that I would have liked a real, holistic change to the national curriculum, so that the vital PSHE fits in well.

On the accountability framework, the Committee published a report on accountability last week. We looked at the matter right through from governing bodies to Ofsted and the new school report card. We found in favour of the school report card and rather liked the school improvement strategies that it underpinned. However, we also found that Governments only ever introduce new forms of accountability, and never take one away, and we are worried that there are now five levels of accountability. The Government are well intentioned and want to move away from the reliance on the publication of tables of the results of tests and examinations, and the school report card will help, but I suspect that it will not be enough to strike the balance that most people in our schools—heads and teachers—want.

Heads and teachers feel tremendous pressure from the different forms of accountability. In particular, they are very worried about accountability through Ofsted. The Committee found Ofsted to be over-large and overburdened—it has now extended into child protection—and we wonder whether an inspection over a day and a half is as good as it could be. Does a lighter-touch inspection, if it is too light, lead the Ofsted inspectors to rely much more heavily on the statistics and test results that they read on the card before they go into the school to do an assessment? The school is where the vital thing happens, but the quality of teaching in the classroom carries much less weight in the balance.

On the licence to practise, I take it that at last we have got to the stage—this seems to be the subtext—at which we have a highly regarded work force with proper qualifications and a five-year renewable licence. I believe that that is probably the way to go, but we will not get there without offering high-quality continuing professional development. Death by PowerPoint is not the way to deliver CPD. CPD must be high quality and delivered alongside that licence to practise. I suspect that part of the Government's agenda with the licence to practise will be to weed out teachers who are not up to the job, which I suppose is a very important aspect of it.

Lastly, the Committee wrote a good report on home-educated children, and the matter has been much discussed in interventions. A very significant percentage of home-educated children are wonderfully educated. I was very impressed by the parents and children I met, but I also believe that we must know where our children are. The Committee came to a compromise view. As the Government were offering a system with a compulsory register with no fines, action, penalties or sanctions, we asked them whether they should try a voluntary system for two years as an olive branch. We said that if that method did not work, the Government should go for a compulsory system.

That was a rattle through the issues. There are some good and some not-so-good provisions in the Bill, but we could say that of all Bills.

7.45 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who is an eminent Chairman of the Select Committee. I listened with great interest to what he said. He contributes a huge amount to debates on education and to Second Reading debates on education Bills.

I declare an interest as a lawyer and I shall focus on part 2 of the Bill, but I shall also say a few words about the main part of the Bill. We can of course wholeheartedly support some provisions in the Bill. For example, I support the improvement in, and widening of, the appeals system for children with special educational needs, and the idea that academies should be exempt charities. However, what the Bill reveals most starkly is the fundamental divide between the Government and the Opposition when it comes to trusting the teaching profession and professionals generally.

We trust professionals to get on with their jobs and to deliver high professional standards without the need for extremely detailed, top-down prescription. Unfortunately, the Bill is far too prescriptive, the result being that it will mean more bureaucracy and litigation, a reinforcement of the risk-averse culture, and a stifling of professional self-esteem. That very damaging approach flows through and characterises so much of the Bill. The result is that the good parts of the Bill are overshadowed by top-down micro-management.

The Government believe very firmly that Ministers and Whitehall always know best. On the other hand, my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench and I take the view that the way to raise educational standards is to reduce the target culture and bureaucracy and truly trust the profession.

My starting point on part 2 of the Bill is that the rules governing family proceedings must protect children's welfare. That is why a substantial element of privacy is essential, but there is a big difference between privacy and secrecy. Privacy means allowing reasonable access and reporting while protecting the welfare and interests of children, as happens every day in the youth courts in this country. Secrecy is a totally different matter, because it means holding proceedings completely in camera.

For a number of years, there has been growing concern about the lack of transparency and openness in the family courts. It is interesting that the campaign run by The Times in the summer of 2008 was welcomed not only by the different fathers groups, which protested vigorously, but by the legal profession, which had a big input. At the time, the president of the family division, Sir Mark Potter, and a number of eminent High Court judges, said that the lack of openness and transparency was damaging the reputation and image of the family courts. Those judges knew that they were dispensing justice to a very high standard indeed, and furthermore that the vast majority of decisions being made in the family courts were correct, but unfortunately, their reputation and that of their courts were coming under pressure and being tarnished by adverse criticism by a small minority of litigants.

Sir Mark Potter addressed the proposals for more openness and transparency in a letter at the time of the campaign. He said:

> "Not only would it enable the court's reasoning to be understood; it is likely to justify decisions in the eyes of the wider public. It will certainly ease the frustration felt by many judges that they cannot respond to criticism in the media based on one-sided accounts by aggrieved parents".

That was the view of Sir Mark Potter; what he said at that time, which was echoed by many other family judges, was absolutely spot on.

We had a whole series of consultation papers from the then Department for Constitutional Affairs, now the Ministry of Justice. We also had a number of other initiatives from the Government. The broad conclusion was that the obvious way to improve transparency and openness was to allow the press and public into family courts, albeit subject to appropriate reporting restrictions and, obviously, the ultimate discretion of the judge. We had a false start with the Government statement in 2007, when they said that they would not go as far as was originally suggested, which triggered the campaign by The Times. We then had the statement by the Secretary of State for Justice, in December 2008, when he announced that the media would be allowed to attend family hearings, subject to the discretion of the judge and reporting restrictions. He then announced that written judgments would be piloted.

I am slightly concerned about the two pilots—the first involves the magistrates courts in Leeds and the magistrates courts and county courts in Cardiff, the second the magistrates courts and county courts in Wolverhampton. Anonymised judgments and reasons will be placed in the public domain, which is something for which we have argued for some time. However, it is incredibly important to get the details correct and ensure a proper and comprehensive evaluation of the pilots. I am slightly concerned that the Bill is moving too quickly and that we should have a chance to conduct a proper evaluation of those pilots before moving to the next legislative stage, with the provisions in the Bill.

As I have mentioned, I broadly support most of part 2 of the Bill. However, I am concerned that many of the revisions are incredibly complex. I declared an interest as a lawyer at the start of this brief contribution, but I had to read the various clauses and the explanatory notes, as well as talk to friends at the family Bar, to get a handle on those revisions, which are very complex. I support what the Secretary of State said about the phasing and the sunset review, but the scope and effect of the revisions are, in places, most uncertain. Unfortunately, the simplicity, clarity and workability of the youth court model has not been followed or emulated in the Bill. It is interesting to read what the Newspaper Society, the Society of Editors, the Press Association, ITN and the BBC said in their recent letter to MPs:

> "If journalists are not confident in the application of the rules, they may be deterred from reporting the family courts at all and the central objective of this entire project—greater public accountability and scrutiny—may be" put at risk. This is not an attempt to volunteer to serve on the Committee, but there is certainly a great deal of scope for making the provisions less complex and more easily understood.

[Mr. Henry Bellingham]

I want to say a quick word about the default position contained in clause 32(2), which is that unless it is specifically exempted by the Bill, any publication could be in contempt of court. Surely that is the wrong way round. Surely it would be better to reverse that default judgment, so that there was a presumption in favour of all instances of such information being published, unless prohibited by the court. After all, that is exactly what will apply to the publication of orders. I see no logic in saying that the same should not apply to the publication of judgments. Perhaps the Minister could comment on that in his winding-up speech.

On the anonymity provisions, obviously it is essential that minors and certain other individuals should be subject to anonymity. However, my reading of the Bill is that it extends anonymity to all parties involved or referred to in proceedings, other than paid, professional expert witnesses. Surely automatic anonymity should be limited to the key parties, with the judge having the discretion to extend that more widely if need be. I very much hope that the Minister will look into that issue and that it might be picked up in Committee. Perhaps he could also talk to his colleagues in the Ministry of Justice about the pressure that the extra requirements of the anonymity framework are likely to put on Her Majesty's Courts Service. Will it require extra resources? What effect will that pressure have?

The Government originally said that they would not reverse Clayton v. Clayton. However, it is my understanding that the Bill will do just that. Could the Minister also comment on that in his winding-up speech?

It is vital that the concerns of the many organisations involved, such as Resolution and the Law Society, are considered and dealt with. It is important that we should get part 2 right, because it is hugely significant. We owe it to a vulnerable part of the community—the children who appear in the courts—to ensure that part 2 is well crafted and has the support of as many people as possible working in the courts.

7.55 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow my friend, the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham). He delivers his speeches like he plays his cricket, with a stout defence and the occasional flashing, brilliant shot, but also with the tendency to take his eye off the ball on occasions—a tendency that I shall avoid the temptation to take advantage of this evening, because we are discussing such a serious issue, particularly for my constituents.

I represent a constituency that sends the fewest number of kids to college and university, has the highest teenage pregnancy rate in western Europe, and has profound and severe problems of deprivation. That is why, for me, the most important thing in the Bill is what I would call the life skills part—the part dealing with teaching our babies, children, primary children and secondary young people the importance of some of the basics that most of us here learned at our mother and father's knees. Many of those skills—the basic social and emotional capabilities—are not in place in constituencies such as mine. If they are not there, we have a choice: either we can spend billions of pounds on remedial action when things go wrong, complain about the problem, turn our teachers into crowd control experts, put money into our courts and magistrates courts, and pay for people to spend a lifetime on welfare benefits; or we can do something about the problem. The great thing that the Bill does is take another step towards having the capability to help young people when they need it.

PSHE, as it is called—we really have to do something about that; we should change the name to something that means something to people on the ground, such as "life skills"—is not, on its own, a magic bullet; it is part of a package of early-intervention measures. In Nottingham, we have been fortunate enough to put a number of those measures in place, but we need the rest of the jigsaw. Those children need to know that they can access the great world of learning because they have the skills and capabilities to do so—the skill to listen, the skill to pay attention, the skill to be self-disciplined, the ability to reconcile arguments without violence, the ability to aspire to learn, and the ability to want to get qualifications and go on and get a decent job. That is why the Bill is so important.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the skills that he is describing demand a highly professional delivery and highly trained members of staff?

Mr. Allen: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is why the first thing that we did in, effectively, our pilot—we are piloting the idea before the Government have introduced the legislation, through our 11-to-16 life skills programme, which I was fortunate enough to be instrumental in establishing, as chair of the local strategic partnership—was to dedicate some £400,000, from a very small budget, for basic training, so that the basic materials were in place. That was so that the teachers were not, as someone said earlier, teaching those basics after lessons in the gymnasium or running stuff off the photocopier, but understood the aim and were trained and passionate about ensuring that all young people had those basics in place.

In addition, leaving aside a bit of petty partisanship from all parts of the House, I would like to say a few words of thanks—not in the normal way, perhaps—to the Front Benchers for the serious way in which they have debated the issue and, except for a bit of fraying around the edges on sex and relationship education, for the basic consensus on the fact that we need all our kids to have those fundamental life skills in order to take advantage of education. I commend the way in which all Front Benchers have done that. I should also like to add a little historical footnote to the debate, by mentioning the debt that we all owe to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) for his work on this brief. He worked very hard to ensure that it was going to be part of the Bill, and he deserves our commendation for that.

I say all this not because I am soft, non-partisan and not in favour of my own party's viewpoint on various issues, but because of one simple fact: if we ever break the intergenerational cycle of deprivation in this country, that achievement will not be the property of just one party—the Labour party, the Conservative party, the Liberal party or any of the minority parties. All will have to be signed up to the consensus on giving every child the abilities that will enable that child to make the best of himself or herself. I think that we are quite close to achieving that.

There was a period when the debate revolved around one side saying that the other side wanted to hug hoodies, and the other side retorting that their opponents wanted to put antisocial behaviour orders on embryos. However, the level of maturity in the debate over the past two or three years has been to the great credit of Members in the House and to the spokespeople here who have taken this issue much further than we thought we might have done. What is it that we have taken further? It is the process of early intervention, and the laying down of the bedrock that will enable all kids to do well, as part of a complete raft of measures, rather than just as a one-off.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend realise that one of the biggest factors among parents is low expectations, bridled with the celebrity culture in our society, which allows young people to think that they can get on in life by becoming a celebrity rather than by determined hard work?

Mr. Allen: There are many things that flow from having effective social and emotional capabilities. That will impact on teenage pregnancy, and it will impact massively on aspiration. A young person who is rounded, self-confident and aware of their ability to interact with others will make much more of themselves than a child who is not, often through no fault of their own but perhaps through ineffective parenting in the early years. A child who has those capabilities will aspire, seek employment, and have the desire to attain educational qualifications, and will not get into trouble with the bad lads or get involved in vandalism and antisocial behaviour. We must give those children that most precious, lifelong gift, to enable them to do the best for themselves. That is the absolute antithesis of the nanny state. The proposals represent an important step towards achieving that, and the Government are to be commended for introducing them.

I want briefly to respond to a point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint). She described the desperation of reaching the end of the line with some parents, and the necessity of imposing a parenting order. I hope that I am not putting words into her mouth, but is it not a kind of failure to have reached that point? I do not want to suggest that I am waving a magic wand, but we need to get to those kids and their parents earlier than that point of failure, because penalising them is not the way to make progress. If we can get to them much earlier, they will be able to make their own way.

Caroline Flint: I totally agree with my hon. Friend. I was very proud to be involved in one of the trailblazer Sure Start projects, but the fact is that we do not start with a level playing field. Some parents are out of control in their approach to parenting, compared with what we accept as the norm, and something has to be done about that small minority who are working against the school and the wider community.

Mr. Allen: That is why this issue is intergenerational, and why we must look at the new-born of today as the parents of tomorrow, and help them to become the great parents of tomorrow who will, in turn, raise good kids. That is something that we all have to share.

My hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws)—I will call him my hon. Friend—talked about one-to-one tuition and when that approach should be taken. I am not privy to the nuances of Government policy, but I know that if we are going to do one-to-one tuition, we should do it early, not late. We should not give one-to-one tuition to the 16-year-old who is banged up in a secure unit; we should give it to the 16-month-old who could otherwise become that child later on. We should get to work early on one to one, if there is a choice. I think that the Government have got that right, although I wish that we could extend the provision across the whole age range. If a choice has to be made, however, it must be that one.

I was talking to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) about life skills before we came into the Chamber—[HON. MEMBERS: "Surely not!"] I have no secrets to tell. I hope that he will not mind my repeating that we are not just talking about sex and relationship education, or about financial capability, or about the things that are in the current PHSE curriculum. I am talking about something much more fundamental—namely, the basic ability to interact, to have empathy with other people, and to sit and listen and learn. That is what I mean by social and emotional skills. I hope that I went halfway towards convincing him that those things make a much richer, more fundamental contribution to what we can all become. That, in turn, can make English, maths and all the other academic subjects much more accessible.

I hope that I can blow the trumpet for my own city of Nottingham. We started teaching life skills for 11 to 16-year-olds a year before this legislation was introduced. We started in six of the 14 secondary schools, and it is proving to be a great success. We did the training first, as my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) pointed out, and there are many lessons that I hope we can learn from Nottingham. Perhaps my Front-Bench colleagues will come up and see how we are training, consulting the students, and allowing local variations so that we can hand-make the local curriculum. Yes, it is compulsory, but we must ensure that the curriculum for a special school is different from one for a pupil referral unit or for a conventional secondary school. All abilities need to be involved. All our agencies are involved, we are piloting this effectively and we have effective evaluation in place. We think that the Government could learn from Nottingham, and we wish them well with these proposals.

8.8 pm

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who made a thoughtful, thought-provoking and excellent speech. We can all agree with him, and I know that he has the best interests of children and young people at heart.

I should like to echo the remarks made earlier, and to send my condolences to the family of the late Member for North-West Leicestershire. He was an independent and fearless parliamentarian, and he will be genuinely thought of with great affection across the House for many years to come.

[Mr. Elfyn Llwyd]

A number of hon. Members have already mentioned the Badman review, so I shall talk about it only briefly. It strikes a slightly discordant note, in that some of it has the taste of the nanny state about it. I was asked recently what plans the Welsh Assembly might have to use the new powers granted in the Bill. They will relate to England only, and could be introduced by Measure in Wales if the National Assembly believe that to be appropriate. My understanding is that there will be an early debate on this issue in the Assembly, but I believe that it will take a rather distinctive approach, in line with Welsh education policy. One of the first things that the Assembly did was to abolish standard assessment tests—SATs—and it was quite right to do so. I believe that there will be an in-depth consultation and that Badman will not be put into effect, at least in that manner, in Wales.

As hon. Members know, there has been a groundswell of concern about the Badman report. On 8 December, I presented to Parliament a petition on behalf of my constituents, and on that very day no fewer than 16 other petitions were presented. At the moment, I believe that there are 43 petitions about the Badman report. This is a live issue of great concern to many of our constituents.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I heartily congratulate the hon. Gentleman on what he said about Wales not following the Government's draconian measures after the Badman report. On one day alone, more than 120 petitions from 120 different constituencies were presented in addition to those presented on other days from all around the country.

Mr. Llwyd: That rather diminishes my 46, but it does underline the great concern about the issue. I am sure that changes will be made to the current proposals in Committee—I sincerely hope so, as there is no grave concern about the standard of home education: quite the reverse. I went to university with people who had been home educated and they were probably the brightest people I ever met. They are high flyers today and they are probably home educating their own children in turn. I see no need to wield a big stick in that area.

Welsh people, of course, have a great regard for the liberation that education provides. I went to a university, Aberystwyth university college. It was built on public subscription; the one in Bangor was built from the odd pennies and ha'pennies from the rather poor quarrymen in the local area. We know how important education is and how liberating it can be.

I really believe that there are some good parts to the Bill, but there are also some rather strange parts. On the youth justice provisions, I would advocate the transfer of the relevant powers to Wales. The inclusion of youth justice within the education and young people's portfolio at the Welsh Assembly seems to make sense. In the jigsaw of society, there are a great number of interlocking pieces, where decisions made in one field influence outcomes in another. It does not make sense for a Welsh education system to introduce one set of values, evidenced by the play-based foundation phase for young children and the 14-to-19 Welsh baccalaureate schemes for teenagers, and then have to make do with a criminal justice system that does not adhere to the values we would like to see reflected in it.

My party is not the only one saying it. The Howard League, a renowned think-tank, recently concluded in its paper "Thinking beyond the prison bars":

> "The current Whitehall-led option of imprisoning such a high proportion of vulnerable children in unsafe circumstances cannot be acceptable…Despite the limited effectiveness of the criminal justice system as a lever to tackle youth crime, it seems somewhat perverse that the Assembly has access to the social welfare lever but not the criminal justice lever. If the Assembly had control of both levers then it would have the ability to move finances between the two accordingly. Money currently spent on ineffective prisons could be transferred to bolster prevention and social welfare strategies", many of which we have heard about already. The league also drew attention to the fact that because of lack of provision, most Welsh children who find themselves in custody are held in England, far from their families. This is not simply a matter of logistics, but of culture, language and other difficulties that come along with them.

It is the responsibility of Governments to determine the exact policy, but Plaid Cymru would like an urgent debate on the devolution of youth justice to Wales. A think-piece entitled "Safer Communities", which we published in 2008, argued that in the provision of youth justice in Wales, we could learn from the example of Finland. That country has a very small number of children in custody. Instead, there is a wide variety of psychiatric and care provision to deal with behavioural problems at an early stage, which as we heard is crucial.

A comparative analysis of young people in trouble in Wales and in Finland found that Finland had smaller numbers of young offenders locked up. It accommodates very large numbers of children and young people in non-custodial residential centres of one type or another. Those include youth homes, children's homes, and interestingly, family-group homes. By far the largest number—almost 4,000—are also assisted with psychiatric problems and so forth. If England and Wales had the same number of psychiatric beds per head of population as Finland, there would be approximately 40,000. In Wales, there would be 2,220, but there are currently, in fact, only 28.

It appears that concern about child and adolescent mental health in Finland has eclipsed concerns about youth crime, and it would follow from this that behaviour that might be viewed as criminal in England and Wales might well be dealt with in Finland first and foremost as a form of disorder, or at least as something that should be addressed outside the criminal justice system.

We would like to see greater use of reparation orders—in other words, orders made in the civil courts that require the perpetrator to repair the damage that their behaviour has caused—of child safety orders for children under 10 years of age who have shown behavioural problems, of acceptable behaviour contracts and so forth. Provision for those orders is made in the Children Act 2001, but little use is made of them because, I understand, social services departments are understaffed and often underfunded.

Those tools should be expanded to include both mentoring of young people by older role models in the community and conferencing to bring youths, their families and relevant agencies together to discuss the young person's problem behaviour in order to find the causes and try to fix them. The most important issue is that the system should be child-centred and work for the benefit of the community. It is very clear from the high reoffending rate and the number of people who go from youth custody of one form or another to adult custody that we must look at alternative means of dealing with the problem.

To conclude, in discussing the devolution of youth justice to the Welsh Assembly, I have welcomed the acceptance that youth justice is included as part of society's contract with young people rather than part of the adult criminal justice system. I have also offered suggestions about the route that might be taken by a Welsh youth justice system if were we given the powers—and, of course, the funding—to implement them. There is a growing chorus of voices in Wales to devolve those powers, which could be achieved. I hope that the Minister will pay some attention to this particular plea when he responds to the debate.

8.18 pm

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am intrigued by the debate we have had so far, which I have tried to place in the context of things that I have watched happen in my constituency since I was first elected in 1992. One of the first things I looked at in respect of education in the area was the desperate need to raise the ambitions of young people. That fits in with many of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen).

It is critical for the House to focus on education and to ask whether the Bill enhances what is happening locally. I shall put the Bill in the context of developments in my constituency that have brought positive benefits for the life chances of my constituents, how that has spilled over into trends in the area and whether the Bill improves the situation.

The first major change was the development of a series of new primary schools. One of the best-managed private finance initiatives—I do not mind being bipartisan about it; it was brilliantly managed—was led by what was then Tory-controlled Cheshire county council, working in partnership with all the key customers including the young people themselves. It made a difference: that group of children felt that the school really did belong to them. The initiative, together with Sure Start, began to change the life chances of young people, and I have seen it develop.

More recently, last September, we created a new academy, the University academy. It is the result of a fantastic partnership between Chester university, the local diocese and two secondary schools that have been merged. The close partnership with the university sector has resulted in new builds for both the academy and a further education college. Even in the few months involved, it has made a number of young people ask themselves a question about university: what is this mysterious place to which very few have aspired? It has already made a difference, and I commend it.

I am pleased to see that my hon. Friend the Minister for Schools and Learners has returned to the Chamber. When he visited the academy, he witnessed the leadership that, after only a few months, is already starting to make a difference. He also witnessed the results of a different Labour investment when he visited Hammond school. I am sure he will recall the extraordinary talent of young people who had benefited from the specialist investment in dance and drama that had enabled state-funded pupils to get into that elite school. All that investment has transformed the life chances of people in my constituency, who are beginning to believe that they can do better than their predecessors.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who knows my constituency, will be aware that there were periods when we had massive unemployment among people in their mid-teens, partly owing to recessions and technological change in the big manufacturing areas back in the mid-1980s. The children of that generation are now starting to aspire towards something different, and that is encouraging in itself. I view the Bill in the context of what is happening now. The most important of the guarantees mentioned in clause 1, to which no one has referred today, is the pupil ambition

"for all pupils to go to schools where there is good behaviour, strong discipline, order and safety".

That returns us to the heart of what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, and it must be seen in the context of a two-way trade. Students cannot attend a school at which they expect to enjoy good behaviour around them unless they are part of it themselves. We must work hard to ensure that a programme of that kind is enshrined in legislation as soon as possible.

My second point relates to 21st-century schools. They need investment, and I believe that unless the investment programmes that I described earlier continue into the foreseeable future, it will not be possible for that part of the Bill to be delivered either. We need continued state investment, together with the ambitions set out in the Bill. Perhaps I can plug something to the Secretary of State. He visited a brilliant high school in my constituency in the week of the TUC conference last September, and saw the marvellous work being done in a shambolic set of buildings in Neston. I hope that the Government will move that school further up the list in the Building Schools for the Future programme.

As we have heard, the Bill also deals with home education. I too have received representations, and my petition on the subject was presented by the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), for which I am grateful. There have been some misapprehensions and misconceptions about the Bill. Proposed new section 19E in schedule 1 makes it clear that there is no requirement for children to attend sessions on their own with a representative of the local education authority. I would have objected strongly had there been any suggestion that a child could be required to attend such a meeting. There is an absolute right of objection in the draft provision, and I consider that very important.

Mr. Graham Stuart: I do not think that that guarantee is terribly absolute. Although a parent may object to the inspector's entering the home to speak to the child, he or she may then be deemed to have been unco-operative in terms of one of the visits that is required, in which event the right to educate the child at home may be revoked. I would not be taken in by the superficial appearance of the provision.

Andrew Miller: I am not a lawyer, but proposed new section 19E includes the words

"unless the child or a parent of the child objects".

[Andrew Miller]

Proposed new section 19G which I should like to be strengthened a little in Committee—states that the regulations "may"—I think the word ought to be "should"—provide for the provision in new subsection (2)(b) enabling an extension of the registration period to be automatic in the event of an unwarranted draconian action of the kind described by the hon. Gentleman. I think that it is possible to find solutions.

Mr. Stuart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew Miller: Very briefly.

Mr. Stuart: Proposed new section 19F(1)(e) states that a local authority may revoke a registration

> "by reason of a failure to co-operate with the authority in arrangements made by them under section 19E".

We need reassurance if we are to believe that parents will not be penalised.

Andrew Miller: I have referred the hon. Gentleman to proposed new section 19G, which concerns appeals. The regulations should, in my view, provide for the registration to continue automatically in the event of an appeal.

Finally, I wish to say a few words about special educational needs. In the old county council structure in Cheshire, a significant number of SEN appeals were conducted at a very high level by volunteers. People with little or no means were reliant upon the voluntary sector to make representations on behalf of their child within the appeals mechanisms. At the opposite, more wealthy, end of the county, however, people were represented by highly qualified lawyers. That cannot be right. We must have equality in the SEN appeals process. The right of access for those children whose cases need representation must be absolute, and there must also be fairness in the quality of that representation. Whatever the detail of the steps that will be taken to strengthen the process, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will ensure that children of all backgrounds have both a right of access and the right to the same quality of representation.

This is an important Bill that builds upon the building blocks to which I have referred, and I hope that when it passes through Committee, it will emerge as a measure that helps to build further upon those building blocks. On that basis, I support the Bill.

8.31 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am unsure whether my voice or my time will run out first, but I hope to concentrate on three issues: home education; personal, social and health education; and family courts.

Schedule 1 to the Bill deals with the registration and monitoring of home-educated children, and it follows on from the Badman report, which gave rise to a significant number of concerns among home educators, who have done a fantastic job in lobbying parliamentarians. The right to interview children alone is a particular concern. The Government have listened, but it is clear from the debate that there are still significant concerns. If in Committee we can provide more reassurance that there will not be a heavy-handed lever for local authorities to use if they are not happy with what is going on, that will be welcomed by all.

There are also concerns that the safeguarding agenda has been over-emphasised compared with education. Actually, the balance of words in the Badman report shows that that is probably not the case. Nevertheless, it was felt that part of the Badman report brief was to look at safeguarding. If a Government have restrictive measures in place and protect their own back, they can say, "But we did all of this to try to prevent such an event from happening." There is a timidity in just allowing people to get on with their own lives, because I am not aware of a huge problem. That is not to say that one day there might be a problem, but that will be an exception rather than the rule. We seem to be legislating for something that might happen in very exceptional circumstances.

Registration is key. It would be welcomed more if families were convinced that they would receive help and support. There is to be some money for home educators, but it is unclear whether that will go towards the cost of local education authority bureaucracy, or whether some of it will go towards helping home educators provide things, such as science equipment if that is what their children are interested in. The crux of the matter is that many people feel that this is a licence to interfere and the whole move is representative of a societal attitude that seeks to quantify and standardise everything.

Proposed new section 19E does not reassure, as proposed new subsection (1)(a) allows LEAs to determine whether the education is suitable. Many children are home educated because they were not thriving in the state system and their parents made a positive decision to home educate. Indeed, the siblings of some of the children I met were perfectly happily in the state education system; their parents had made a specific decision about one child, not for reasons of dogma or because they thought they knew best, but because that was what was best for that particular child. It is important to bear that in mind. During the recess, I met a number of home-educated children and I was struck by the breadth and variety of the learning experiences made available to them by committed parents. The concern is that some well-meaning local education authority officer with the bog-standard training will insist on changes so that the national curriculum of the day is more closely adhered to at home.

The problem with the education system, which I have been following for many years, is that it suffers from fads. Such fads have included the literacy hour and the numeracy hour, which the Secretary of State does not seem to like very much because he is getting rid of them. Over the years opinions have changed as to the best way to teach children to read, but the reality is that although there may be an overall "best way", some children learn in different ways. A good teacher will adapt to that, and home-educating parents are doing exactly the same, by adapting to what their children need. I hope that reassurances can be given in Committee on this issue.

On personal, social and health education, I fully support both what the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said about needing to get rid of that term and talk instead about "life skills", and the provisions in the Bill. I served on the Select Committee on Health in 2002, when it undertook an inquiry into sexual health. We had as witnesses a number of young people who were scathing about the sex education that they had received. They all made a number of interesting observations, the first of which related to the "geography teacher" syndrome—I do not know why the geography teacher is always picked out for approbation. Not all teachers are instinctively comfortable delivering this part of the curriculum, even with training. There is nothing worse than being taught this subject or taught about relationships by a teacher who is embarrassed, so we need to have specialist teachers or good, high-quality training, with an opt-out if the teacher does not want to deliver this subject. Bad PSHE is worse than no PSHE.

The second point made to us strongly by those children was that those in their peer group who were taken out of classes were often those in the most need of information. It was not that their parents wanted them to receive this education at home; it was that their parents did not want them to be educated about sex and relationships at all. That is a problem, and we should consider—this might sound like a slightly wacky idea—involving parents more in what is going on and running courses for them so that they can follow up at home on some of the topics that are brought up in school. Some parents would like to talk about this subject—some teenagers would want them to do so like they want a hole in the head, but such an approach would be helpful.

The third point that was made to us dealt with alcohol, peer pressure and self-respect. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) made the point well about the impact of alcohol and the fact that it leads to careless attitudes, and we have to address this part of our education too.

Let us compare our approach with what happens in Sweden, which has a programme of relationship-based education. We always talk about "sex and relationships", but we should be talking about "relationships and sex education". Sweden's relationships education encourages people to talk about relationships in a way that covers friendships, bullying, respect for individuals and relationships with the opposite sex—as has been said, a holistic approach is much the best one. The schools also arranged, as part of the curriculum, a visit to the young people's sexual health clinic—we nearly put this in the report, but we decided that it would not pass the Daily Mail test. We found that the clinics were not just places that dished out condoms and contraceptive pills; they involved multidisciplinary teams. If their people found that a young person was being promiscuous, they would arrange for a psychologist to have a chat with that person, because they took the view that such behaviour was a sign of deeper problems. The evidence from places such as Sweden and the Netherlands shows that better sex education leads to an increase in the age at which young people have their first sexual experience and to fewer partners. Although I welcome the Government's sense of direction, I hope that they will take specific account of some of the details.

In the remaining few moments available to me, I wish to talk briefly about the family courts. I welcome the move towards more openness, because we have probably all encountered constituency cases where we were not able to see the reports from the courts, where a parent was accusing the judge of bias or a professional of not doing a job properly and where it was difficult to obtain transparency. Clearly, that is wrong and there needs to be some accountability, but the new rules have been in place for less than a year and this issue is extremely delicate, and so change has to be introduced gradually.

The media's prime interest is in selling newspapers. I have a constituency example. My female constituent was involved with Fathers 4 Justice and details were published in the press that meant that her daughter could be identified, going against everything that is supposed to be possible. My constituent challenged that in court and the judge effectively said that because of her high-profile position, her daughter did not enjoy the same protections as other children. We talk about opportunities and protections for all, and there should not be any impact on the children just because their parents might be involved in something that we do not like. Apparently, section 97 did not apply because my constituent had put herself in the public domain by protesting and courting publicity for her cause, so her children were not entitled to the same protection as others. Given that the media are totally irresponsible and exist only to sell newspapers, they will publish and be damned. I think that we need to be very careful before giving them carte blanche to ruin children's lives.

8.41 pm

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who made a well-presented contribution to the debate. Many of the speeches this evening have been well thought out and well presented. It is such a large subject that we might easily get distracted, but I hope that I do not become too distracted, as I took large sections out of my speech when the time limit went from 15 to 10 minutes.

This Bill is the latest step on the long path to improving education in our country and I shall support it tonight. It is a key element of that long path. Let me put it into context in my area. Like many others, I shall refer to Sure Start as one of the cornerstones in starting to recognise that children do not come with a works manual. Parents start from scratch. Our society today is a more flexible one, shall we say, in which people do not grow up in the same street as their parents or grandparents. There is no one to turn to, and knowing how to bring up children and how to be a good parent becomes much more challenging. With Sure Start provision, we at least did one thing: we started to teach parents how to play with their children, how to bring their children up and how to have expectations that their children will do better in life than they did.

The theme of raising expectations is an important one to me. Let me step forward a few years in talking about educational provision in my town. We had six secondary schools and a surplus secondary school was converted partly into an educational campus for special educational need provision and partly into a skills academy, staffed by the local college, to take students aged 14-plus one day a week. It now has 150 youngsters and is the largest such academy in the country. They come from the five remaining schools for one day a week. We have to thank our Government for sending a cheque of £8.5 million to allow us to refurbish the school and make it a jewel in the crown, as that would not have been possible otherwise. The academy is raising expectations among our 14-year-old students as well as the qualifications that they are achieving, and people are now realising that vocational status is equal to academic status in education. To me, that is very rewarding.

I also have to thank the Government for sending £100 million for construction work to the remaining five schools as part of the Building Schools for the Future programme. One of the five schools will be an academy, which I personally have no problem with, and the sixth-form centre that we are going to build from new, which will take all the sixth-form students from the remaining schools, will be built to accommodate 960 students. Considering that our town has only 660 sixth formers, Members might think that it has been overbuilt, but what a brilliant advert it is—we now have an academy that has to work to fill the surplus places. To do that, it has to encourage students to stop on into the sixth form at 16-plus. That is a real challenge, but one that we will live up to in the next few years.

[Mr. Brian Jenkins]

Despite all the money that has been sent to our town in the past few years, we still have a problem. The best figures that I can work out show that only 23 per cent. of our 18-year-olds leave to go to university, whereas the national average is 46 per cent. So one of our problems is low expectations and the fact that people do not realise that education, qualifications and a secure future are within their grasp. Another problem is the fact that we have lower than average funding. One might think that Staffordshire is a lovely, leafy county and therefore deserves the same sort of funding as other leafy counties, but my constituency is just outside Birmingham, and many of my people have been part of the overspill programme from Birmingham. My town has the same social make-up as Birmingham, which is just a few miles down the road, but students in Birmingham receive much more funding than those in Staffordshire, in Tamworth. I hope that the new review of spending in education will put that anomaly right. Low expectations give us those low grades and low figures for university entrance.

We have some excellent schools in my constituency. Manor primary school in Drayton Bassett has just recorded results of 100 per cent. in its SATs. If one takes added value into consideration, many other primary schools do very well, but the difficulty is that one must take the added value into consideration. It is at the key point when children start primary school that one-to-one tuition would pay dividends. If we can get their expectations up and get them into the main stream, we can raise still further the number of children who go on to our secondary schools with the full SATs at level 4.

Home education is a challenge that the Government must face up to. I was not very keen on one aspect of this issue. Some of this country's home educators feel that there has been an attack on them and the way that they provide education to children. I am sure that the Government will consider how the position has been presented to them regarding home educators. One good thing has come out of all this, however. In some local authorities, there is no halfway and home educators are either in the system or out of it, but it is about time that we recognised that those people are taxpayers and that their children have rights. Their local authorities should give them the right to use school libraries, to enter music classes and to use science laboratories if they wish to do so. I am sure that the Government will take that point on board.

The Bill will provide guarantees such as those on extra and one-to-one teaching, but for those guarantees to be met, relevant facilities must be in place. I know that the money to make those facilities available has come into my community, but I want to know whether those guarantees will be maintained. Given the uncertainty of the economic future, particularly in the next few years, which of those front-line services will be maintained? If we introduce the one-to-one guarantee, will it be maintained in future? When we give schools the extra funding and require them to give one-to-one teaching to catch-up students, will we be diverting resources from other students, or will money be ring-fenced specifically for catch-up students? It will be self-defeating to take money from gifted children—from high flyers—to spend on catch-up students, because the high flyers are the ones who have given us our results in the past. They are the ones who have gone on to achieve and to give us our current world-leading positions in culture, art, IT and games. We need to maintain that stream of high flyers.

We are to give children [illegible] opportunity to learn to play a musical instrument. Will we make sure that that goes further than the spoons or the triangle? Who will provide funding for music in this country? Music, as we know, has been a Cinderella in many of our schools. At present, parents have to provide funding to allow their children to have music tuition. I would like to see much more information on exactly how much funding will be provided for that.

With regard to teacher licensing, the General Teaching Council, which was established under the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998, was intended to drive up standards, so what role will licensing play? How do we see it taking over the role of being the driving force? Most teachers I know would welcome the chance to undertake professional development. The only reason they do not undertake it is that their head teacher tells them that there is no money in the fund. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) said that the TUC did not back the measure, but the National Union of Teachers said that it > "could see nothing to welcome in the proposal without adequate funding".

A comprehensive professional development strategy for all teachers, based on an individual funding entitlement for each teacher, would be welcomed as a way forward. Perhaps the proposal has raised expectations within the NUT.

I have already said this, and I will say it time and again: the one thing that must be stamped on the Bill is "Expectations, expectations, expectations". Without that, some of our poorest children will continually fail.

8.51 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I appreciate the opportunity to make a brief contribution to the debate. Given the time constraints, I hope that you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I focus on the aspect of the Bill that is of particular interest to me: home education.

Almost exactly one year ago, the Department for Children, Schools and Families launched an independent review of home education by Graham Badman. Fearful that it represented another attempt by the Government to intrude into their lives, two home-educating parents from my constituency, Tina Robbins and Helen White, came to meet me in Parliament to see what could be done. Home educators have long suspected that the Government are uncomfortable with the idea of parents providing an education that cannot be monitored, tested or accounted for. That applies, I suspect, to Governments of all political colours, and of course to local education authorities. In many ways, the outcome of the report confirmed that suspicion.

I have to admit that in my initial meeting with my two constituents, I had misconceptions that a home education might produce an unsocialised, precocious child, unable to interact with his or her peers and shielded from all negative influences. However, the more I listened to the two mothers talk, the more I was impressed and excited by the passion and enthusiasm that they displayed for home education. Each parent was able to provide their child with an individualised learning experience, tailored to that child's ability and interests.

Inspired by that dedication to individualised learning and that determination to fight Government impositions, in a Westminster Hall debate last June I decided to defend home educators against some of the most controversial recommendations in the Badman report—compulsory annual registration; annual home visits by local authority officers, which we have heard about; and a right for local authority officers to interview a child away from their parents.

I must confess that I was absolutely overwhelmed by the reaction to the speech that I made that day. Not only did it receive extensive support from my constituents, many of whom I had no idea shared a passion for the subject, but I received countless letters and e-mails from home educators across the country. The important point to stress is that home educators are a very diverse group of individuals with no single voice. There has been a great lobby, but it should be stressed that we are talking about individuals, to a large extent. So sacred is their independence that for a long time they have chosen to remain under the radar. However, nationwide, in the past year, they have felt compelled for the very first time to stand up and demand that their voice be heard.

The results are quite remarkable. As we know, the Department has been flooded with correspondence. Meetings have been set up with numerous MPs from every mainstream party. There has been a massive co-ordinated internet campaign, too. As Members know, that all resulted, only last December, in the biggest mass petition ever seen in the House.

A review of elective home education by the Children, Schools and Families Committee has also broadly assisted the cause. Released just before Christmas, the Committee's report rejected the idea of compulsory registration of home-educated children and made clear the Committee's disappointment at the

> "less than robust evidence base that the Badman Report and the Department have presented with regard to the relative safeguarding risk to school and home educated children."

The report went on strongly to discourage the notion that local authority home-education teams should be given a more overt safeguarding role and questioned the Department's somewhat optimistic cost estimates for more robust monitoring by local authorities. It concluded:

> "The way in which the Department has handled the Badman report has been unfortunate—from the way in which it framed the review, through to its drafting of legislation prior to publication of the related consultation findings. We trust that the Department will learn from this episode".

In the light of the outcry of home educators and the criticisms of the review, I question how the Government can proceed with the plans in the Bill. Home education has been under constant scrutiny since the Children Act 2004 enshrined the Government's Every Child Matters agenda in legislation. Home educators with whom I have engaged conclude only that either the Government have no faith in the previous reviews or the Badman report was from the start a superficial exercise designed to allay public concern—a bid somehow to make good other failures with frenetic activity; or, worse still, that child welfare concerns were being used as a cover for a Government obsessed with monitoring and targets to interfere in a sphere over which they currently have little influence.

Home educators vigorously reject the attempts by the Government to mix concerns about child welfare into any review of home education, and I believe that they are right. They believe that the Government's concerns in this regard are in line with the misguided understanding that a child is safe when seen once or twice by a local authority. I am not diminishing in any way some legitimate concerns about child abuse and I have a great deal of sympathy with some of the problems faced by the Government, particularly in other Departments, in preventing cases similar to the appalling ones that we have recently seen, but we must be clear: local authorities already have powers to get involved in a family when there are concerns about abuse.

The uncomfortable truth is that no amount of legislation will ever remove all risk. The task of the Government is to balance the rights of all individuals. Given that home-educated children are not proven to be at any greater risk, it is inappropriate to throw away the liberty of parents to choose how to educate, particularly when it is equally possible for a child to go to school and be abused when they return home or, indeed, for children in the care of the state to suffer abuse.

On top of all the concerns over the conflation of education and welfare are fears about the implications of monitoring home educators. Monitoring is not a neutral activity and is likely to require tick boxes to ascertain whether a child is receiving a suitable education. Although a seemingly harmless word, the definition of "suitable" is worryingly subjective.

If a more formal monitoring system is implemented, it will come with severe practical and cost implications. Of course, for any monitoring to be worth while, staff will have to be trained. If no extra funding is forthcoming—a likely scenario in these difficult economic times—budgets currently allocated to ensuring the welfare of genuinely vulnerable children could be diverted to such things. That would be a real waste and, of course, a risk when the Government have already stated that they are confident that the great majority of home educators are doing a first-class job.

That majority feels that the Government are incapable of trusting parents to do the best for their children. Yes, parents fail sometimes, but, let us be honest, so too do the Government. Without being able to prevent all cases where a child is abused or not provided with a decent education—of course, such cases can happen just as often when the state is involved—it is for Governments to assess risk and ask which areas warrant most attention.

Increased intervention makes little financial sense and has the potential to divert resources from truly vulnerable children. It also further infringes the rights of parents to make what they believe are the right decisions for their children. Current legislation is perfectly adequate but all too often poorly understood. Any Government must guard the sacred right of parents to educate their children, while vigorously tightening the current system when it comes to child welfare. After that, the Government should look to their own ability to fulfil the Every Child Matters objectives, rather than continue to pursue those who put their faith, time and passion into home education. I believe that these proposals should be firmly rejected.

[Mr. Mark Field]

8.59 pm

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): This is my first chance in the Chamber to pay my tribute to my dear friend and colleague, David Taylor. As fellow east midlands MPs with similar constituencies and both active in our union group, Unison, I know of his humanity, his kindness, his ability to take the mickey, the way in which he put forward ideas and campaigned, and his commitment to public services and education. The subject of the Bill would have been close to his heart.

At his funeral on Saturday in the village of Heather where he lived, I saw the primary school that he went to. One of his local council colleagues told me how proud David was to see the extension and the building work that had been done at that school under Labour, and the pride that it gave him to know that he had helped push for that and to see it happen on his watch, so to speak. I spoke to a couple of head teachers at the football pavilion where we met afterwards, who told me about all the support that David had given as a continuing member of one of the school's governing bodies, and how he had managed to visit two thirds of his schools in just one term.

I talked to one of the heads about a neighbouring sports specialist school in Leicestershire, at which I spoke when I went to one of those Sunday "Politics Show" programmes last year. We talked about the Government pledge to provide pupils with sports and arts opportunities in all schools. That is included in the very welcome guarantees in the Bill. David would have strongly supported those.

In that programme pupils at the school talked about the different ways in which sports and music could be provided. It does not have to be traditional sports. It could be anything from the oz boxing programme in my constituency set up by a couple of police with local pupils, which won a Daily Mirror award, to dance to different forms of music, an activity in which it is easy to get pupils engaged. We know how music and sports can feed back into educational attainment. I have seen it at first hand through, for example, some of the ways in which pupils in my constituency have got involved in sports development programmes. The value that they gained from that has fed back into their academic achievement. Providing guarantees that we will see such programmes is important and valuable.

David would not have welcomed everything in the Bill. I am sure that in his inimitable style, he would probably have made some caustic comments about academies, which as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) pointed out, were not necessarily to David's taste. I know that he would have welcomed the continuing thrust towards providing support and encouragement for every child, no matter how disadvantaged, to reach their full potential.

Like previous speakers, I see the Bill as the next stage of much of the work that we have been doing in government over recent years. I have seen huge improvements in my constituency and I can point to all sorts of facts and figures about the changes, for example, in 11-year-olds reaching level 4 at key stage 2, going up from 64 per cent. to 82 per cent. in English, and from 68 per cent. to 88 per cent. in science, the increase in the proportion of those getting five A* to Cs, and the fact that I no longer have any schools with fewer than 30 per cent. achieving that. Obviously, we want to go further. I see the Bill as a further development of such achievements.

I recall that when I was campaigning in my first election at the same time as David was, one of the things that struck me most was going to Swanwick Hall school in my constituency. The buildings in which we expected pupils to learn stank of damp. That struck me even more than the buildings that were falling down. Parents came to see me with a picture of the toilet that had a roof that was open. A dead bird had fallen almost into the lap of their pupil. The transformation in school buildings in my area, as well as the improvements that we have seen in results, and the figures that I could give to illustrate the increase in teaching staff and in non-teaching staff, have been extremely important. The proposals in the Bill to provide guarantees are important and valuable.

I am pleased about the one-to-one teaching, which has been spoken about, and the possibility of catch-up. As I have seen in a number of my schools, the practice of taking pupils out if they are not doing so well happens anywhere. It is not completely new, but the fact that the Bill makes that a systematic entitlement is valuable. However, I ask Ministers to ensure that in doing so we look at the support that we need. As a fellow Unison MP, David, like me, was very concerned about the role of support staff in schools and the valuable contribution that they make, and I am sure that they, along with teaching staff, will be an important part of the programme.

Notably, the White Paper had a specific chapter on work force development, where it clearly acknowledged that "the ability of the school system to support every child and young person to achieve success depends most of all on the school workforce."

We will, in effect, need a "work force guarantee", so that teaching and non-teaching staff can continue to develop and carry out the Bill's guarantees, which I think will be absolutely invaluable.

The Bill's ambition

"for all pupils to go to schools where they are taught a broad, balanced and flexible curriculum and where they acquire skills learning and life"

will obviously be fleshed out. I note that the White Paper fleshes it out by talking about providing vocational qualifications and training as well as academic training—in so far as one can make a clear distinction between the two. In my constituency, one thing of which I am most proud is the new post-16 Phoenix centre at Aldercar community language college, which I took David Puttnam to open. The centre, a £4.6 million facility funded by the Learning and Skills Council, provides a range of vocational and academic qualifications.

I also visited Manthorpe Engineering, a world-class engineering company in my constituency, and I have with me a picture of some of the 24 apprentices whom, in consultation with a local school, it has taken on over the past few years and trained up for engineering. It is important that the range of opportunities for pupils does not disappear, but, looking at the Opposition's policies, I am concerned, because I understand that the Conservatives would abolish the new diplomas. That would be a huge mistake, because they provide another pathway for pupils.

I recently attended a workshop organised by the Institution of Engineering and Technology, and I talked to a number of girls and boys who have been taking engineering diplomas. They were excited by the way in which they had been able to get into engineering and take up that opportunity. Indeed, the institution has been very positive about the implementation of advanced diplomas, and Russell group universities now recognise and accept them for 79 per cent. of their courses. That development is highlighted by the Bill's guarantee of a broad range of choice, but it would be extremely disappointing if the Opposition came to power and took away such choice. I certainly hope that we carry on down that path, because it is extremely valuable.

The two other areas that I should like to mention have been well covered by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint). The provisions on community facilities and on life skills, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North put it, are invaluable parts of the Bill, and they will be very important.

Opposition Members say that the Bill is bureaucratic, but a system has to have order. A free-market system, which we would allegedly move to if we operated the Swedish system, would mean only that we threw a pile more money into things; we would not have a proper, organised programme. The programme and developments in the Bill, however, are really positive. They will enable us to move on to the next stage of improving education in my constituency and to build yet further on the improvements that we have made in recent years.

9.9 pm

Mr. Edward Timpson (Crewe and Nantwich) (Con): In the short time that is left in this Second Reading debate, I would like to concentrate on part 2 of the Bill, on which my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) spoke with great authority. I declare an interest in that before taking my seat in this place I was a practising family law barrister for 10 years.

Part 2 deals with the relaxation of the rules on reporting information relating to family proceedings. Like most Members who spoke about this issue, I support the principle of making the work of family courts more transparent and accountable to the wider public. That principle has developed over a period when the issue has been brought to the fore by a series of high-profile miscarriages of justice, including the cases of Sally Clark and Angela Cannings, involving professional or expert witnesses whose evidence has been discredited—in those cases, the expert witness was Professor Sir Roy Meadow. The desire to open up the family courts is therefore understandable. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who is not in her place, that the fundamental shift that the Bill will introduce should not be rushed into without proper consideration and consultation, because it concerns a particularly delicate area.

The family courts touch the lives of the majority of people in this country. One need only look at the example of adoption—one in four people knows someone who has been involved in an adoption. That, in itself, shows the importance of the family court system and of people's confidence in it. The system is subject to too much delay and suffers from a lack of judges, and there is a disconnect between the family court process and the public's understanding of what that is. It is therefore essential that we address those issues when considering the transparency of these courts. Clients in family court proceedings used to ask me questions as simple as "What is a courtroom like?", "Is there a jury?", "Can I speak?", "Will the social worker be there?", and "How does the judge decide what to do?" If the people involved in the family court system do not understand these issues, it is not surprising that the wider public have a dearth of understanding of the process. It is only right that they have those questions answered, as long as the privacy of the parties and the protection of the child remain paramount. The Bill touches on that important issue. Accessibility of information must happen without compromising the natural course of justice. People's experiences of family courts, as of criminal courts, vary widely, from satisfaction with the depth of inquiry and the sensitivity of the proceedings to disbelief at the way they feel they have been treated through their involvement in the case.

Opening up the family court system will help people to understand the judge's reasons for coming to their decision, dispel some of the myths surrounding family court proceedings, and help to bring confidence back into the system. However, I make a plea to the Government that they should also be considering how we can prevent cases from going into the family court system in the first place, particularly the role that mediation and alternative dispute resolution can play in bringing parties together and ensuring that they do not go as far as having to instruct solicitors and to spend their own money, in some cases, or money from the public purse, in others, on trying to resolve issues that could have been resolved much earlier on.

One of my concerns about this aspect of the Bill is that it builds in a two-stage process for reviewing the sensitive information that will become available to the public through the introduction of the media into the courtroom. Stage 1, which will apply for the first 18 months once the Bill becomes law, creates a slight loosening of the reins in the reporting of proceedings, particularly placement proceedings, but when we move to stage 2, that reporting goes much further and would allow the Lord Chancellor, of his own volition, to relax rules to the extent that sensitive personal information, as it is termed, can be published unless the court specifically imposes restrictions. That presumption should be re-examined to see whether it is the right way forward, because the anonymity of some very vulnerable young children is at stake. It is clear from some of the information that has been provided to us by those who are interested in that aspect of the Bill that there is a real danger that some children will become identifiable through other sensitive information that will become available to the public, such as psychiatric and health reports. When pieced together, such information could form a picture of exactly who the child in question was.

The Government have not made a huge assessment of the impact that the proposed changes will have. The original changes were brought in only in April 2009, and as we have heard, there has been no independent evaluation of their impact on children, courts and reporting. We can say that there has been very little journalistic take-up of the opportunity to go into the courts and view the family law process. The danger is that journalists will end up going only to cases that have a sensational element and that they believe will have some public interest through their newspapers, as opposed to getting a true, broad picture of what goes on in the family courts across the country. Rather than help to deal with the fear of the family court system that some people have, the media may reinforce it through the selective reporting of what goes on.

[Mr. Edward Timpson]

I am conscious that other Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude by saying that although it is a welcome move that we are looking to open up the family court system, there is a danger that if we go through the process set out in the Bill, we will move ahead too quickly with a rather complex system that ends up not helping the accountability of the family court system and people's understanding of it but shrouding it in even greater mystery with selective reporting of what goes on. People need to understand what goes on in the family courts, but I am not sure that the Bill goes the right way about it. A more structured and cautious approach of evaluating the evidence and returning to the matter at a later date would be a much more constructive way of ensuring that we deal with this very sensitive issue in the appropriate way.

9.17 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I want to make a very brief contribution on a few topics. On the first two, home education and personal, social and health education, it is interesting to note that the Government's current stance represents a U-turn. However, there are interesting contrasts in their approach to the two issues.

There are a number of reasons for home education, and it clearly is not one homogenous entity, which makes a heavy-handed and rushed approach to legislating seem singularly inappropriate. I have long been concerned about the lack of support for those home educators who would like to access certain support, and I shall briefly give a constituency example. I have a letter that states:

> "This is the last straw. I have heard today that children who are excluded from school will be given home tuition through computers all financed by the government. Where is my Help?
>
> I withdrew my son before he was excluded and we get no help what so ever, not even the right to sit free GCSE's."

So it goes on. I wrote to the local authority and established that there was no help. That was in 2007. I also wrote to the Government, because I was concerned about that mother, who had withdrawn her child from school for the very best of reasons—to ensure that he could make something of his life. I received a letter from the then Schools Minister, the right hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), stating:

> "We recognise that it is a fundamental right enshrined in law that parents should be free to educate their children at home if they so wish. But when deciding to do so or not, parents are strongly encouraged to plan ahead and think carefully about the costs associated with educating children at home. This is because there are no funds directly available from the Government for parents who decide to home educate their children. We believe that school is the best place for the vast majority of children to receive education, therefore funding is devoted to maintaining the state system of schools from which those children benefit. There are currently no plans to change this."

That is quite a statement, which obviously reflects the Department's stance. That stance has affected the culture in the Department and in local authorities. I welcome the fact that the Government and Badman himself identified the need to provide support, but before rushing into legislating, one needs to work on the culture and training. Indeed, I cannot understand why the support that is to be introduced needs legislation.

Furthermore, when we had revised education guidelines for local authorities—in 2007, dipping into 2008—the Government did not move far. They suggested a few examples of additional support, such as using the library, but certainly nothing like supporting entry into examinations.

I welcome the U-turn on support, but the problem is everything that comes with it. When we examine the diverse nature of home education, we realise that a large group of competent parents wishes to pursue education for their children and is clearly capable of doing that. Those parents probably removed their children from school because they wanted to escape the straitjacket of the national curriculum. The greatest fear is that, under the Government's proposals, registration and all the strings attached mean that there is no control over the direction of home education. That is why I understand home educators' concerns. It is a complex topic, which needs time. We should deal with it step by step, starting with the important subjects of support and training. We should be wary of a registration scheme, which could represent the most heavy-handed approach and perhaps destroy some imaginative education.

I want briefly to consider PSHE education. I welcome the fact that it may be made statutory. I have proposed that on several occasions when considering other Bills, and been defeated. The difference between that U-turn and the previous one is that once the Government decided to follow that route, they engaged in pilots and a great deal of consultation. There is much to be commended in the proposals. I should have liked the process to start many years ago, but I respect the fact that it has happened. A great deal of engagement with the school, parents and the local community is important, as is high-quality provision. We are placing such high expectations on the provisions that we must all show great leadership. They have the power to deliver a great deal, but they could be just a damp squib if we are not careful.

It is important to dwell on the relationships provisions because they are about empowering young people to say no, whether to alcohol, following the gang or engaging in violence, as well as sex. I am therefore concerned about the opt-out of sex and relationship education at 15, because some aspects are crucial to young people's development. We can usefully explore that in detail in Committee.

I want to consider clause 9, which deals with exceptional provision for ill or excluded children—I do not think that anyone else has referred to it. I am all in favour of improving the education on offer to excluded children. It is one way of stopping the downward spiral of exclusion, truancy and disillusionment with school.

However, it is important to get the education right for children and young people who have long-term health conditions. I am not sure what clause 9 offers them. There are parents in my constituency who say, "I'd get more help with home tuition if my child was excluded rather than ill." That cannot be right. I recently had a constituency case of home tuition being needed for someone in the sixth form. It was extremely complex. I was told:

> "The Learning and Skills Council allocates funding to local authorities for such cases but the matter rests with Connexions services in discussion with the school concerned on whether this additional support is merited."

There were months of discussions with different bodies, but the child was perhaps let down at the end of the day. In that case, the young person had myalgic encephalomyelitis. She needed to get a secure package to ensure that she could make a sound start to sixth-form studies—probably a mix of school and home tuition—but she failed to get it.

Finally, I echo some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws). Will the Minister give some clarification on whether there is a loophole in section 58 of the Children Act 2004 that allows certain adults who do not have legal responsibility to use physical punishment on a child in their care? Whereas teachers for the most part are prohibited in law from using such sanctions, the prohibition may not extend to teachers providing under 12.5 hours' education a week, such as those in Sunday schools or madrassahs. That is important, and I would appreciate some clarification.

9.26 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): In the few minutes that I have, I shall address the subject of home education, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) did in an excellent speech. From the Front Bench, my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) spoke a lot of common sense on the topic, as did the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), who addressed it in the first half of her speech.

Under clause 26 and schedule 1, local authorities will have a duty to run a licensing system—that is what it is—for all home-educating parents in their areas, complete with monitoring by local authority inspectors, who will have to be hired and trained and sent out in order to have all their meetings. Local authorities may revoke a parent's licence to educate their own child or refuse to give one if the inspectors do not think that that child is receiving a suitable and efficient education, if they deem the families to be unco-operative—God forbid that any family should be unco-operative when an inspector from the local authority comes knocking on the door—or if the parents fail in any of the administrative requirements imposed on them by the Bill.

It has always been the duty of parents, not the state, to educate their children, and they may choose to do so through school or otherwise. That historic settlement will be turned on its head by the Bill, which tears from parents and gives to the state the decision as to how a child is to be educated. We have heard much about guarantees in this debate, but for many parents, the freedom to choose how their child is educated is the ultimate guarantee.

A small minority of parents elect to educate their children at home, for a variety of reasons—I will not go into that, but various speakers have mentioned the diverse nature of parents who home educate. Under the current legal framework, parents are trusted to do the right thing by their child unless there is clear evidence to the contrary. Of course, some home-educating parents do not do a good job of educating their child, but overwhelmingly, what evidence we have suggests that that is a tiny minority, and nothing said by Ministers has done anything to dispel that view. To deal with that tiny minority, the Secretary of State wants to set up a huge licensing bureaucracy with a long list of reasons why home-educated children can be sent back to school, whatever the opinion of the parents and the child. Because of this Bill, the cloud of suspicion will be extended to the many, not the few.

As I understand it, the Government have three principal motives for introducing the licensing inspection proposals: first, the Department for Children, Schools and Families says it has evidence from serious case reviews and other such things that under the guise of home education, some children are at risk of suffering harm or being denied an education; secondly, Ministers point out that they intend the measures to give the state the power to guarantee that every child receives a suitable education; and thirdly, Ministers say that to allow local authorities to provide greater support and other services to home-educating families, they need a better idea of the numbers.

As we heard from the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), the Government made no effort before introducing such a major licensing system—this draconian set of powers—to support home-educating families. Indeed, they wrote to her specifically to say that absolutely no money was available for home-educating families. On the Department for Children, Schools and Families website today, in the small print on the page about the home access scheme, which is designed to provide grants for parents to look after their children, it says that home-educated children are specifically excluded. That is the history under this Government, of which home-educating parents are well aware. There has been lots of suspicion, but no support, and now Ministers tell us that their approach is all about education, support and a more co-operative relationship between parents and local authorities. However, I am afraid that none of the home-educating families out there feels the same.

There has been a lot of concern about the fact that the consultation on the Badman proposals was not published before the Bill was published, despite the Cabinet Office guidelines, to which the Department is a signatory, which say that Departments must ensure that any consultation is meaningful and can properly influence decisions. I thank the Minister for Schools and Learners, with whom I had a meeting last week, for saying that he would do everything possible to ensure that as much information as possible was provided, but the response to that consultation was published yesterday. That hardly helps to inform our deliberations too well today, except for those who are particularly astute.

The numbers were 230 in favour, 4,497 against and 106 unsure, yet Ministers keep making out that it is a minority of people who are opposed. It is not a minority. A system is being set up, supposedly for the benefit of home-educated children and their families, to create, according to Ministers, a co-operative atmosphere, yet that system is being forced on to families, practically none of whom wants it. Ministers should ask themselves whether they want to bring such help to families who are so adamant that they do not want to receive it.

[Mr. Graham Stuart]

It is not that families do not want help or would not welcome access to the home access scheme, or to libraries or other facilities—the points that the Badman report makes on that have been fully supported by the Select Committee on Children, Schools and Families—but where is the guarantee of support in the Bill for home-educated families? The Bill is full of guarantees, but anyone who searches through it for such guarantees will find that there are none. There is no evidence of any additional money and no evidence that home-educating families will be treated fairly as taxpayers and citizens. What is guaranteed is a large licensing scheme. What is also guaranteed is that the local authority will impose a school attendance order on those who fail to put their child on the register, regardless—it specifically says this in the legislation—of the quality of the education provided to that child. In other words, the administrative convenience of the local authority is to be put ahead of the interests of the child. That is what is in the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath touched on this issue, but in connection with the Badman review, on which the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) spoke last week, it is also worth mentioning that bad data lead to bad decisions. That is what the legislation is based on. One member of the Badman review's expert reference group described the review as > "slap dash, panic driven, and nakedly and naively populist".

That is the basis on which the Government have moved forward.

As I mentioned in an intervention on the Secretary of State, New Zealand had a similar monitoring and licensing system. It ran the system for several years and found that there was no problem with home-educating families. It therefore scrapped the scheme last year, saying that it was a waste of time and money. Is it not time that Ministers learned from that experience and did likewise?

9.34 pm

Chloe Smith (Norwich, North) (Con): You must excuse me, Mr. Speaker, for suffering from such a bad winter cold that any compassionate teacher would seek to exclude me from their classroom for fear of infecting everybody else. I am therefore happy to have to keep my comments brief. I should start also by noting that I am, I suspect, the only Member of the House to have sat my GCSEs and received all my subsequent education under this Government—I may or may not be all the better for that, but there we are. I did that in a comprehensive school in rural Norfolk. I understand that I might therefore have shared a local authority with the Secretary of State in my early years.

I want to assert that I believe passionately in education as a means of encouraging aspiration and ambition. This debate has been wide ranging and measured, but I hope that, during the wind-ups, the Government will drop the rather sad refrain that we have heard before—not least during the Personal Care at Home Bill before Christmas—that to oppose a hyper-active, headlong and rather heavy-handed Bill is to advocate putting nothing in its place. That is not the position of many Conservative Members.

We want to focus instead on giving teachers the trust and freedom to do their jobs, rather than on producing and debating another education Bill from another Queen's Speech. Such legislation has been introduced nearly every year, but—notwithstanding my own education under this Labour Government—less than half of all pupils currently leaving school achieve five or more GCSEs, including English and maths, at the top levels. Will the Government accept that their policies have failed, and that teachers and head teachers must now be given the trust and the freedom that they need to complete their jobs? They must not be given a bundle of bureaucratic burdens, which is what the Bill could provide if it goes through in its current form.

I do not have an awful lot of time, but I want to discuss four aspects of the provisions, from parts 1 and 3—the home-school agreements, the school report cards, the charitable status of academies, and the primary curriculum. I shall discuss each of them at top speed.

I welcome the strengthening of the existing home-school agreements. The Government agree that the present HSAs involve a bureaucratic process with few real benefits. However, the Bill could undermine them, for two reasons. First, it seeks to personalise agreements rather than making them reflect common standards that are expected of all pupils at a school. That could undermine the idea of common standards, and it could also create a mammoth administrative task for schools.

Secondly, the Bill fails to give HSAs teeth by ignoring their usefulness as a potential tool as an admission condition. The Secretary of State has said:

> "It would be wrong to make signing the Home School Agreement a condition of admission, as this could unfairly deny a child a school place."

That is wrong-headed, however. Agreements should set out common standards that are expected of all pupils, and should define the expectation that parents support their kids at school. What parent would refuse to sign a simple agreement on such terms? A failure to sign could be, and should be, a ground for head teachers to say, "I don't want such children in my school because it could hinder everyone's learning." It might also have to be a ground, further down the line, for other agencies to become involved with the child and the parents. The Bill should create an opportunity to have a civilised condition of admission in that regard.

On school report cards, the Bill will get it wrong if it seeks to introduce a single grade for schools. There is no such thing as a single card that meets the data needs of all the interested parties. I also understand from one school in my constituency that there is not yet a united view within the Government on how such data should even be calculated. We need to publish as much data as possible about a school, for two particularly good reasons that were given to me by a vice-principal in my constituency. The first is that that would pull attention away from the borderline data. The second is that it could help to attract and retain good staff by reflecting the breadth of what the school does.

On the automatic charitable status for academies, the vice-principal I just mentioned is vice-principal of Norfolk's first academy, the Open academy, which is in Norwich.

North. Jumping out of the frying pan of any bureaucracy associated with a local authority into the fire connected with the Charity Commission would not be desirable, so the academy and I support this measure to simplify procedures for these new schools. May I take this opportunity to praise the Open academy for its impressive achievement in doubling its benchmark GCSE results last summer?

My fourth point is on the Rose review of the primary curriculum. In so far as these measures provide an opportunity to teach children basic learning skills, I welcome them, but they must, without doubt, be supplemented by knowledge. This must be a question of skills plus knowledge, and I believe that that is the view of many primary schools in my constituency, including the Heartsease primary school, of which I must declare that I am due to become a governor very shortly.

In three of the four areas that I have just mentioned, great opportunities have been missed. On home-school agreements, instead of empowering schools, the Bill will force head teachers to tailor toothless agreements with each parent. The measure on report cards could have provided parents with a great range of data that could help them to make choices for them and their child. But no, it seeks to condense information, turning sharpness into fuzziness. As to the Rose review, yes, children need skills for learning, but they also need knowledge. In all those cases, the measures are incredibly prescriptive towards children. The Bill fails to empower teaching professionals and, given the stream of legislation coming out of the Department, it risks stifling both head teachers and teachers.

9.40 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Well, here we are, Mr. Speaker, a new year and a new education Bill. It is now almost an annual event, with nearly as many education Bills as finance Bills. We have had the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, the Learning and Skills Act 2000, the Education Act 2002, the Education Act 2005, the Education and Inspections Act 2006, the Education and Skills Act 2008, the Apprenticeships, Skills, Children and Learning Act 2009 and now the Children, Schools and Families Bill in 2010.

It is not just the 50 clauses and four schedules of this Bill or the 270 clauses and 16 schedules of last year's Bill that are the problem; it is the scores of regulations that each of these Bills spawns and the dozens of sets of statutory guidance and programmes of study that local authorities, governors, head teachers and teachers all have to read, absorb and act upon that is the real burden.

It is becoming almost axiomatic that, legal skills are as necessary as pedagogical skills to succeed in education these days. Legal skills and knowledge will become even more important if the Government succeed in putting on to the statute book the pupil and parent guarantees in the opening clauses of this Bill, which is why the Association of School and College Leaders is right to warn that these guarantees will > “open the flood gates for increased litigation against schools”.

As the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) pointed out, how is the local government ombudsman going to be able to enforce loosely defined guarantees about the quality of education?

